The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not of striking interest. It opened with the prelude to "Lohengrin," which has been better played in Music Hall than it was on this occasion. The tempo at which it was taken was somewhat slower than that to which we have been accustomed, and the music lost proportionately in its characteristic airy lightness, and there was much untunefulness in both the strings and the wind instruments. Next came a work new to Boston, Symphony No. 3, in D-major, op. 37, by August Klughardt, a name unknown hitherto to our concert programmes. It is a bright and pleasing work, of no great depth, but remarkable, in this musical era of struggling after ugly originality, bizarre effects in harmony and rhythm, and newness at any cost, for its naivete, its simple melodiousness, and its adherence to a style that modern composers have abandoned as wholly old-fashioned. Even in the matter of orchestration, simplicity is the rule, and there are no ponderous effects. The score is without trombones and has only two horns. This in itself is a surprise, and one not utterly unwelcome. The symphony is not a masterpiece, by any means, but it has the merit of perfect clearness, is manifestly the work of a gifted musician who can produce something better than Kapellmeister music. The work is well made, tuneful, graceful in its harmonic treatment, skilful and clean in its orchestration, and showing excellent learning discreetly used. The opening movement is light, brilliant and interesting, curiously quaint now and then, especially in its second subject, clever in its free working out after the double bar, easy and natural in its flow and pleasing generally. The largo is less meritorious. Its meaning is not clear, and though it moves without effort and is charming in its instrumentation, it says nothing worth the saying. The next movement on the other hand, is delightful. It opens in the style of a vigorous minuet, and the quaintness noticed in the opening allegro, again appears with greater frequency and in a more marked manner. There are two trios. The first is charming in its pretty grace and in its dainty orchestral effects; the second falls into the scherzo style, and is no less attractive. The finale opens with a thoroughly Haydnesque theme, but it soon abandons this, and, before the movement has progressed far, it lapses into sprightly commonplace, almost suggesting a comic opera medley. It is all fresh enough, gay enough, and ear-pleasing enough, but is lacking in that dignity which is imparted to even such playful finales by Haydn and Mozart. It is a genial work, and we would rather hear it than some of the profounder symphonies by modern composers that have found a place on these programmes; but there are many better symphonies by Haydn and by Mozart that have not been played by the Symphony Orchestra, and which are more entitled to a hearing. The work was finely played and made a pleasing impression, although it excited no very marked enthusiasm. It was too clear, too easily understood, too free from noise and bombast to excite much respect in a symphony concert audience, which, as a rule, palpitates more readily to the incomprehensible. Then came the slow movement and finale from a concerto in D minor for violoncello, by Reinecke. This music was also new to Boston. It is Kapellmeister music of the most pronounced kind; highly proper and eminently respectable music; even prudish music, that would scorn to be caught in anything remotely suggesting impropriety, and wholly uninteresting, in addition. It maunders along in a faultless manner, and is—well, pure Reinecke, and nothing else. It was played by Mr. Leo Schultz, with much refinement of taste and excellent technical skill, but in a colorless style. His tone was thin and cloudy and his performance throughout was depressing in its lack of energy. His task, however, was not a very inspiriting one, and as we have heard him to much better advantage, we are inclined to lay the general ineffectiveness of his performance to the music he played. He was, however, heartily, perhaps sympathetically applauded, and was twice recalled. The concert ended with a spirited performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, the one masterpiece the programme presented. At the next concert will be given: Symphonic Prologue to Shakspeare's "Othello," by Arnold Krug, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Paderewski (first time), a suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whitlor (first time), and Liszts' Rakoczy March. The soloist is Mrs. Julia Rive King.

—— The Symphony Orchestra is no longer synonymous with musical propriety! It has gone in for the ordinary concert custom of "taking encores." More's the pity!

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eighteenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, offered four selections:

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt—Op. 37, Symphony in D, No. 3.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke—Op. 82. Romance and Allegretto moderato from Concerto in D minor for Violoncello.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist: Mr. Leo Schulz.

Not a very interesting programme, although the short Beethoven Overture, with so much beauty, fire and passion condensed in it, went far to redeem the rest. That, after all, was the newest feature of a programme mainly new. That is one of the things that never can grow old. Does the sky above, all sown with stars and planets, do the gorgeous or the softest sunsets, ever become old and tiresome? No more does a real masterwork of musical genius, like that "Egmont" overture—at least, not when rendered so superbly as it was on Saturday evening. Mr. Nikisch was at his best in conducting the performance, and the orchestra were with him in spirit and intention. When Shakspeare is most intensely tragic, as in Othello, Lear or Hamlet, he is still supremely beautiful; the sense of beauty, the hopeful view of life, the faith in overruling, all-prevailing good, has not forsaken you when the play is over. That is one of the criteria of greatness, of essential genius in poetry and art. That criterion Beethoven can stand in this and in his Coriolanus Overture, the two most graphic ones which he composed, both on the darkest background, in the lowest tone of color.

Wagner's Vorspiel to "Lohengrin," on the contrary, moves or serenely floats in the higher realms of tone, suggesting supernatural, ethereal light. It is one of the short list of Wagnerian pieces which are really well adapted to concert performance. There is a certain mystic charm about it, which Wagner mystifies still more in his literary explanation of it cited in the Bulletin. You are supposed to see the swan-drawn-boat approaching, bearing the Knight of the Holy Grail, attended, it may be, by clouds of angel forms and faces. The picture as it were is breathed across the stage, the watery scene. Starting with the highest violin and flute tones, just visible as a point of light in the distance, the harmony grows fuller, broader, deeper, louder, as the mysterious phenomenon approaches, reaches a pitch of grand fortissimo when it seems to touch the shore, and then recedes, diminishes again and vanishes afar, foreshadowing the conclusion of the drama. There is certainly much beauty in this gradually growing and again fading scenic tone-picture. The instrumental coloring is richly, delicately blended. It is a very ingenious, perhaps we may say poetic, study of instrumentation for a special purpose. Unusual instruments, bass-clarinet, corno di bassetto, etc., are liberally introduced. All flows smoothly, well-proportioned. The mystical, romantic element is felt. It differs again from the Beethoven overtures with which we were contrasting it in the want of action, of dramatic force and progress. It depicts a dream, not life. Without a struggle, without effort, the vision comes and fades away. There is no human passion in it, nothing real to take hold of. Yet the opera, or music-drama, "Lohengrin," which follows, has not a little life and passion; it has progress and excitement, independently of Swan or Grail. It has contrasted characters, stirring ensembles, knights and heralds who make thrilling appeals with their trumpets. The wedding scene is gorgeous; the gathering of the clans, so to speak, in the last act, each headed by its choir of trumpets, is full of excitement, if the morose dialogue of the ugly couple on the steps of the cathedral, in the second act, be tedious beyond endurance. The Prelude was read and executed more finely, more impressively, than ever before in our hearing.

The symphonist was wholly a new name to us. The Bulletin, however, tells us that he is Court Kapellmeister in Dessau, which is his native place; that he has composed chamber music, two or three operas, three symphonies and an oratorio. This third Symphony in D was first brought out in the Leipzig Gewandhaus concerts. We hoped the more from it when we found that its score was not loaded with unusual instruments; not even with the modern complement of brass—that is, it has no trombones and only two horns. There was a chance, then, of finding quality not buried up in quantity; a chance of essential bonâ fide music speaking for itself.

And verily, it did prove to be a better symphony, more musical, more entertaining, more lit up with pleasing, bright ideas, less heavy, dull and tedious and depressing than nine out of ten of the new symphonies which have been invoked upon us (not always as blessings) in the last half-dozen years. The themes of the first movement (Allegro) are lively, interesting, fresh, somewhat original. The wood-wind quartet, which ushers in the second theme, keeps expectation alive and happy. That second theme, taken up (staccato) by the violins, has a march-like rhythm quite exhilarating; and the "working-up" section of the movement is musician-like and clever, albeit a little prolix. The slow movement (Largo) is serious and gloomy, rather more than sad. Yet it is not without charm and freshness. The third movement, at first Moderato, then quickening to Allegro, is not exactly minuet nor scherzo. It is gay and playful, with several pretty thoughts in it; in the second portion, after the proclamation of a single horn tone, it becomes virtually ballet music, and even more so in the Finale (Allegro moderato). It is not a great symphony—a light one on the whole, but genial, not far-fetched; sincerely we may say "tolerable and (not) to be endured." The instrumentation throughout was agreeable. The ruling spirit of the composer seemed to be more concerned with music than with mere effect.

The two movements from Reinecke's 'Cello Concerto were passably sweet and very dull. Not that Mr. Schulz did not do himself credit in the artistic rendering of them. His tone was richly musical, his intonation true, even in the overtones, his phrasing and expression all that could be desired. But the musical matter of performance seemed not worthy of the effort; respectable, elegant and graceful, to be sure, all in good form, presentable, but unrewarding. The cadenza in the second of the movements might or might not have been the work of Reinecke himself. It was not intolerably long, like the one which Reinecke introduced into a Concerto by Haydn, but it was [illegible] far-fetched in some of its phrases more cacophonous than we are wont to hear even in [illegible] and quite out of keeping with the [illegible] of the composition.

Another very modern [illegible] for better or for worse, [illegible] phonic prologue to [illegible] it is Shakspeare's "Othello," [illegible] (born at Hamburg in 1849, [illegible] 1868, teacher in Stern's Conservatory [illegible] in 1877; still lives at Hamburg); a Concerto in A minor, op. 17, by Paderewski (Russian presumably), for which Mrs. Julia Rive King will make her reappearance here after a number of years; a new suite for strings and four horns (in G minor, op. 8), by Arthur Whiting; and Liszt's "Rakoczy March." [illegible] et fortissimo etc.

[10

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 9, 1891.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert given at Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Prelude, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 3, in D major op. 37 ..... Klughardt
(First time in the United States.)
Two movements from concerto for violoncello, in D minor, op. 82 ..... Reinecke
(First time in Boston.)
Overture, "Egmont" ..... Beethoven

The symphony played was by a man comparatively unknown in this country, and the work was not the less welcome on that account. It is not a great symphony, and Klughardt is not a Mozart or a Beethoven, or even a Mendelssohn; but it is a good thing to hear modern compositions, that we may either desire a closer acquaintance with them or refuse our friendship. There are some excellent people who wish that only a few and world-approved names appear upon these programmes, and they reproachfully shake their heads when the symphony is not one of the nine, and the overture is not familiar. Music, however, is not confined to any one period or any one country. To thoroughly enjoy the best in music it is necessary to hear much; the ancient and the modern, the grave and the light. The programmes of our symphony concerts have too frequently shown an illiberal, if not a bigoted, spirit; and the catholicity lately displayed should be encouraged and not censured. Surely no one can accuse Moritz Hauptmann, the famous theorist, of looseness of musical morals. The old Cantor in Leipzig was the severest of the severe. Yet, shortly before his death, he wrote the following golden words concerning the narrowness and triteness of the Gewandhaus programmes:

"The 'Eroica,' 'Calm Sea and Happy Voyage,' the E flat major Concerto, these are all most excellent pieces, but entirely too familiar; one knows every note, every little note, beforehand. I should often like to hear something else as yet unknown, whether it be of the past or present. Not that I wish to turn my back upon loved and tried friends, but I desire the acquaintance of other people. Nor should highest peaks exist without valleys and hills. And it were also a good thing for the public not to be obliged to constantly hear familiar pieces, for people bury themselves in gloomy admiration without any attempt at discrimination; and anything new inconveniences them, for they do not know exactly what they ought to say. We do not need to hear all the Beethoven symphonies every winter; in truth that is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there will soon be no best. Each day can not be Sunday."

August Klughardt was born at Coethen in 1847 and is now kapellmeister at Dessau. In the course of his life he spent four years at Weimar, and his intercourse with Listz is said to have influenced his style. This influence, however, is not felt in the symphony played Saturday. He has written three operas; three symphonies, "The Forest," "Lenore" and the one in D; overtures, chamber music and songs. This symphony in D is neither a very original or remarkable composition, and only the first movement rises to symphonic dignity; still it is melodious and pleasing music, with fresh themes clearly expressed, and developments in which knowledge is gracefully displayed, not rudely thrust upon the attention. The first movement is by far the strongest; the themes are interesting and well contrasted; there are abundant evidences of technical skill, and the whole movement is, in fact, admirably written. The largo is vague; it makes no decided impression. But it soothes, and it is free from the odious "intellectuality" which nowadays so often passes for genuine musical thought. The scherzo runs over with melody, and its lightness is akin to triviality. The finale is made up of "rapid fiddling" and suggestions of the operetta. The symphony is scored discreetly and often ingeniously. The brass is reduced to two horns and the trumpets—a rare thing in modern compositions of this class—and the fortissimos are never blatant. Klughardt has not striven here to produce great effects, or paint in musical colors natural scenery, or express assorted emotions: he has contented himself with writing music, and he has even been guilty of inventing a tune or two.

Mr. Leo Schulz played two movements of Reinecke's concerto in D minor for the 'cello; he chose the first and second, and played them in inverted order. It is generally believed in Leipzig that Reinecke is a musician of rare parts. At his best, his music is only a faint echo of Mendelssohn's, and at his worst it is respectable and dull. He is said to be a man of great amiability. It is probable, then, that whenever he is inclined to moroseness, or, like John Ford, gets "deep in a dump," he vents his spleen by writing pieces for the 'cello. This concerto is a depressing thing, "tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious repetition of some jejune thought." Mr. Schulz displayed a small, pinched tone and considerable technical skill. His intonation was not faultless, especially in the dreary cadenza. While his phrasing was musician-like, his performance of the stern task was not free from hardness and angularity. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The playing of the orchestra in the Symphony was generally excellent, but there was much to be desired in the performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin." The quality of the tone was often coarse where it should have been most delicate, and the tone itself, in strings and wind, was at times impure. Yet such is the great beauty of the music that, as ever, it called forth genuine and long-continued applause. Nor was the "Egmont" overture so well played as upon former occasions. The rhythm and rhetorical accentuation were often slighted, and the overture was played in a perfunctory manner. It would have been well had Mr. Nikisch paid more attention to the work as a whole, and not given his undivided care solely to wrenching Beethoven's text in the nine measures just before the Allegro con brio for the sake of a cheap effect.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, March 14, is as follows: Symphonic Prologue to Shakspere's "Othello," by Arnold Krug; a concerto for piano and orchestra, by Paderewski (first time); a suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting (first time), and Liszt's Rakoczy March. The soloist is Mrs. Julia Rive King.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC NOTES.

The sixth and last of the Kneissel Quartette concerts will be given this evening at Union Hall. The quartette will be assisted by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The ensemble will play the "Kaiser" quartette in C [illegible] and selections from Cherubini and [illegible]. Mrs. Wyman will sing an [illegible] and songs by Dressel; and a [illegible] and violin by Mrs. [illegible] played by the composer and

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 9, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SATURDAY EVENING.

A Programme of Some Novelties, But the General Effect of Which Was Dulness—Mr. Leo Schulz, the 'Cello Player, the Soloist—Other Music Notes.

Although the concert of Saturday night contained novelties, it was by no means an exciting affair, and at times positive dulness seemed to reign. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was taken a little too deliberately and the phrases were too uniform, spite of the fortissimo of the final climaxes. The shading of the solo violins in the high passages in harmonics was commendable. These passages, by the way, are typical, for Wagner alone, of all the great masters, does not use the harp for celestial tone-coloring, but violins and woodwind in prolonged notes, in the highest positions. Schumann, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, in fact all the modern tone-colorists who have given celestial pictures, use the harp in them, purely because of the association of ideas which comes to us from the Scriptures, and this very association of the harp with heaven and the angels, only came about because the instrument was the most developed possessed by man at the time that the sacred book was written. Wagner's tone-coloring is intrinsically the more ecstatic, and one cannot but agree with the sarcasm of Theophile Gautier, that a "harp concert lasting 10,000 years must end by becoming tiresome." Wagner is the first who has broken through this harp conventionality.

Then came a new symphony by Klughardt. A German might sum up the work as "Klug und hart!" It is learned but cold, and leaves one entirely unmoved. There is much American music more worthy of performance in these concerts, and certainly either of Paine's symphonies is better than this work. It would be unjust to deny that the modest scoring is a step in the right direction, and that the symmetrical form of the first movement is not to be contemned. But in this first movement the themes are not attractive although melodic, and the last movement seems almost a light opera salad. One asks unconsciously the question of the old French critic — "What does this symphony want with me?" The melodic idea is not carried out in the manner of Haydn or Mozart, and the melody which begins the third movement is rather of a "Trompeter von Sakkingen" type than a true theme for sonata form. Later on this movement degenerates into a mere scene de ballet. There are bold modulations in the finale, and some ingenious turns of treatment, so that one is afraid to pass a resolute judgment on the work as a whole, but the impression left is, that while one obtains occasional glimpses of the lion's skin, one is not absolutely sure that there is a lion under it. The performance of the work was good. Reinecke's violoncella concerto in D minor followed, at least two movements of it, and these two were given in reversed order, I believe. This was unjust to the composer, and it was still more unjust to the soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz, to place these movements after the symphony. The allegro was the most characteristic movement, and it presented some touches of the Slavonic style in progressions of augmented seconds in its melody. The cadenza was far too long. Mr. Schulz played with refinement, generally pure intonation, and even in the most difficult skipping passages, in phrases where bowing and pizzicato were simultaneously employed, and in double-stopping, he was always secure; but his harmonics broke a couple of times and his tone was rather too light, although this wore away towards the end of the movement. One can, however, always praise the sympathetic style of this artist. He received two recalls.

The concert ended with the "Egmont Overture." The work seemed exaggerated in the reading, the pauses were pushed to a theatrical length, but the final passages were overwhelmingly successful, and freedom shrieked (without any falling Kosciusko) on the piccolo, in a manner that was stirring enough, and the concert ended at 9:30.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 9, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

Late comers at the Symphony Concert Saturday night missed a performance of the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," which was one of the finest bits of playing given by Mr. Nikisch's orchestra this season. Even the most confirmed anti-Wagnerite could not but be roused to enthusiasm by such a rendition. From the opening to the close of the prelude the ensemble was perfect. It was such work as can only be done by this orchestra, but which, we regret to say, is not always done. The organization was in excellent form all through the evening. Perhaps its members had received new inspiration from their recention in New York and the other cities which have been visited during the previous two weeks. With such playing no one would object if Wagner was represented on the programme every evening. New interest was given to this magnificent prelude, and the concert closed with a performance of Beethoven's matchless overture "Egmont," a hearing of which, it is said, inspired Wagner himself to devote himself to music. Here, as in the Wagner prelude, the orchestra brought out all the effects possible. Mr. Nikisch's readings were clear and conservative, and these two numbers were a delightful opening and close of an excellent programme. The author of the symphony proper, which was given as the second selection, was a new name to the Symphony auditors—August Klughardt, a German who is Hof-Kapellmeister at Dessau. The work given had its first performance at the Leipsic Gewundhaus, and as a composer his work is well known in Germany. It was an instructive and entertaining performance. The author has never sacrificed melody in its composition, the first and last movements are exceedingly bright—the development is easily followed at the same time showing rare musical gifts, and there are some beautiful passages in the largo. The introduction of such compositions as this will be gladly welcomed, and the audience followed each movement with pleasure. Leo Schulz was the soloist, giving two movements from Reinecke's concerto in D minor for the 'cello. Mr. Schulz has given evidence in solo playing, outside of the Symphony concerts, of his ability and musical instincts. The number is a selection in which the 'cello takes the lead throughout, and in the allegro calls for remarkable technique and no ordinary skill. Mr. Schulz met all the difficulties readily. His tone was clear and pure, and the hearty applause which he received was every bit deserved. Mr. Nikisch was given almost an ovation at the close of the Wagner prelude, and it was one of the most enjoyable programmes in its entirety that the director has prepared this season. For the next concert, Mrs. Julia Rive-King is to be the soloist, and she will play a concerto for piano and orchestra by the famous Paderenski. A suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting, will also receive its initial performance at that time.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concerts.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not of striking interest. It opened with the prelude to "Lohengrin," which has been better played in Music Hall than it was on this occasion. The tempo at which it was taken was somewhat slower than that to which we have been accustomed, and the music lost proportionately in its characteristic airy lightness, and there was much untunefulness in both the strings and the wind instruments. Next came a work new to Boston, Symphony No. 3, in D major, op. 37, by August Klughardt, a name unknown hitherto to our concert programmes. It is a bright and pleasing work, of no great depth, but remarkable, in this musical era of struggling after ugly originality, bizarre effects in harmony and rhythm, and newness at any cost, for its naivete, its simple melodiousness, and its adherence to a style that modern composers have abandoned as wholly old-fashioned. Even in the matter of orchestration, simplicity is the rule, and there are no ponderous effects. The score is without trombones and has only two horns. This in itself is a surprise, and one not utterly unwelcome. The symphony is not a masterpiece, by any means, but it has the merit of perfect clearness, is manifestly the work of a gifted musician who can produce something better than Kapellmeister music. The work is well made, tuneful, graceful in its harmonic treatment, skilful and clean in its orchestration, and showing excellent learning discreetly used. The opening movement is light, brilliant and interesting, curiously quaint now and then, especially in its second subject, clever in its free working out after the double bar, easy and natural in its flow and pleasing generally. The largo is less meritorious. Its meaning is not clear, and though it moves without effort and is charming in its instrumentation, it says nothing worth the saying. The next movement on the other hand, is delightful. It opens in the style of a vigorous minuet, and the quaintness noticed in the opening allegro, again appears with greater frequency and in a more marked manner. There are two trioe. The first is charming in its pretty grace and in its dainty orchestral effects; the second falls into the scherzo style, and is no less attractive. The finale opens with a thoroughly Haydnesque theme, but it soon abandons this, and, before the movement has progressed far, it lapses into sprightly commonplace, almost suggesting a comic opera medley. It is all fresh enough, gay enough, and ear-pleasing enough, but is lacking in that dignity which is imparted to even such playful finales by Haydn and Mozart. It is a genial work, and we would rather hear it than some of the profounder symphonies by modern composers that have found a place on these programmes; but there are many better symphonies by Haydn and by Mozart that have not been played by the Symphony Orchestra, and which are more entitled to a hearing. The work was finely played and made a pleasing impression, although it excited no very marked enthusiasm. It was too clear, too easily understood, too free from noise and bombast to excite much respect in a symphony concert audience, which, as a rule, palpitates more readily to the incomprehensible. Then came the slow movement and finale from a concerto in D minor for violoncello, by Reinecke. This music was also new to Boston. It is Kapellmeister music of the most pronounced kind; highly proper and eminently respectable music; even prudish music, that would scorn to be caught in anything remotely suggesting impropriety, and wholly uninteresting, in addition. It maunders along in a faultless manner, and is—well, pure Reinecke, and nothing else. It was played by Mr. Leo Schultz, with much refinement of taste and excellent technical skill, but in a colorless style. His tone was thin and cloudy and his performance throughout was depressing in its lack of energy. His task, however, was not a very inspiriting one, and as we have heard him to much better advantage, we are inclined to lay the general ineffectiveness of his performance to the music he played. He was, however, heartily, perhaps sympathetically applauded, and was twice recalled. The concert ended with a spirited performance of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, the one masterpiece the programme presented. At the next concert will be given: Symphonic Prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello," by Arnold Krug, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Paderewski (first time), a suite for strings and four horns, by Arthur Whiting (first time), and Liszt's Rakoczy March. The soloist is Mrs. Julia Rive King.

— The Symphony Orchestra is no longer synonymous with musical propriety! It has gone in for the ordinary concert custom of "taking encores." More's the pity!

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eighteenth concert of the season, Saturday evening, offered four selections:

Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt—Op. 37, Symphony in D, No. 3.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke—Op. 82. Romance and Allegretto moderato from Concerto in D minor for Violoncello.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven—Overture to "Egmont."
Soloist: Mr. Leo Schulz.

Not a very interesting programme, although the short Beethoven Overture, with so much beauty, fire and passion condensed in it, went far to redeem the rest. That, after all, was the newest feature of a programme mainly new. That is one of the things that never can grow old. Does the sky above, all sown with stars and planets, do the gorgeous or the softest sunsets, ever become old and tiresome? No more does a real masterwork of musical genius, like that "Egmont" overture—at least, not when rendered so superbly as it was on Saturday evening. Mr. Nikisch was at his best in conducting the performance, and the orchestra were with him in spirit and intention. When Shakspeare is most intensely tragic, as in Othello, Lear or Hamlet, he is still supremely beautiful; the sense of beauty, the hopeful view of life, the faith in overruling, all-prevailing good, has not forsaken you when the play is over. That is one of the criteria of greatness, of essential genius in poetry and art. That criterion Beethoven can stand in this and in his Coriolanus Overture, the two most graphic ones which he composed, both on the darkest background, in the lowest tone of color.

Wagner's Vorspiel to "Lohengrin," on the contrary, moves or serenely floats in the higher realms of tone, suggesting supernatural, ethereal light. It is one of the short list of Wagnerian pieces which are really well adapted to concert performance. There is a certain mystic charm about it, which Wagner mystifies still more in his literary explanation of it cited in the Bulletin. You are supposed to see the swan-drawn-boat approaching, bearing the Knight of the Holy Grail, attended, it may be, by clouds of angel forms and faces. The picture as it were is breathed across the stage, the watery scene. Starting with the highest violin and flute tones, just visible as a point of light in the distance, the harmony grows fuller, broader, deeper, louder, as the mysterious phenomenon approaches, reaches a pitch of grand fortissimo when it seems to touch the shore, and then recedes, diminishes again and vanishes afar, foreshadowing the conclusion of the drama. There is certainly much beautv in this gradually growing and again fading scenic tone-picture. The instrumental coloring is richly, delicately blended. It is a very ingenious, perhaps we may say poetic, study of instrumentation for a special purpose. Unusual instruments, bass-clarinet, corno di bassetto, etc., are liberally introduced. All flows smoothly, well-proportioned. The mystical, romantic element is felt. It differs again from the Beethoven overtures with which we were contrasting it in the want of action, of dramatic force and progress. It depicts a dream, not life. Without a struggle, without effort, the vision comes and fades away. There is no human passion in it, nothing real to take hold of. Yet the opera, or music-drama, "Lohengrin," which follows, has not a little life and passion; it has progress and excitement, independently of Swan or Grail. It has contrasted characters, stirring ensembles, knights and heralds who make thrilling appeals with their trumpets. The wedding scene is gorgeous; the gathering of the clans, so to speak, in the last act, each headed by its choir of trumpets, is full of excitement, if the morose dialogue of the ugly couple on the steps of the cathedral, in the second act, be tedious beyond endurance. The Prelude was read and executed more finely, more impressively, than ever before in our hearing.

The symphonist was wholly a new name to us. The Bulletin, however, tells us that he is Court Kapellmeister in Dessau, which is his native place; that he has composed chamber music, two or three operas, three symphonies and an oratorio. This third Symphony in D was first brought out in the Leipzig Gewandhaus concerts. We hoped the more from it when we found that its score was not loaded with unusual instruments; not even with the modern complement of brass—that is, it has no trombones and only two horns. There was a chance, then, of finding quality not buried up in quantity; a chance of essential bonâ fide music speaking for itself.

And verily, it did prove to be a better symphony, more musical, more entertaining, more lit up with pleasing, bright ideas, less heavy, dull and tedious and depressing than nine out of ten of the new symphonies which have been invoked upon us (not always as blessings) in the last half-dozen years. The themes of the first movement (Allegro) are lively, interesting, fresh, somewhat original. The wood-wind quartet, which ushers in the second theme, keeps expectation alive and happy. That second theme, taken up (staccato) by the violins, has a march-like rhythm quite exhilarating; and the "working-up" section of the movement is musician-like and clever, albeit a little prolix. The slow movement (Largo) is serious and gloomy, rather more than sad. Yet it is not without charm and freshness. The third movement, at first Moderato, then quickening to Allegro, is not exactly minuet nor scherzo. It is gay and playful, with several pretty thoughts in it; in the second portion, after the proclamation of a single horn tone, it becomes virtually ballet music, and even more so in the Finale (Allegro moderato). It is not a great symphony—a light one on the whole, but genial, not far-fetched; sincerely we may say "tolerable and (not) to be endured." The instrumentation throughout was agreeable. The ruling spirit of the composer seemed to be more concerned with music than with mere effect.

The two movements from Reinecke's 'Cello Concerto were passably sweet and very dull. Not that Mr. Schulz did not do himself credit in the artistic rendering of them. His tone was richly musical, his intonation true, even in the overtones, his phrasing and expression all that could be desired. But the musical matter of performance seemed not worthy of the effort; respectable, elegant and graceful, to be sure, all in good form, presentable, but unrewarding. The cadenza in the second of the movements might or might not have been the work of Reinecke himself. It was not intolerably long, like the one which Reinecke introduced into a Concerto by Haydn, but it was outré, far-fetched in some of its phrases more cacophonous than we are wont to hear from owls or frogs, and added neither to the meaning nor the beauty of the composition.

Another very modern programme invites us, for better or for worse, next Saturday: a symphonic prologue to Shakspeare's (take notice it is Shakspeare's) "Othello," by Arnold Krug (born at Hamburg in 1849, pupil at Leipzig in 1868, teacher in Stern's Conservatory in Berlin in 1877; still lives at Hamburg); a piano concerto in A minor, op. 17, by Paderewski (Russian presumably), for which Mrs. Julia Rive-King will make her reappearance here after a number of years; a new suite for strings and four horns (in G minor, op. 8), by Arthur Whiting; and Liszt's "Rakoczy March." "Quod bonum et faustum sit," etc.

J. S. D.

[10

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. WALTER C. WYMAN,
Mrs. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 9TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HELEN HOPEKIRK. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN. E minor. (MS.)
Andante; Allegro con vivo.—Andante pastorale.—Presto.
(First time.)
MRS. HOPEKIRK and MR. KNEISEL.

DELIBES. ARIOSO.
MRS. WYMAN.

a) TSCHAIKOWSKY. ANDANTE from QUARTET in D major.

b) CHERUBINI. SCHERZO from QUARTET in E flat major.
KNEISEL QUARTET.

OTTO DRESEL. SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) MIT TAUSEND SCHOENSTEN MYRTHEN UND VERGISSMEINNICHT. (MS.)
b) THE VIOLET'S GRAVE. (MS.)
c) ES HAT DIE WARME FRUEHLINGSNACHT. (MS.)
d) SWEET AND LOW.
(By request.)
MRS. WYMAN.

HAYDN. KAISER QUARTET in C major, No. 17.
Allegro.—Poco adagio cantabile.—Minuetto.—Finale, presto.
KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The closing concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette took place last evening in Union Hall before a large audience. The patrons of this organization have been exceedingly numerous all the season, and it is creditable to Boston musical people that the efforts of this quartette, which is probably not excelled in the performance of chamber music in this country, have been so well appreciated. It has given some of the best chamber music to be found—it has introduced many novelties, including works by our own Boston composers, and it has had the assistance in its various appearances of the best solo artists to be obtained.

The novelties of last evening were a sonata for piano and violin by Mme. Helen Hopekirk and some manuscript songs by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Wyman. The sonata of Mme. Hopekirk was given by the composer herself at the piano and Mr. Kneisel as violinist, and it was given before a Boston audience for the first time. She was well received, and the production was very much to be commended. Particularly pleasing was the second movement, and while not specially given to display of either instrument in the work, the piano is given considerable importance, and calls for an admirable command of that instrument.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Wyman. Her first selection was the arioso of Delibes, and later were given four songs by Dresel, the latter being "Sweet and Low," a composition which obtained the prize for the best setting of Tennyson's poem when Mr. Dresel first came to Boston. Mrs. Wyman gave these songs—all of them—in English, and to the pleasure of the audience, though it was apparent that the "Sweet and Low" gave the greatest enjoyment, and it was the most commendable composition. It is always a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman. Her singing is so artistic and tuneful; there is so little striving for effect, and she is so apparently devoted to her art. To our mind her renditions were hardly up to the standard, either in singing or the selections themselves, of her appearance in Music Hall with the Symphony Orchestra, but an artist cannot always be in best form. The quartette gave as its numbers the Andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, a Scherzo from Cherubini and the Kaiser Quartette of Father Haydn. None of these were novelties, but the superb ensemble of this quartette made them seem like a new creation. Particularly beautiful was the delivery of the Tschaikowsky number.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX., No. 69.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and closing concert by the Kneisel quartet in its course in the Union Hall was given last evening, and was, perhaps, the most notable of the series, the quartet having the assistance of Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. The programme was as follows:

Helen Hopekirk—Sonata for piano and violin. E minor. (MS.) (First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.
Delibes—Arioso.
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Tschaikowsky—Andante from quartet in D major.
(b) Cherubini—Scherzo from quartet in E flat major.
Kneisel Quartet.
Otto Dresel—Songs with piano. (a) "Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen und Vergissmeinnicht." (MS.) (b) "The Violet's Grave." (MS.) (c) "Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht." (MS.) (d) "Sweet and Low." (By request.)
Mrs Wyman.
Haydn—Kaiser Quartet in C major, No. 77.
Kneisel Quartet.

As will be seen, the number in which Mme. Hopekirk took part was one of her own compositions. Mme. Hopekirk for several years has held a foremost position as a pianist, but has not heretofore shown her ability as a composer to any marked degree. The sonata of last evening, however, must entitle her to high rank. It was given in a finished style by herself and Mr. Kneisel, and every movement called forth applause. The composition, it is stated, was written during a summer outing in Halstatt, Austria, and is the most important result of Mme. Hopekirk's two years study with Nawratel, a Viennese teacher.

While it was a rare treat to hear Mme. Hopekirk interpret her own musical ideas, nothing could be sweeter or more charming than the group of songs delightfully rendered by Mrs. Wyman, and the audience showed its pleasure by calling her back again and again.

The three works by the quartet were performed in their usually excellent manner, and completed a varied and interesting programme.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

18th Symphony Concert. Symphony by Klughardt.

Mr. Leo Schultz, Soloist, in Reinecke's Concerto for Violoncello.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was:

Wagner.....Prelude, "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 37.
Allegro.
Largo.
Moderato; Allegro.
Allegro.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke, Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance.
Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont."

The new symphony is interesting. Klughardt dispenses with the full modern orchestra, scoring his work without trombones, and in the slow movement without trumpets. He is a good scholar, and his knowledge of counterpoint expressed in the first and concluding movements is excellent; but nowhere is he pedantic or obscure. He writes with an ever prominent melody, and while his themes may not all have the true symphonic character, and the finale is lacking somewhat in dignity, nevertheless Klughardt has produced a symphony of a good deal of value; it is not great but it is musically sympathetic enough not to be classed with "Kappelmeister" music. Clearness of diction, knowledge of the limitations of the different instrumental groups, a nice sense of color and considerable fancy are its dominating qualities. The first movement is most regular in form, even to the old-fashioned adherence to the repeat. The themes lend themselves readily to treatment, the development section, cut somewhat in the performance, containing many an imaginative touch. The promise held out at the opening of the slow movement, is not wholly answered, although this section is interesting, by reason of the composer's invention. The third movement begins in the manner of a minuet; two trios follow, and then the minuet mood is reproduced; a real scherzo follows, built on what has preceded. The finale is full of variety, both of idea and instrumentation. In Klughardt's symphony is an ever-present spontaneity; it was an agreeable task for him to write it, and it is no task at all for cultivated people to like it. It was cordially received, and its performance was very good. Klughardt is a native of Dessau, Germany, where he now lives and works.

The other novelty at this concert was by that excellent musical jurist, Carl Reinecke of Leipzig. Mr. Schultz played the second and the first movements of the concerto in the order named, which in point of technique are irreproachably made, but are lacking in vitality. The themes of the work are Slavonic—how remindful is the first subject of the allegro of a song by Taubert. It is a concerto for solo instrument, with accompaniment of orchestra, the model being Mozart and the early Beethoven. Mr. Schultz is an earnest and conscientious player, well schooled and possessed of a good technique. His tone is not as deep and vibrant as that of some of our resident violoncello players, but he is a master of style. The somewhat chilly cadenza introduced into the allegro was probably the composition of Mr. Schultz. The player was rewarded with two recalls at the close of the performance. Mr. Schultz is an enterprising artist; he has played at two Symphony concerts and produced three novelties.

Both the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Egmont" overture were read with a beautiful appreciation of their poetic and dramatic significance. The concert as a whole was delightful. The next programme is: Arnold Krug, Symphonic Prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski, Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17, (first time in the United States); Arthur Whiting, Suite for strings and four horns in G minor, op. 8, (first performance); Liszt, Rakoczy March. Soloist, Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Original Composition by Mme. Hopekirk Has Its First Hearing.

Despite the inclemency of the weather a large and enthusiastic audience was present to listen to the last concert of the season by the Kneisel quartet, in Union Hall, last evening.

The opening number, a new sonata by Mme. Hopekirk, was finely performed by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kniesel, and was given good recognition by the audience. Mrs. Wyman next sang the "Arioso," by Delibes, in a delightful manner. She also sang four songs by Otto Dresel, three of them in manuscript. The fourth was the famous setting of Tennyson's "Sweet and Low." Mrs. Wyman's singing of this last was faultless, and the audience showed its approval in three enthusiastic recalls.

The work of the quartet was excellent, especially in the andante in D major, by Tschaikowskij, which was played with a grace that was charming. The "Scherzo" by Cherubini, and the "Kaiser Quartet," by Handel, were well rendered. Mr. Arthur Foote was the accompanist of the evening.

[illegible]

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The sixth and last of the Kneisel Quartette concerts was given last evening at Union Hall. The quartette was assisted by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme was as follows:

Sonata for piano and violin (MS.).....Helen Hopekirk
(First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.
Arioso.....Delibes
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Andante from quartette, D major..Tschaikowsky
(b) Scherzo from quartette, E-flat major...Cherubini
(a) Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen (MS.)..
(b) The Violet's Grave.....
(c) Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht (MS.)
(d) Sweet and Low.....
(BY REQUEST.)
Mrs. Wyman.
Kaiser Quartette, C major, No. 77.....Haydn

The woman has until late years been of influence in music through charm of voice and witchery of finger-play; not through original musical thought expressed in writing. The passions excited by her have moved men to frame immortal melodies; but few women have poured out their longings and raptures in music of their own invention. So that it has been claimed, and with reason, that the only influence that woman has exerted in this branch of art has been subtle or borrowed. Still we find names of women in the catalogue of composers of this century, names worthy of attention. There is Louise Bertini, the friend of Berlioz, who wrote four operas. There is Jeanne Farrene, whose music has been praised by Schumann and Joachim, and a symphony and overture by her have been played at the concerts of the Paris Conservatory. The Countess of Grandval, who is now living, has written six operas, two masses, a setting of the Stabat Mater which is devout and impressive, besides pieces for orchestra and lighter works. There is Augusta Holmes, a remarkable character; Miss Chaminade, whose orchestral suite has lately been played in Paris with genuine success. There are English women whose claims are serious and to be treated with respect.

And now comes Mrs. Hopekirk with a sonata for violin and pianoforte, played for the first time last evening. It is in three movements. The first is more conspicuous for its well-contrasted themes than for any skill shown in the developments where her invention flags. The themes are repeated over and over again, with slight variations, until they lose their freshness. The second movement, an andante pastorale of Scotch character, is pretty and the most pleasing part of the work. The last movement, a presto, is commonplace. The sonata as a whole shows more taste in the shaping of melody than in counterpoint. There are crude passages and awkward modulations, but at the same time many measures are smoothly written and are effective. Mrs. Hopekirk was apparently so much interested in the pianoforte part that she forgot the proper balance which should be preserved in ensemble playing, and at times the violin, finely played by Mr. Kneisel, suffered. She was recalled after the finale.

The almost absolute perfection which the members of the justly famous quartette have reached was observed in the delightful excerpts from Cherubini and Tschaikowsky and the familiar quartette of Haydn. The andante of the Russian is always heard with pleasure, and its serenade-like air, so full of pleasing melancholy, was played with deep feeling by Mr. Kneisel. The Cherubini quartette, one movement of which was played last evening, was a favorite number of the celebrated Florentine Quartette, and the scherzo seems like an anticipation of Mendelssohn.

Mrs. Wyman displayed the beauties of her voice and the cunning of her art in an interesting song by Delibes and four songs in manuscript written by the late Otto Dresel. She was most heartily and deservedly applauded.

All lovers of music regret that this series of concerts is now a thing of the past. The programmes have been catholic, and the performance of them was most admirable. The new works brought out during the sixth season were Mr. Foote's pianoforte quartette in C; Mr. Whiting's sonata for pianoforte and violin in G, and Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E. PHILIP HALE.

---

[110]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

SIXTH SEASON 1890-91.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin,
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin,
Mr. LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola,
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello,

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. WALTER C. WYMAN,
Mrs. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

VI. CONCERT.

MONDAY, MARCH 9TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HELEN HOPEKIRK. SONATA FOR PIANO AND VIOLIN. E minor. (MS.)
Andante; Allegro con vivo.—Andante pastorale.—Presto.
(First time.)
MRS. HOPEKIRK and MR. KNEISEL.

DELIBES. ARIOSO.
MRS. WYMAN.

a) TSCHAIKOWSKY. ANDANTE from QUARTET in D major.

b) CHERUBINI. SCHERZO from QUARTET in E flat major.
KNEISEL QUARTET.

OTTO DRESEL. SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) MIT TAUSEND SCHOENSTEN MYRTHEN UND VERGISSMEINNICHT. (MS.)
b) THE VIOLET'S GRAVE. (MS.)
c) ES HAT DIE WARME FRUEHLINGSNACHT. (MS.)
d) SWEET AND LOW.
(By request.)
MRS. WYMAN.

HAYDN. KAISER QUARTET in C major, No. 77.
Allegro.—Poco adagio cantabile.—Minuetto —
Finale, presto.
KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The closing concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette took place last evening in Union Hall before a large audience. The patrons of this organization have been exceedingly numerous all the season, and it is creditable to Boston musical people that the efforts of this quartette, which is probably not excelled in the performance of chamber music in this country, have been so well appreciated. It has given some of the best chamber music to be found—it has introduced many novelties, including works by our own Boston composers, and it has had the assistance in its various appearances of the best solo artists to be obtained.

The novelties of last evening were a sonata for piano and violin by Mme. Helen Hopekirk and some manuscript songs by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Wyman. The sonata of Mme. Hopekirk was given by the composer herself at the piano and Mr. Kneisel as violinist, and it was given before a Boston audience for the first time. She was well received, and the production was very much to be commended. Particularly pleasing was the second movement, and while not specially given to display of either instrument in the work, the piano is given considerable importance, and calls for an admirable command of that instrument.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Wyman. Her first selection was the arioso of Delibes, and later were given four songs by Dresel, the latter being "Sweet and Low," a composition which obtained the prize for the best setting of Tennyson's poem when Mr. Dresel first came to Boston. Mrs. Wyman gave these songs—all of them—in English, and to the pleasure of the audience, though it was apparent that the "Sweet and Low" gave the greatest enjoyment, and it was the most commendable composition. It is always a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman. Her singing is so artistic and tuneful; there is so little striving for effect, and she is so apparently devoted to her art. To our mind her renditions were hardly up to the standard, either in singing or the selections themselves, of her appearance in Music Hall with the Symphony Orchestra, but an artist cannot always be in best form. The quartette gave as its numbers the Andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, a Scherzo from Cherubini and the Kaiser Quartette of Father Haydn. None of these were novelties, but the superb ensemble of this quartette made them seem like a new creation. Particularly beautiful was the delivery of the Tschaikowsky number.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX., No. 69.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and closing concert by the Kneisel quartet in its course in the Union Hall was given last evening, and was, perhaps, the most notable of the series, the quartet having the assistance of Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. The programme was as follows:

Helen Hopekirk—Sonata for piano and violin. E minor. (MS.) (First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.
Delibes—Arioso.
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Tschaikowsky—Andante from quartet in D major.
(b) Cherubini—Scherzo from quartet in E flat major.
Kneisel Quartet.
Otto Dresel—Songs with piano. (a) "Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen und Vergissmeinnicht." (MS.) (b) "The Violet's Grave." (MS.) (c) "Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht." (MS.) (d) "Sweet and Low." (By request.)
Mrs Wyman.
Haydn—Kaiser Quartet in C major, No. 77.
Kneisel Quartet.

As will be seen, the number in which Mme. Hopekirk took part was one of her own compositions. Mme. Hopekirk for several years has held a foremost position as a pianist, but has not heretofore shown her ability as a composer to any marked degree. The sonata of last evening, however, must entitle her to high rank. It was given in a finished style by herself and Mr. Kneisel, and every movement called forth applause. The composition, it is stated, was written during a summer outing in Halstatt, Austria, and is the most important result of Mme. Hopekirk's two years study with Nawratel, a Viennese teacher.

While it was a rare treat to hear Mme. Hopekirk interpret her own musical ideas, nothing could be sweeter or more charming than the group of songs delightfully rendered by Mrs. Wyman, and the audience showed its pleasure by calling her back again and again.

The three works by the quartet were performed in their usually excellent manner, and completed a varied and interesting programme.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

18th Symphony Concert. Symphony by Klughardt.

Mr. Leo Schultz, Soloist, in Reinecke's Concerto for Violoncello.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was:

Wagner.....Prelude, "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 37.
Allegro.
Largo.
Moderato; Allegro.
Allegro.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke, Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance.
Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont."

The new symphony is interesting. Klughardt dispenses with the full modern orchestra, scoring his work without trombones, and in the slow movement without trumpets. He is a good scholar, and his knowledge of counterpoint expressed in the first and concluding movements is excellent; but nowhere is he pedantic or obscure. He writes with an ever prominent melody, and while his themes may not all have the true symphonic character, and the finale is lacking somewhat in dignity, nevertheless Klughardt has produced a symphony of a good deal of value; it is not great but it is musically sympathetic enough not to be classed with "Kappelmeister" music. Clearness of diction, knowledge of the limitations of the different instrumental groups, a nice sense of color and considerable fancy are its dominating qualities. The first movement is most regular in form, even to the old-fashioned adherence to the repeat. The themes lend themselves readily to treatment, the development section, cut somewhat in the performance, containing many an imaginative touch. The promise held out at the opening of the slow movement, is not wholly answered, although this section is interesting, by reason of the composer's invention. The third movement begins in the manner of a minuet; two trios follow, and then the minuet mood is reproduced; a real scherzo follows, built on what has preceded. The finale is full of variety, both of idea and instrumentation. In Klughardt's symphony is an ever-present spontaneity; it was an agreeable task for him to write it, and it is no task at all for cultivated people to like it. It was cordially received, and its performance was very good. Klughardt is a native of Dessau, Germany, where he now lives and works.

The other novelty at this concert was by that excellent musical jurist, Carl Reinecke of Leipzig. Mr. Schultz played the second and the first movements of the concerto in the order named, which in point of technique are irreproachably made, but are lacking in vitality. The themes of the work are Slavonic—how remindful is the first subject of the allegro of a song by Taubert. It is a concerto for solo instrument, with accompaniment of orchestra, the model being Mozart and the early Beethoven. Mr. Schultz is an earnest and conscientious player, well schooled and possessed of a good technique. His tone is not as deep and vibrant as that of some of our resident violoncello players, but he is a master of style. The somewhat chilly cadenza introduced into the allegro was probably the composition of Mr. Schultz. The player was rewarded with two recalls at the close of the performance. Mr. Schultz is an enterprising artist; he has played at two Symphony concerts and produced three novelties.

Both the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Egmont" overture were read with a beautiful appreciation of their poetic and dramatic significance. The concert as a whole was delightful. The next programme is: Arnold Krug, Symphonic Prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski, Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17, (first time in the United States); Arthur Whiting, Suite for strings and four horns in G minor, op. 8, (first performance); Liszt, Rakoczy March. Soloist, Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Original Composition by Mme. Hopekirk Has Its First Hearing.

Despite the inclemency of the weather a large and enthusiastic audience was present to listen to the last concert of the season by the Kneisel quartet, in Union Hall, last evening.

The opening number, a new sonata by Mme. Hopekirk, was finely performed by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kniesel, and was given good recognition by the audience. Mrs. Wyman next sang the "Arioso," by Delibes, in a delightful manner. She also sang four songs by Otto Dresel, three of them in manuscript. The fourth was the famous setting of Tennyson's "Sweet and Low." Mrs. Wyman's singing of this last was faultless, and the audience showed its approval in three enthusiastic recalls.

The work of the quartet was excellent, especially in the andante in D major, by Tschaikowskij, which was played with a grace that was charming. The "Scherzo" by Cherubini, and the "Kaiser Quartet," by Handel, were well rendered. Mr. Arthur Foote was the accompanist of the evening.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The sixth and last of the Kneisel Quartette concerts was given last evening at Union Hall. The quartette was assisted by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk. The programme was as follows:

Sonata for piano and violin (MS.).....Helen Hopekirk
(First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.
Arioso.....Delibes
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Andante from quartette, D major..Tschaikowsky
(b) Scherzo from quartette, E-flat major...Cherubini
(a) Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen (MS.)..
(b) The Violet's Grave.....
(c) Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht (MS.) } Dresel
(d) Sweet and Low.....
(BY REQUEST.)
Mrs. Wyman.
Kaiser Quartette, C major, No. 77.....Haydn

The woman has until late years been of influence in music through charm of voice and witchery of finger-play; not through original musical thought expressed in writing. The passions excited by her have moved men to frame immortal melodies; but few women have poured out their longings and raptures in music of their own invention. So that it has been claimed, and with reason, that the only influence that woman has exerted in this branch of art has been subtle or borrowed. Still we find names of women in the catalogue of composers of this century, names worthy of attention. There is Louise Bertini, the friend of Berlioz, who wrote four operas. There is Jeanne Farrenc, whose music has been praised by Schumann and Joachim, and a symphony and overture by her have been played at the concerts of the Paris Conservatory. The Countess of Grandval, who is now living, has written six operas, two masses, a setting of the Stabat Mater which is devout and impressive, besides pieces for orchestra and lighter works. There is Augusta Holmes, a remarkable character; Miss Chaminade, whose orchestral suite has lately been played in Paris with genuine success. There are English women whose claims ares erious and to be treated with respect.

And now comes Mrs. Hopekirk with a sonata for violin and pianoforte, played for the first time last evening. It is in three movements. The first is more conspicuous for its well-contrasted themes than for any skill shown in the developments where her invention flags. The themes are repeated over and over again, with slight variations, until they lose their freshness. The second movement, an andante pastorale of Scotch character, is pretty and the most pleasing part of the work. The last movement, a presto, is commonplace. The sonata as a whole shows more taste in the shaping of melody than in counterpoint. There are crude passages and awkward modulations, but at the same time many measures are smoothly written and are effective. Mrs. Hopekirk was apparently so much interested in the pianoforte part that she forgot the proper balance which should be preserved in ensemble playing, and at times the violin, finely played by Mr. Kneisel, suffered. She was recalled after the finale.

The almost absolute perfection which the members of the justly famous quartette have reached was observed in the delightful excerpts from Cherubini and Tschaikowsky and the familiar quartette of Haydn. The andante of the Russian is always heard with pleasure, and its serenade-like air, so full of pleasing melancholy, was played with deep feeling by Mr. Kneisel. The Cherubini quartette, one movement of which was played last evening, was a favorite number of the celebrated Florentine Quartette, and the scherzo seems like an anticipation of Mendelssohn.

Mrs. Wyman displayed the beauties of her voice and the cunning of her art in an interesting song by Delibes and four songs in manuscript written by the late Otto Dresel. She was most heartily and deservedly applauded.

All lovers of music regret that this series of concerts is now a thing of the past. The programmes have been catholic, and the performance of them was most admirable. The new works brought out during the sixth season were Mr. Foote's pianoforte quartette in C; Mr. Whiting's sonata for pianoforte and violin in G, and Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata for pianoforte and violin in E. PHILIP HALE.

---

[110]

Mme. Helen Hopekirk, heretofore unknown as a composer, save of some fugitive pieces for piano, and for voice, is of Scotch family. Her first public appearance as pianist was made quite early in life. Since her return from studying at Leipzig, Mme. Hopekirk has been almost continually before the public of two continents; her first visit to the United States occurring during the season of 1885-86. After a protracted period of living in Vienna, Mme. Hopekirk returns this season for a second look at America.

The sonata, which was written during a summer outing in Halstatt, Austria, is the most important result of Mme. Hopekirk's two years study with Nawratel, a much respected teacher of composition, who lives in Vienna, and was taught by Nottebohm, the Beethoven literateur.

The sonata opens with a short introduction, andante, in E minor, which leads to the first movement, the first theme of which is given out ff by the piano, taken up four bars later by the violin and further developed. A connecting passage in B major leads to a repetition of the theme somewhat later, ff, for violin and piano, which is worked out in double counterpoint. This leads to a sudsidiary passage in E minor in which the two instruments work in imitation. After many modulatious, the second theme enters in G major, the melody being given to the violin with a contrapuntal accompaniment for piano. After eight bars this order is reversed, the piano taking the melody, and the counterpoint reversed for the violin. Through many keys and in different figures this is developed, till the closing subsidiary passage of the first section of the movment enters in G major, and in that key closes a short reminiscence of the introduction leading to the second section. The first theme is selected for the working out, which begins in A minor and travels through many keys, a short canon being introduced in the middle. After this a new episode enters and is worked out between the two instruments, till the repetition of the first subject in the original key of E minor; the movement ending by means of a coda in E major.

The andante pastorale is also written in sonata form, with a very short working out section. The first theme, in B major, enters for piano, in 3-4 time, and eight bars later is taken by the violin. An episode of a rippling character for the violin in semi-quavers, with a quiet background of chords on the piano, leads to a second theme in F sharp major, and the first section ends in that key. Twelve bars suffices for the working out part, for which the first theme is used imitatively, and then is repeated the first theme in B major,—the second theme in B. A short coda finishes the movement.

The presto is written in rondo form, and is in 2-4 time; violin and piano beginning simultaneously. The principal theme in E minor being first given to the piano, and on repetition later, to the violin. The second theme is in B major, and has something Northern in character. In the middle of the movement an episode occurs in C major—like a far off echo of the first motif of the second movement of the sonata. Towards the end of this episode a crescendo enters and increases gradually to the entrance of the first theme again ff. The rest of the movement is worked out in the usual way, and towards the end a fugato suddenly enters piano, and leads to a coda maestoso, in which the first motif of the first movement enters in E major, and with that the work is brought to a close.

The andante from Tschaikowsky's D major quartet is a favorite selection with quartet players. It shows the rough Russian less characteristically than the symphonies, the overtures and the piano concerto with which Boston audiences are more familiar, being less national in spirit.

Cherubini's first string quartet, the one from which the scherzo played today is taken, was found dust ridden on a shelf years after it was written. It is an interesting fact that at the time Cherubini composed it, 1811, he had never seen a quartet score of either Mozart or Beethoven. The scherzo suggested to one writer that Mendelssohn was not the first to discover fairies in music.

When sending for publication in a New York paper Robert Franz's tribute to to his friend Otto Dresel, Mr. S. B. Schlesinger added the following: Coming to America thirty odd years ago, Otto Dresel soon won for himself many friends in Boston and elsewhere, who have remained his friends for life. Like the Abolitionists, who believed slavery an evil, and, working for its abolishment, never swerved from that purpose, so Otto Dresel believed Bach and Handel the greatest masters in music, and he labored untiringly to make their productions known. If he was not more tolerant he was at least true to his convictions. Of his own productions he thought very little. He never was satisfied with them, and on that ground endeavored to suppress his own compositions, which were always classic and good, instead of leaving them alone and adding others to them. Shortly after his arrival in Boston a prize of $200 (a good deal of money at that time) was offered for the best song, if I remember rightly, by the publishing firm of Richardson. Dresel, rather reluctantly (because he never expected to get the prize), sent in his charming setting of Tennyson's "Sweet and Low." The judges awarded the prize to him, and he was most agreeably astonished. For years Otto Dresel conducted clubs in Boston for the performance of Bach and other good music. His arrangement for four hands of Beethoven's symphonies are, I believe, considered the best that have ever been published. I was told that at the Royal Academy of music at London his arrangements of Handel's arias were extensively used and much admired. In his private capacity he was the staunchest and best friend and companion, and many a poor artist has been educated and aided by him.

The quartet in C is among the most graceful and ingenious of Haydn's contributions to chamber music. Its popularity has been in a great measure owing to the variations on the Austrian National Hymn (second movement—poco adagio cantabile. It will be observed that in the four variations the theme is given in turn to the second violin, violoncello, viola and first violin.

SUMMARY OF WORKS PERFORMED, SIXTH SEASON, 1890-1891.

BEETHOVEN.	STRING QUARTET, E flat major, op. 74.
	STRING QUARTET, C sharp minor, op. 131.
	STRING QUINTET C, major, op. 29.
BOCCHERINI.	MINUET for STRINGS, A major, No. 2.
BRAHMS.	PIANO QUARTET, G minor, op. 25.
CHERUBINI.	SCHERZO from STRING QUARTET, E flat major.
FOOTE.	PIANO QUARTET, C major, op. 23 (new)
HAYDN.	STRING QUARTET, C major. (Kaiser.)
HOPEKIRK.	SONATA for PIANO and VIOLIN, E major. (new.)
MOZART.	STRING QUARTET, D minor. (K 451.)
RUBINSTEIN.	SONATA for PIANO and CELLO, D major, op. 18.
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	ANDANTE from STRING QUARTET, D major.
SCHUBERT.	PIANO TRIO, B flat, op. 99.
	FANTASIE for PIANO and VIOLIN, C minor.
	QUARTET-SATZ, C minor.
SCHUMANN.	STRING QUARTET, A minor, op. 41, No. 1.
SVENDSEN.	STRING QUARTET, A minor.
WHITING, A.	SONATA for PIANO and VIOLIN, in G, op. 7. (new)

G. H. W.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

18th Symphony Concert.

Symphony by Klughardt.

Mr. Leo Schultz, Soloist, in Reinecke's Concerto for Violoncello.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was:

Wagner.....Prelude, "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 37.
Allegro.
Largo.
Moderato; Allegro.
Allegro.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke, Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance.
Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont."

The new symphony is interesting. Klughardt dispenses with the full modern orchestra, scoring his work without trombones, and in the slow movement without trumpets. He is a good scholar, and his knowledge of counterpoint expressed in the first and concluding movements is excellent; but nowhere is he pedantic or obscure. He writes with an ever prominent melody, and while his themes may not all have the true symphonic character, and the finale is lacking somewhat in dignity, nevertheless Klughardt has produced a symphony of a good deal of value; it is not great but it is musically sympathetic enough not to be classed with "Kappelmeister" music. Clearness of diction, knowledge of the limitations of the different instrumental groups, a nice sense of color and considerable fancy are its dominating qualities. The first movement is most regular in form, even to the old-fashioned adherence to the repeat. The themes lend themselves readily to treatment, the development section, cut somewhat in the performance, contalning many an imaginative touch. The promise held out at the opening of the slow movement, is not wholly answered, although this section is interesting, by reason of the composer's invention. The third movement begins in the manner of a minuet; two trios follow, and then the minuet mood is reproduced; a real scherzo follows, built on what has preceded. The finale is full of variety, both of idea and instrumentation. In Klughardt's symphony is an ever-present spontaneity; it was an agreeable task for him to write it, and it is no task at all for cultivated people to like it. It was cordially received, and its performance was very good. Klughardt is a native of Dessau, Germany, where he now lives and works.

The other novelty at this concert was by that excellent musical jurist, Carl Reinecke of Leipzig. Mr. Schultz played the second and the first movements of the concerto in the order named, which in point of technique are irreproachably made, but are lacking in vitality. The themes of the work are Slavonic—how remindful is the first subject of the allegro of a song by Taubert. It is a concerto for solo instrument, with accompaniment of orchestra, the model being Mozart and the early Beethoven. Mr. Schultz is an earnest and conscientious player, well schooled and possessed of a good technique. His tone is not as deep and vibrant as that of some of our resident violoncello players, but he is a master of style. The somewhat chilly cadenza introduced into the allegro was probably the composition of Mr. Schultz. The player was rewarded with two recalls at the close of the performance. Mr. Schultz is an enterprising artist; he has played at two Symphony concerts and produced three novelties.

Both the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Egmont" ove ture were read with a beautiful appreciation of their poetic and dramatic signifi ance. The concert as a whole was delightful. The next programme is: Arnold Krug, Symphonic Prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski, Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17, (first time in the United States); Arthur Whiting, Suite for strings and four horns in G minor, op. 8, (first performance); Liszt, Rakoczy March. Soloist, Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The closing concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette took place last evening in Union Hall before a large audience. The patrons of this organization have been exceedingly numerous all the season, and it is creditable to Boston musical people that the efforts of this quartette, which is probably not excelled in the performance of chamber music in this country, have been so well appreciated. It has given some of the best chamber music to be found—it has introduced many novelties, including works by our own Boston composers, and it has had the assistance in its various appearances of the best solo artists to be obtained.

The novelties of last evening were a sonata for piano and violin by Mme. Helen Hopekirk and some manuscript songs by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Wyman. The sonata of Mme. Hopekirk was given by the composer herself at the piano and Mr. Kneisel as violinist, and it was given before a Boston audience for the first time. She was well received, and the production was very much to be commended. Particularly pleasing was the second movement, and while not specially given to display of either instrument in the work, the piano is given considerable importance, and calls for an admirable command of that instrument.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Wyman. Her first selection was the arioso of Delibes, and later were given four songs by Dresel, the latter being "Sweet and Low," a composition which obtained the prize for the best setting of Tennyson's poem when Mr. Dresel first came to Boston. Mrs. Wyman gave these songs—all of them—in English, and to the pleasure of the audience, though it was apparent that the "Sweet and Low" gave the greatest enjoyment, and it was the most commendable composition. It is always a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman. Her singing is so artistic and tuneful; there is so little striving for effect, and she is so apparently devoted to her art. To our mind her renditions were hardly up to the standard, either in singing or the selections themselves, of her appearance in Music Hall with the Symphony Orchestra, but an artist cannot always be in best form. The quartette gave as its numbers the Andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, a Scherzo from Cherubini and the Kaiser Quartette of Father Haydn. None of these were novelties, but the superb ensemble of this quartette made them seem like a new creation. Particularly beautiful was the delivery of the Tschaikowsky number.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXXIX., No. 69.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and closing concert by the Kneisel quartet in its course in the Union Hall was given last evening, and was, perhaps, the most notable of the series, the quartet having the assistance of Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. The programme was as follows:

Helen Hopekirk—Sonata for piano and violin, E minor. (MS.) (First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.
Delibes—Arioso.
Mrs. Wyman.
(a) Tschaikowsky—Andante from quartet in D major.
(b) Cherubini—Scherzo from quartet in E flat major.
Kneisel Quartet.
Otto Dresel—Songs with piano. (a) "Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen und Vergissmeinnicht." (MS.) (b) "The Violet's Grave." (MS.) (c) "Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht." (MS.) (d) "Sweet and Low." (By request.)
Mrs Wyman.
Haydn—Kaiser Quartet in C major, No. 77.
Kneisel Quartet.

As will be seen, the number in which Mme. Hopekirk took part was one of her own compositions. Mme. Hopekirk for several years has held a foremost position as a pianist, but has not heretofore shown her ability as a composer to any marked degree. The sonata of last evening, however, must entitle her to high rank. It was given in a finished style by herself and Mr. Kneisel, and every movement called forth applause. The composition, it is stated, was written during a summer outing in Halstatt, Austria, and is the most important result of Mme. Hopekirk's two years study with Nawratel, a Viennese teacher.

While it was a rare treat to hear Mme. Hopekirk interpret her own musical ideas, nothing could be sweeter or more charming than the group of songs delightfully rendered by Mrs. Wyman, and the audience showed its pleasure by calling her back again and agai .

The three works by the quartet were performed in their usually excellent manner, and completed a varied and interesting programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Original Composition by Mme. Hopekirk Has Its First Hearing.

Despite the inclemency of the weather a large and enthusiastic audience was present to listen to the last concert of the season by the Kneisel quartet, in Union Hall, last evening.

The opening number, a new sonata by Mme. Hopekirk, was finely performed by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel, and was given good recognition by the audience. Mrs. Wyman next sang the "Arioso," by Delibes, in a delightful manner. She also sang four songs by Otto Dresel, three of them in manuscript. The fourth was the famous setting of Tennyson's "Sweet and Low." Mrs. Wyman's singing of this last was faultless, and the audience showed its approval in three enthusiastic recalls.

The work of the quartet was excellent, especially in the andante in D major, by Tschaikowskil, which was played with a grace that was charming. The "Scherzo" by Cherubini, and the "Kaiser Quartet," by Handel, were well rendered. Mr. Arthur Foote was the accompanist of the evening.

[110]

Brattle Hall, Cambridge.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31, AT 8.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 21, AT 8.

TWO CONCERTS

—BY THE—

KNEISEL QUARTET.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH. MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 31, SOLOIST, MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

Tickets with reserved seats now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 10, 1891.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The closing concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette took place last evening in Union Hall before a large audience. The patrons of this organization have been exceedingly numerous all the season, and it is creditable to Boston musical people that the efforts of this quartette, which is probably not excelled in the performance of chamber music in this country, have been so well appreciated. It has given some of the best chamber music to be found—it has introduced many novelties, including works by our own Boston composers, and it has had the assistance in its various appearances of the best solo artists to be obtained.

The novelties of last evening were a sonata for piano and violin by Mme. Helen Hopekirk and some manuscript songs by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Wyman. The sonata of Mme. Hopekirk was given by the composer herself at the piano and Mr. Kneisel as violinist, and it was given before a Boston audience for the first time. She was well received, and the production was very much to be commended. Particularly pleasing was the second movement, and while not specially given to display of either instrument in the work, the piano is given considerable importance, and calls for an admirable command of that instrument.

The vocal soloist was Mrs. Wyman. Her first selection was the arioso of Delibes, and later were given four songs by Dresel, the latter being "Sweet and Low," a composition which obtained the prize for the best setting of Tennyson's poem when Mr. Dresel first came to Boston. Mrs. Wyman gave these songs—all of them—in English, and to the pleasure of the audience, though it was apparent that the "Sweet and Low" gave the greatest enjoyment, and it was the most commendable composition. It is always a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman. Her singing is so artistic and tuneful; there is so little striving for effect, and she is so apparently devoted to her art. To our mind her renditions were hardly up to the standard, either in singing or the selections themselves, of her appearance in Music Hall with the Symphony Orchestra, but an artist cannot always be in best form. The quartette gave as its numbers the Andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartette in D major, a Scherzo from Cherubini and the Kaiser Quartette of Father Haydn. None of these were novelties, but the superb ensemble of this quartette made them seem like a new creation. Particularly beautiful was the delivery of the Tschaikowsky number.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
Vol. LXXIX., No. 69.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and closing concert by the Kneisel quartet in its course in the Union Hall was given last evening, and was, perhaps, the most notable of the series, the quartet having the assistance of Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. The programme was as follows:

Helen Hopekirk—Sonata for piano and violin. E minor. (MS.) (First time.)
Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel.

Delibes—Arioso.
Mrs. Wyman.

(a) Tschaikowsky—Andante from quartet in D major.
(b) Cherubini—Scherzo from quartet in E flat major.
Kneisel Quartet.

Otto Dresel—Songs with piano. (a) "Mit tausend schoensten Myrthen und Vergissmeinnicht." (MS.) (b) "The Violet's Grave." (MS.) (c) "Es hat die warme Fruehlingsnacht." (MS.) (d) "Sweet and Low." (By request.)
Mrs Wyman.

Haydn—Kaiser Quartet in C major, No. 77.
Kneisel Quartet.

As will be seen, the number in which Mme. Hopekirk took part was one of her own compositions. Mme. Hopekirk for several years has held a foremost position as a pianist, but has not heretofore shown her ability as a composer to any marked degree. The sonata of last evening, however, must entitle her to high rank. It was given in a finished style by herself and Mr. Kneisel, and every movement called forth applause. The composition, it is stated, was written during a summer outing in Halstatt, Austria, and is the most important result of Mme. Hopekirk's two years study with Nawratel, a Viennese teacher.

While it was a rare treat to hear Mme. Hopekirk interpret her own musical ideas, nothing could be sweeter or more charming than the group of songs delightfully rendered by Mrs. Wyman, and the audience showed its pleasure by calling her back again and again.

The three works by the quartet were performed in their usually excellent manner, and completed a varied and interesting programme.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

Original Composition by Mme. Hopekirk Has Its First Hearing.

Despite the inclemency of the weather a large and enthusiastic audience was present to listen to the last concert of the season by the Kneisel quartet, in Union Hall, last evening.

The opening number, a new sonata by Mme. Hopekirk, was finely performed by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kniesel, and was given good recognition by the audience. Mrs. Wyman next sang the "Arioso," by Delibes, in a delightful manner. She also sang four songs by Otto Dresel, three of them in manuscript. The fourth was the famous setting of Tennyson's "Sweet and Low." Mrs. Wyman's singing of this last was faultless, and the audience showed its approval in three enthusiastic recalls.

The work of the quartet was excellent, especially in the andante in D major, by Tschaikowskii, which was played with a grace that was charming. The "Scherzo" by Cherubini, and the "Kaiser Quartet," by Handel, were well rendered. Mr. Arthur Foote was the accompanist of the evening.

[110]

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1891.

18th Symphony Concert. Symphony by Klughardt.

Mr. Leo Schultz, Soloist, in Reinecke's Concerto for Violoncello.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was:

Wagner.....Prelude, "Lohengrin."
August Klughardt, Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 37.
Allegro.
Largo.
Moderato; Allegro.
Allegro.
(First time in the United States.)
Reinecke, Two Movements from Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor, Op. 82.
Romance.
Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont."

The new symphony is interesting. Klughardt dispenses with the full modern orchestra, scoring his work without trombones, and in the slow movement without trumpets. He is a good scholar, and his knowledge of counterpoint expressed in the first and concluding movements is excellent; but nowhere is he pedantic or obscure. He writes with an ever prominent melody, and while his themes may not all have the true symphonic character, and the finale is lacking somewhat in dignity, nevertheless Klughardt has produced a symphony of a good deal of value; it is not great but it is musically sympathetic enough not to be classed with "Kappelmeister" music. Clearness of diction, knowledge of the limitations of the different instrumental groups, a nice sense of color and considerable fancy are its dominating qualities. The first movement is most regular in form, even to the old-fashioned adherence to the repeat. The themes lend themselves readily to treatment, the development section, cut somewhat in the performance, containing many an imaginative touch. The promise held out at the opening of the slow movement, is not wholly answered, although this section is interesting, by reason of the composer's invention. The third movement begins in the manner of a minuet; two trios follow, and then the minuet mood is reproduced; a real scherzo follows, built on what has preceded. The finale is full of variety, both of idea and instrumentation. In Klughardt's symphony is an ever-present spontaneity; it was an agreeable task for him to write it, and it is no task at all for cultivated people to like it. It was cordially received, and its performance was very good. Klughardt is a native of Dessau, Germany, where he now lives and works.

The other novelty at this concert was by that excellent musical jurist, Carl Reinecke of Leipzig. Mr. Schultz played the second and the first movements of the concerto in the order named, which in point of technique are irreproachably made, but are lacking in vitality. The themes of the work are Slavonic—how remindful is the first subject of the allegro of a song by Taubert. It is a concerto for solo instrument, with accompaniment of orchestra, the model being Mozart and the early Beethoven. Mr. Schultz is an earnest and conscientious player, well schooled and possessed of a good technique. His tone is not as deep and vibrant as that of some of our resident violoncello players, but he is a master of style. The somewhat chilly cadenza introduced into the allegro was probably the composition of Mr. Schultz. The player was rewarded with two recalls at the close of the performance. Mr. Schultz is an enterprising artist: he has played at two Symphony concerts and produced three novelties.

Both the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Egmont" overture were read with a beautiful appreciation of their poetic and dramatic significance. The concert as a whole was delightful. The next programme is: Arnold Krug, Symphonic Prologue to Shakespeare's "Othello"; Paderewski, Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17, (first time in the United States); Arthur Whiting, Suite for strings and four horns in G minor, op. 8, (first performance); Liszt, Rakoczy March. Soloist, Mrs. Julia Rive-King.

...ADVERTISER
...tablished 1813.
...MORNING, MAR. 10, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

...Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Night.

...the rich musical feast which the ... Quartette has given us this season, ... a light and enjoyable musical des... at Union Hall last night, in which ...ant, rather than profound music, was ...dominant. The first number was the ...most interesting, for it was a sonata for ...violin and piano, by Helen Hopekirk, ...splendidly played by the composer and ...Kneisel. So few ladies have at...tempted to write in the sonata form, ...and such a large percentage of even these ...have been overthrown by it, that it is a ...real pleasure to state that Mme. Hope...kirk has succeeded within the rather ...modest proportions of this classical num...ber. The chief fault of the first move...ment is that it attracts more by its themes ...than by their development. So masculine ...and bold a chief theme would sug...gest a more extensive working-out. ...But the exposition is exceedingly ...attractive, and the two themes are in fine ...contrast, the second being entirely beau...tiful, and the returning passage (subse...quently used as transition to develop...ment) remarkably effective. The coda is ...well built up from the ponderous double ...chords of the chief theme. Altogether ...Mme. Hopekirk has achieved a worthy ...combination of the emotional and intel...lectual here.

The second movement—adante pastor...ale—was genial and unforced. But the ...final rondo displayed more originality of ...thought than any other part of the work, ...and its dashing, yet quaint character, ...made it a very effective finale.

Mrs. Wyman was the vocalist and her ...broad and noble voice was heard to best ...advantage in the Delibes "Arioso." Yet ...a still greater popular success was won in ...the group of songs by Otto Dresel. The ...first of these was not especially ...characteristic, but the second ("The ...Violet's Grave") reminded of Rob...ert Franz in its fine inter...weaving of melody and accom...paniment, and also in the adoption of the ...strophe form. The setting of "Sweet and ...Low" was also a worthy composition, ...especially in the sequence at the end of ...the stanzas. It was sung with great ex...pression and won the artist a triple recall. ...In this connection one would like to men...tion another, very delicate, treatment of ...the same subject as a duet, by Robert ...Bonner, which is scarcely better known ...than Mr. Dresel's.

The quartette played in the usual fault...less manner. The Tschaikowsky andante, ...that of the muted violins and pizzicato ac...companiment, was received as a musical ...bonbon, grateful to the taste, and in the ...Cherubini scherzo the dialogue between ...'cello and violins was very daintily ren...dered, while the "Kaiser Quartette," by ...Haydn, was piquant with its drone bass, ...and especially in its presentation of "Gott ...erhalte Franz den Kaiser," which ...gave each player his opportunity in ...turn (of course the chances were ...well used) and proved that we ...can learn something in variation still, ...even from "the father of instrumental ...form." But the place of honor in this pro...gramme was, as intimated, achieved by ...Mme. Hopekirk's work. When women ...study music less with the intention of ...merely pleasing we may have more female ...composers who can create a sonata.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford.

CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 10, 1891.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.	OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini." op. 23.
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor.
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 8. in B minor, (Unfinished.) Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.
	SOLOS FOR VIOLIN.
a) WIENIAWSKI.	ROMANZA.
b) SARASATE.	SPANISH DANCE.
	SOLOS FOR PIANOFORTE.
a) CHOPIN.	BERCEUSE.
b) SCHUBERT-LISZT.	ERLKÖNIG.
GOLDMARK.	SYMPHONY. (Rustic Wedding). op. 26. WEDDING MARCH, with variations.—Moderato molto. BRIDAL SONG.—Allegretto. IN THE GARDEN.—Andante. DANCE.—Finale. Allegro molto.

SOLOISTS:

MADAME HELEN HOPEKIRK.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Prometheus."
BRAHMS.	FIRST MOVEMENT from CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
WAGNER.	WALDWEBEN from SIEGFRIED.
RAFF.	SYMPHONY No. 3. "Im Walde." IN THE DAY TIME. (Allegro).—IN THE TWILIGHT. (Largo).—DANCE OF THE DRYADS. (Allegro assai).—NIGHT. SILENT BREATH OF NIGHT IN THE FOREST. ENTRANCE AND DEPARTURE OF THE WILD HUNT WITH FRAU HOLLE AND WOTAN. BREAK OF DAY. (Allegro.)

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Boston Daily Traveller

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

Kneisel Quartet Concert—Mrs. Hopekirk's New Sonata—Notes.

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet was given last night in Union Hall. An interesting novelty was first on the programme, namely, a sonata for piano and violin in E minor, composed by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who was the player of the piano part, Mr. Kneisel being her associate. It was doubtless a surprise to those who knew of Mrs. Hopekirk only as a pianist, to find her the composer of so equable and fluent piece of writing as this sonata. It seems that when at Leipsic her first student days, though devoted to the piano in particular, embraced a perfunctory look at composition, but it was not until she had won a name as a player that she entered seriously upon its study. Her real master in composition was Nawratel of Vienna. The sonata is a straightforward and clear work. In form it is regular, barring the permissible liberty of an introduction, the first movement being a veritable classic in dignity. The freer slow movement is followed by a rondo of chaste design and happy spirit. The work is full of sentiment, and it grows in interest, for although the first movement is the more scholarly, the finale has equal musicianship and more imagination. It is not unlikely that the charming andante pastorale of Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata was suggested by some such summer scene as inspired Beethoven to write the pastorale of his sixth symphony. The musical feeling here is undeniable, and it is beautifully expressed. After one hearing it is not our purpose to pass final judgment on any work, but our first impression of this sonata finds utterance in praise, and it seems more than likely were Mrs. Hopekirk to devote still further time to composition the result would be altogether gratifying and welcome, even in these times of prolific industry among musicians. The sonata was well played, Mr. Kneisel entering into its spirit with ardor, Mrs. Hopekirk playing quite con amore. The reception of the work left no doubt as to the high degree of pleasure it gave.

The quartet numbers at this concert were a favorite andante by Tschaikowsky, a scherzo by Cherubini, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet, all familiar music. A further and artistic contribution to the pleasure of last evening's audience was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who sang to the helpful piano accompaniment of Arthur Foote, Delibes's Arioso, and a set of songs by the late Otto Dresel, three of which were in manuscript. The songs reflect Robert Franz, though they have sufficient individuality to stand alone. No previous series of Kneisel concerts has been more successful than that just ended; the programmes have been more interesting but a little less lofty than usual. A creditable feature has been the attention given to new works. I ... be said that Mr. Kneisel has most ... for next year's con... suita...

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 14, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The audience of last Saturday evening had the first hearing in this country of the third symphony of August Klughardt, a German kapellmeister, of whose chamber music something is known here, and who has contributed to home performances a few operas and considerable lighter work. Judging by the faint applause which followed the presentation of the several movements, the Symphony public will not clamor for a second hearing of this music very soon, and yet there are many meritorious qualities in it; but, on the other hand, when all is said and done, the impression left is rather that of four fantasias than of a symphony. The author has the gift of melody, although this is sometimes rather trivial and folk-song-ish, and he has the art of clear statement which no figures of speech obscure. He is individual enough, and yet one can feel at times in his writing the influence of Haydn, Mozart and Bach, and there is an occasional touch which makes one think of Saint-Saëns and other men of these later days. All the devices by which thematic development is conducted appear to be familiar to him, and he uses them liberally, but without ostentation. He does not avail himself of the full modern orchestra and he employs the brass instruments—the trumpets especially—rather in the old-fashioned way, for adding tone-color in long notes, than in the direct exposition of phrases. The first movement has a distinct march quality, and a good deal of it would serve military purposes capitally; the slow movement is romantic and suave; the scherzo is irregular and changeful in movement and feeling, and one portion is of a delightful butterfly sort, which hints at a probable capacity for writing ballets; the last movement is very brisk and gay, with a kind of moto perpetuo running through most of it, and coming abruptly and unexpectedly to its end. There is a very free use of fluent counterpoint all through the symphony, a good deal of imitation and a smart fugato in at least two movements; the wind and string wings are often very nicely and tastefully contrasted, and while one recognizes in the neatness of all the workmanship a professional touch, one yet feels that there is in the author a sweet, fresh and pleasant spirit, but no genius. There is a deal of music in the world better worth hearing, if only Boston directors would look it up and learn it; Vienna and Leipsig do not complete the universe of musical art. Mr. Leo Schulz, unhappily placed to follow the symphony, gave for his solo two movements from a pretty but rather insignificant 'cello concerto by Reinecke. He played them in entirely good style, nice phrasing, just intonation, as much feeling as they permitted, and a tone satisfying in all respects but that of quantity. The short cadenza, which was pleasant enough, was his own; there was no great need of it, but perhaps its introduction spared us one of Reinecke's own, from which—if the one Mr. Hekking played be a fair specimen—the Lord deliver us! The prelude to "Lohengrin" was well played as the first number, and the overture to "Egmont," too often exaggerated and artificial in reading, had the last place. Tonight Mme. Rivé-King will give the first American performance of Paderewski's A-minor pianoforte concerto; the orchestra will play Krug's prelude to "Othello," Liszt's "Rakozsy" march, a new suite for strings and horn quartette by Mr. Arthur Whiting.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Even Bernhardt could not draw away many of the good people who cultivate at once fashion and true pleasure from the last Kneisel concert, which fell on Monday evening. Several of the numbers were standard or familiar—Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette, an andante from Tschaikowsky and a scherzo from Cherubini, in which last were many light-tripping measures half too fanciful for the pen which was generally so reserved and methodical. The chief novelty of the evening was a sonata for piano and violin, written by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, and played by her with Mr. Kneisel. It is a careful, elegant and interesting composition—not exactly inspired, however, and sounding sometimes as if it had been written about as much so that its author could claim to have made a sonata as for any other reason. Its key is E-minor, and the short introduction is rather gloomy and tearful; the allegro which comes out of it is by no means sadly sentimental, but dashes about from key to key with that restlessness which beginners in composition are wont to show and is not always happy or reasonable in its roamings, which are in truth unduly protracted, as if the themes were not quite sure of their way home. The andante is much better and more agreeable; its theme has a distinct Scottish flavor and is treated solidly and with brevity. The last movement is also very good, but has not the freshness and the freedom of the second. The work had an excellent presentation, of course, only marred by Mrs. Hopekirk's disposition to play too loud occasionally. There was also vocal music, an arioso of Delibes and four songs (three in manuscript) by the late Mr. Dresel being sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose style has not yet all the elegance required for such music and a small room. We are very likely in error, but it seemed to us that the Delibes air required a gentler, more pensive and pleading character than Mrs. Wyman imparted to it, and the Dresel songs, beautifully as they were phrased, suffered from the shrill tones and the dragging attack which seems inseparable from the Marchesi training. If a perfect progression, absolutely ligato and wholly devoid of portamento, be required anywhere, it is in such songs as the last, for Mr. Dresel, while believing heartily in the lied, did not believe in it as an accompaniment or an accidental adjunct to a pianoforte morceau, and his airs depend no less on purity of vocal style than on that delightful clearness of enunciation which the singer gave them. Mrs. Wyman has a full, broad and telling voice, the very weight of which no doubt makes more difficult that finesse which she should yet seek to perfect.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 10, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert of Last Night.

After the rich musical feast which the Kneisel Quartette has given us this season, came a light and enjoyable musical dessert, at Union Hall last night, in which pleasant, rather than profound music, was predominant. The first number was the most interesting, for it was a sonata for violin and piano, by Helen Hopekirk, splendidly played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel. So few ladies have attempted to write in the sonata form, and such a large percentage of even these have been overthrown by it, that it is a real pleasure to state that Mme. Hopekirk has succeeded within the rather modest proportions of this classical number. The chief fault of the first movement is that it attracts more by its themes than by their development. So masculine and bold a chief theme would suggest a more extensive working-out. But the exposition is exceedingly attractive, and the two themes are in fine contrast, the second being entirely beautiful, and the returning passage (subsequently used as transition to development) remarkably effective. The coda is well built up from the ponderous double chords of the chief theme. Altogether Mme. Hopekirk has achieved a worthy combination of the emotional and intellectual here.

The second movement—adante pastorale—was genial and unforced. But the final rondo displayed more originality of thought than any other part of the work, and its dashing, yet quaint character, made it a very effective finale.

Mrs. Wyman was the vocalist and her broad and noble voice was heard to best advantage in the Delibes "Arioso." Yet a still greater popular success was won in the group of songs by Otto Dresel. The first of these was not especially characteristic, but the second ("The Violet's Grave") reminded of Robert Franz in its fine interweaving of melody and accompaniment, and also in the adoption of the strophe form. The setting of "Sweet and Low" was also a worthy composition, especially in the sequence at the end of the stanzas. It was sung with great expression and won the artist a triple recall. In this connection one would like to mention another, very delicate, treatment of the same subject as a duet, by Robert Bonner, which is scarcely better known than Mr. Dresel's.

The quartette played in the usual faultless manner. The Tschaikowsky andante, that of the muted violins and pizzicato accompaniment, was received as a musical bonbon, grateful to the taste, and in the Cherubini scherzo the dialogue between cello and violins was very daintily rendered, while the "Kaiser Quartette," by Haydn, was piquant with its drone bass, and especially in its presentation of "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser," which gave each player his opportunity in turn (of course the chances were well used) and proved that we can learn something in variation still, even from "the father of instrumental form." But the place of honor in this programme was, as intimated, achieved by Mme. Hopekirk's work. When women study music less with the intention of merely pleasing we may have more female composers who can create a sonata.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Prometheus."
BRAHMS.	FIRST MOVEMENT from CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
WAGNER.	WALDWEBEN from SIEGFRIED.
RAFF.	SYMPHONY No. 3. "Im Walde."

IN THE DAY TIME. (Allegro.)—IN THE TWILIGHT. (Largo.)—DANCE OF THE DRYADS. (Allegro assai.)—NIGHT. SILENT BREATH OF NIGHT IN THE FOREST. ENTRANCE AND DEPARTURE OF THE WILD HUNT WITH FRAU HOLLE AND WOTAN. BREAK OF DAY. (Allegro.)

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Grand Opera House, New Bedford.

CONCERT

—BY THE—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 10, 1891.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.	OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini." op. 23.
SAINT-SAENS.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in G minor.
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 8. in B minor. (Unfinished.) Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto
	SOLOS FOR VIOLIN.
a) WIENIAWSKI.	ROMANZA.
b) SARASATE.	SPANISH DANCE.
	SOLOS FOR PIANOFORTE.
a) CHOPIN.	BERCEUSE.
b) SCHUBERT-LISZT.	ERLKONIG.
GOLDMARK.	SYMPHONY. (Rustic Wedding). op. 26. WEDDING MARCH, with variations.—Moderato molto. BRIDAL SONG.—Allegretto. IN THE GARDEN.—Andante. DANCE.—Finale. Allegro molto

SOLOISTS:

MADAME HELEN HOPEKIRK.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The Piano used is a Knabe

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, MARCH 10, 1891.

Kneisel Quartet Concert—Mrs. Hopekirk's New Sonata—Notes.

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet was given last night in Union Hall. An interesting novelty was first on the programme, namely, a sonata for piano and violin in E minor, composed by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who was the player of the piano part, Mr. Kneisel being her associate. It was doubtless a surprise to those who knew of Mrs. Hopekirk only as a pianist, to find her the composer of so equable and fluent piece of writing as this sonata. It seems that when at Leipsic her first student days, though devoted to the piano in particular, embraced a perfunctory look at composition, but it was not until she had won a name as a player that she entered seriously upon its study. Her real master in composition was Nawratel of Vienna. The sonata is a straightforward and clear work. In form it is regular, barring the permissible liberty of an introduction, the first movement being a veritable classic in dignity. The freer slow movement is followed by a rondo of chaste design and happy spirit. The work is full of sentiment, and it grows in interest, for although the first movement is the more scholarly, the finale has equal musicianship and more imagination. It is not unlikely that the charming andante pastorale of Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata was suggested by some such summer scene as inspired Beethoven to write the pastorale of his sixth symphony. The musical feeling here is undeniable, and it is beautifully expressed. After one hearing it is not our purpose to pass final judgment on any work, but our first impression of this sonata finds utterance in praise, and it seems more than likely were Mrs. Hopekirk to devote still further time to composition the result would be altogether gratifying and welcome, even in these times of prolific industry among musicians. The sonata was well played, Mr. Kneisel entering into its spirit with ardor, Mrs. Hopekirk playing quite con amore. The reception of the work left no doubt as to the high degree of pleasure it gave.

The quartet numbers at this concert were a favorite andante by Tschaikowsky, a scherzo by Cherubini, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet, all familiar music. A further and artistic contribution to the pleasure of last evening's audience was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, who sang to the helpful piano accompaniment of Arthur Foote, Delibes's Arioso, and a set of songs by the late Otto Dresel, three of which were in manuscript. The songs reflect Robert Franz, though they have sufficient individuality to stand alone. No previous series of Kneisel concerts has been more successful than that just ended; the programmes have been more interesting but a little less lofty than usual. A creditable feature has been the attention given to new works. It may be said that Mr. Kneisel has most interesting plans for next year's con already the public are antic

---

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 14, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The audience of last Saturday evening had the first hearing in this country of the third symphony of August Klughardt, a German kapellmeister, of whose chamber music something is known here, and who has contributed to home performances a few operas and considerable lighter work. Judging by the faint applause which followed the presentation of the several movements, the Symphony public will not clamor for a second hearing of this music very soon, and yet there are many meritorious qualities in it; but, on the other hand, when all is said and done, the impression left is rather that of four fantasias than of a symphony. The author has the gift of melody, although this is sometimes rather trivial and folk-song-ish, and he has the art of clear statement which no figures of speech obscure. He is individual enough, and yet one can feel at times in his writing the influence of Haydn, Mozart and Bach, and there is an occasional touch which makes one think of Saint-Saëns and other men of these later days. All the devices by which thematic development is conducted appear to be familiar to him, and he uses them liberally, but without ostentation. He does not avail himself of the full modern orchestra and he employs the brass instruments—the trumpets especially—rather in the old-fashioned way, for adding tone-color in long notes, than in the direct exposition of phrases. The first movement has a distinct march quality, and a good deal of it would serve military purposes capitally; the slow movement is romantic and suave; the scherzo is irregular and changeful in movement and feeling, and one portion is of a delightful butterfly sort, which hints at a probable capacity for writing ballets; the last movement is very brisk and gay, with a kind of moto perpetuo running through most of it, and coming abruptly and unexpectedly to its end. There is a very free use of fluent counterpoint all through the symphony, a good deal of imitation and a smart fugato in at least two movements; the wind and string wings are often very nicely and tastefully contrasted, and while one recognizes in the neatness of all the workmanship a professional touch, one yet feels that there is in the author a sweet, fresh and pleasant spirit, but no genius. There is a deal of music in the world better worth hearing, if only Boston directors would look it up and learn it; Vienna and Leipsig do not complete the universe of musical art. Mr. Leo Schulz, unhappily placed to follow the symphony, gave for his solo two movements from a pretty but rather insignificant 'cello concerto by Reinecke. He played them in entirely good style, nice phrasing, just intonation, as much feeling as they permitted, and a tone satisfying in all respects but that of quantity. The short cadenza, which was pleasant enough, was his own; there was no great need of it, but perhaps its introduction spared us one of Reinecke's own, from which—if the one Mr. Hekking played be a fair specimen—the Lord deliver us! The prelude to "Lohengrin" was well played as the first number, and the overture to "Egmont," too often exaggerated and artificial in reading, had the last place. Tonight Mme. Rivé-King will give the first American performance of Paderewski's A-minor pianoforte concerto; the orchestra will play Krug's prelude to "Othello," Liszt's "Rakozsy" march, a new suite for strings and horn quartette by Mr. Arthur Whiting.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Even Bernhardt could not draw away many of the good people who cultivate at once fashion and true pleasure from the last Kneisel concert, which fell on Monday evening. Several of the numbers were standard or familiar—Haydn's "Kaiser" quartette, an andante from Tschaikowsky and a scherzo from Cherubini, in which last were many light-tripping measures half too fanciful for the pen which was generally so reserved and methodical. The chief novelty of the evening was a sonata for piano and violin, written by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, and played by her with Mr. Kneisel. It is a careful, elegant and interesting composition—not exactly inspired, however, and sounding sometimes as if it had been written about as much so that its author could claim to have made a sonata as for any other reason. Its key is E-minor, and the short introduction is rather gloomy and tearful; the allegro which comes out of it is by no means sadly sentimental, but dashes about from key to key with that restlessness which beginners in composition are wont to show and is not always happy or reasonable in its roamings, which are in truth unduly protracted, as if the themes were not quite sure of their way home. The andante is much better and more agreeable; its theme has a distinct Scottish flavor and is treated solidly and with brevity. The last movement is also very good, but has not the freshness and the freedom of the second. The work had an excellent presentation, of course, only marred by Mrs. Hopekirk's disposition to play too loud occasionally. There was also vocal music, an arioso of Delibes and four songs (three in manuscript) by the late Mr. Dresel being sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, whose style has not yet all the elegance required for such music and a small room. We are very likely in error, but it seemed to us that the Delibes air required a gentler, more pensive and pleading character than Mrs. Wyman imparted to it, and the Dresel songs, beautifully as they were phrased, suffered from the shrill tones and the dragging attack which seems inseparable from the Marchesi training. If a perfect progression, absolutely ligato and wholly devoid of portamento, be required anywhere, it is in such songs as the last, for Mr. Dresel, while believing heartily in the lied, did not believe in it as an accompaniment or an accidental adjunct to a pianoforte morceau, and his airs depend no less on purity of vocal style than on that delightful clearness of enunciation which the singer gave them. Mrs. Wyman has a full, broad and telling voice, the very weight of which no doubt makes more difficult that finesse which she should yet seek to perfect.

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, MARCH 15, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mme. Rive-King.

The reappearance upon the local stage of Mme. Rive-King, the accomplished pianist, made a very pleasant feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert last evening at Music Hall, and this always favorite artist had a very friendly greeting when she came to the piano to play, for the first time in this country, Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17.

This composer has found a recognition in recital programmes here which has aroused quite an interest in his larger works, and the first hearing of the concerto played last evening quite realized the pleasant anticipations concerning its characteristics, and fully justified Mme. King in her choice of it as one of the season's novelties.

Paderewski shows in all his works, and especially in this concerto, the influences of his nationality, and the singular fascination of the folk songs and dances of his native Poland is at all times felt in listening to the composition from his hand heard last evening. The opening allegro has the least evidence of genius of all the three movements of the concerto, as its themes are built up in traditional form and worked out in compliance with accepted rules.

It is in the lovely "Romanes," making the middle movement, that the composer takes prominence over the musician, as its melodious ideas are put in the straightforward way that charms and delights by its very simplicity. In the final allegro, though, all the training and clever skill of the musician is brought to the aid of the composer and the grand melodious thematic ideas are worked out with a splendid freedom and dash that gives a most brilliant ending to this thoroughly delightful composition.

Mme. King gave her best efforts to the work she had in hand, and her many artistic triumphs before Boston audiences were vividly recalled by her performance of the solo part. She ranks with the best of the world's pianists, and has steadily held the high position she gained years ago, during her earlier tour in this country. She plays in a grand, broad style, which is seldom realized by women pianists, and with fine sentiment and expression in such movements as the "romance" of the concerto of last evening. She won her audience in the most honest fashion, and was rewarded with many recalls upon the completion of her task.

Another novelty claimed the attention of the audience at last evening's concert, this being a suite for the string orchestra and four horns by Mr. Arthur Whiting of this city, the work having its first public hearing on this occasion. It consists of six short movements styled "Praeludium" (appassionato assai), "Aria" (allegretto grazioso), "Scherzo" (vivace e scherzando), "Romanze (adagietto), and Finale (moderato e maestoso). Mr. Whiting wisely confided his composition to Mr. Nikisch for performance, and it received every possible attention in the reading given.

The suite shows evidence of the best work Mr. Whiting has made public, and is a vastly interesting study throughout. Much originality has been shown in the use of the novel combination of instruments for which the suite is composed, and the several movements are admirably contrasted. The audience was evidently impressed with the value of this novelty, and gave it a hearty commendation at its conclusion.

A very finished performance of the Bach-Esser "Toccata" made the introductory number of the programme, and the "Rakoczy" march brought the concert to a brilliant ending.

Boston [illegible]

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1891.

Symphony and Concerts Heard in Music Hall.

The programme arranged by Director Nikisch for last week's symphony concert was not the most enjoyable of the season. Several of the selections were decidedly heavy, to say the least, and of variety there was little. The orchestra, too, was not always up to the Nikisch standard of excellence.

The most enjoyable, if not a particularly notable, number was the concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 17, by I. J. Paderewski. The soloist was Mrs. Julia Rive-King, a pianist well-known here, and justly regarded as an excellent artist. She has a splendid command of technique, and intepret with a deal of vigor and considerable expression. The Paderewski concerto would be a trying work for any artist, and Mrs. King is to be complimented upon her performance. She was cordially applauded and twice recalled at its conclusion. Of the three movements of the concerto, which it may be well to mention had not before been played in the United States, the andante is the most interesting. The solo instrument is pleasantly heard in what has been described as a rippling figure of accompaniment in triplets of semi-quavers, carried through 36 bars. It was in these passages that Mrs. King's skill appeared to greatest advantage. The subject matter of the concerto is generally characterized by melodies, and delightful effects of harmony are frequently gained. The final movement is marked by long passages of octaves, which were brilliantly played by the soloist. The orchestra is prominent throughout.

Bostonians naturally welcome an opportunity of hearing a composition of one of their own favorite musicians, accordingly much interest was felt in the performance of Mr. Arthur Whiting's suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8, a work not before heard in public. It cannot be said that this suite, for a unique combination of instruments, proved particularly pleasing to the audience. The usually undemonstrative rehearsal audience was uncommonly reserved in its applause. If Mr. Whiting's latest work does not rank among his best, it is certainly a scholarly composition, original in treatment.

A toccata by Bach-Esser was the opening number of the programme, and Liszt's Rokaczy march, brilliantly played, ended the concert.

There will be two soloists at this week's symphony concert, Miss Lena Little, vocalist; and Mr. Otto Roth, violinst. The programme will be as follows: Rubinstein, overture, "Antony and Cleopatra;" Gluck, aria, "Orfeo;" Spohr, concerto for violin in E minor. Songs with piano—"Wie bist du meine Koenigin;" Secchi, "Love me or not;" Hiller, "Im Maien;" Dvorak, symphony in D minor.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1891.

FOURTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel quartette gave their fourth concert of the season in Union hall Monday evening. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk were the assisting artists. The programme consisted of Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata for piano and violin in E minor; songs by Délibes and Otto Dresel; selections from the quartette music by Tschaikowski and Cherubini; and Haydn's Kaiser quartette in C major.

Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata is a creditable piece of music, limited, 'tis true, by the composer's inherent deficiency of created means, yet in an academic sense of the term it is scholarly and well made. The restless and numerous modulations of the first movement are somewhat amateurish in their effect; and, throughout the work the laborious efforts of the pianist to appear what it would seem impossible for her to be, namely, a well-endowed composer, are more or less impressive. The performance of the work was by the composer, and Mr. Kneisel.

The andante from the Tschaikowski quartette in D minor, the scherzo from the Cherubini quartette and the Kaiser quartette were one and all superbly given, and with some of the very best playing that has yet been heard from Mr. Kneisel and his associates. The tone-shadings were exceptionally well made, while the technical clearness and precision with which the works were performed could not have been surpassed.

Mrs. Wyman is a very interesting and accomplished singer, and though she lacked the temperament that seemed ever so much needed for the Delibes arioso, she fully atoned for this in her charming singing of the songs by Dresel.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and last concert of the season of this organization was given in Music Hall, Monday evening. Pains had evidently been taken to make the programme one of the most attractive and most popular of all; and in both respects more than the usual amount of success was attained. Two novelties were presented, the first, a sonata for piano and violin, by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, which was played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel. The performance of this work demonstrated these facts: That this excellent pianist has the gift of melody, and is mistress of the art of composition, to a considerable degree. There are three movements, the first, which is preceded by a short introduction, being the most interesting. Its themes are fresh, move naturally, and are tastefully contrasted. The piano part is broad, brilliant and difficult, and is also at times too strong for that of the violin, which instrument, however, is given a better chance than is frequently the case in similar works written by those whose specialty is the pianoforte. The andante pastorale was a graceful opening, but cannot be said to come to much, as a whole. The principal theme of the closing presto, in rondo form, strongly suggests that of the scherzo in Schumann's second symphony, and the effect produced by it is dashing, if somewhat devoid of character. The sonata was played with a spirit that accorded well with its style, although the piano part was not as clear and well controlled as was to have been expected. Its close was greeted with much applause. The remaining novelty consisted of a group of songs (three of which were in manuscript) by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman to the accompaniment of Mr. Arthur Foote. They proved to be melodious and artistic in design, and were rendered tastefully, although with little variety of tone. Mrs. Wyman was also heard in an arioso, by Delibes, wherein a similar monotony was noticeable, but which was sung in a manner broad and well sustained. Her efforts also won a warm response from the audience. The numbers performed by the quartet were the andante, from the string quartet in D major, by Tschaikowsky—a wholly exquisite movement, delightfully played; scherzo from Cherubini's quartet in E flat, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet, the performance of which was marked by much delicacy and by a surpassingly fine ensemble that prevailed throughout. So ended the sixth season of this splend d quartet, whose artistic aims are more and more truly appreciated by many of the most musical people of Boston.

T. P. CURRIER.

[112]

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 15, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mme. Rive-King.

The reappearance upon the local stage of Mme. Rive-King, the accomplished pianist, made a very pleasant feature of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert last evening at Music Hall, and this always favorite artist had a very friendly greeting when she came to the piano to play, for the first time in this country, Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, op. 17.

This composer has found a recognition in recital programmes here which has aroused quite an interest in his larger works, and the first hearing of the concerto played last evening quite realized the pleasant anticipations concerning its characteristics, and fully justified Mme. King in her choice of it as one of the season's novelties.

Paderewski shows in all his works, and especially in this concerto, the influences of his nationality, and the singular fascination of the folk songs and dances of his native Poland is at all times felt in listening to the composition from his hand heard last evening. The opening allegro has the least evidence of genius of all the three movements of the concerto, as its themes are built up in traditional form and worked out in compliance with accepted rules.

It is in the lovely "Romance," making the middle movement, that the composer takes prominence over the musician, as its melodious ideas are put in the straightforward way that charms and delights by its very simplicity. In the final allegro, though, all the training and clever skill of the musician is brought to the aid of the composer and the grand melodious thematic ideas are worked out with a splendid freedom and dash that gives a most brilliant ending to this thoroughly delightful composition.

Mme. King gave her best efforts to the work she had in hand, and her many artistic triumphs before Boston audiences were vividly recalled by her performance of the solo part. She ranks with the best of the world's pianists, and has steadily held the high position she gained years ago, during her earlier tour in this country. She plays in a grand, broad style, which is seldom realized by women pianists, and with fine sentiment and expression in such movements as the "romance" of the concerto of last evening. She won her audience in the most honest fashion, and was rewarded with many recalls upon the completion of her task.

Another novelty claimed the attention of the audience at last evening's concert, this being a suite for the string orchestra and four horns by Mr. Arthur Whiting of this city, the work having its first public hearing on this occasion. It consists of six short movements styled "Præambulum" (appassionato assai), "Aria" (allegretto grazioso), "Scherzo" (vivace e scherzando), "Romanze (adagietto), and Finale (moderato e maestoso). Mr. Whiting wisely confided his composition to Mr. Nikisch for performance, and it received every possible attention in the reading given.

The suite shows evidence of the best work Mr. Whiting has made public, and is a vastly interesting study throughout. Much originality has been shown in the use of the novel combination of instruments for which the suite is composed, and the several movements are admirably contrasted. The audience was evidently impressed with the value of this novelty, and gave it a hearty commendation at its conclusion.

A very finished performance of the Bach-Esser "Toccata" made the introductory number of the programme, and the "Rakoczy" march brought the concert to a brilliant ending.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1891.

Symphony and Concerts Heard in Music Hall.

The programme arranged by Director Nikisch for last week's symphony concert was not the most enjoyable of the season. Several of the selections were drearily heavy, to say the least, and of variety there was little. The orchestra, too, was not always up to the Nikisch standard of excellence.

The most enjoyable, if not a particularly notable, number was the concerto in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 17, by I. J. Paderewski. The soloist was Mrs. Julia Rive-King, a pianist well-known here, and justly regarded as an excellent artist. She has a splendid command of technique, and intepprets with a deal of vigor and considerable expression. The Paderewski concerto would be a trying work for any artist, and Mrs. King is to be complimented upon her performance. She was cordially applauded and twice recalled at its conclusion. Of the three movements of the concerto, which it may be well to mention had not before been played in the United States, the andante is the most interesting. The solo instrument is pleasantly heard in what has been described as a rippling figure of accompaniment in triplets of semi-quavers, carried through 36 bars. It was in these passages that Mrs. King's skill appeared to greatest advantage. The subject matter of the concerto is generally characterized by melodies, and delightful effects of harmony are frequently gained. The final movement is marked by long passages of octaves, which were brilliantly played by the soloist. The orchestra is prominent throughout.

Bostonians naturally welcome an opportunity of hearing a composition of one of their own favorite musicians, accordingly much interest was felt in the performance of Mr. Arthur Whiting's suit for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8, a work not before heard in public. It cannot be said that this suite, for a unique combination of instruments, proved particularly pleasing to the audience. The usually undemonstrative rehearsal audience was uncommonly reserved in its applause. If Mr. Whiting's latest work does not rank among his best, it is certainly a scholarly composition, original in treatment.

A toccata by Bach-Esser was the opening number of the programme, and Liszt's Rokaczy march, brilliantly played, ended the concert.

There will be two soloists at this week's symphony concert, Miss Lena Little, vocalist; and Mr. Otto Roth, violinst. The programme will be as follows: Rubinstein, overture, "Antony and Cleopatra;" Gluck, aria, "Orfeo;" Spohr, concerto for violin in E minor. Songs with piano—"Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Secchi, "Love me or not;" Hiller, "Im Maien;" Dvorak, symphony in D minor.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1891.

FOURTH KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Kneisel quartette gave their fourth concert of the season in Union hall Monday evening. Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mrs. Helen Hopekirk were the assisting artists. The programme consisted of Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata for piano and violin in E minor; songs by Délibes and Otto Dresel; selections from the quartette music by Tschaikowski and Cherubini; and Haydn's Kaiser quartette in C major.

Mrs. Hopekirk's sonata is a creditable piece of music, limited, 'tis true, by the composer's inherent deficiency of created means, yet in an academic sense of the term it is scholarly and well made. The restless and numerous modulations of the first movement are somewhat amateurish in their effect; and, throughout the work the laborious efforts of the pianist to appear what it would seem impossible for her to be, namely, a well-endowed composer, are more or less impressive. The performance of the work was by the composer, and Mr. Kneisel.

The andante from the Tschaikowski quartette in D minor, the scherzo from the Cherubini quartette and the Kaiser quartette were one and all superbly given, and with some of the very best playing that has yet been heard from Mr. Kneisel and his associates. The tone-shadings were exceptionally well made, while the technical clearness and precision with which the works were performed could not have been surpassed.

Mrs. Wyman is a very interesting and accomplished singer, and though she lacked the temperament that seemed ever so much needed for the Délibes arioso, she fully atoned for this in her charming singing of the songs by Dresel.

[112]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15, 1891.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The sixth and last concert of the season of this organization was given in Music Hall, Monday evening. Pains had evidently been taken to make the programme one of the most attractive and most popular of all; and in both respects more than the usual amount of success was attained. Two novelties were presented, the first, a sonata for piano and violin, by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, which was played by the composer and Mr. Kneisel. The performance of this work demonstrated these facts: That this excellent pianist has the gift of melody, and is mistress of the art of composition, to a considerable degree. There are three movements, the first, which is preceded by a short introduction, being the most interesting. Its themes are fresh, move naturally, and are tastefully contrasted. The piano part is broad, brilliant and difficult, and is also at times too strong for that of the violin, which instrument, however, is given a better chance than is frequently the case in similar works written by those whose specialty is the pianoforte. The andante pastorale was a graceful opening, but cannot be said to come to much, as a whole. The principal theme of the closing presto, in rondo form, strongly suggests that of the scherzo in Schumann's second symphony, and the effect produced by it is dashing, if somewhat devoid of character. The sonata was played with a spirit that accorded well with its style, although the piano part was not as clear and well controlled as was to have been expected. Its close was greeted with much applause. The remaining novelty consisted of a group of songs (three of which were in manuscript) by Otto Dresel, sung by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman to the accompaniment of Mr. Arthur Foote. They proved to be melodious and artistic in design, and were rendered tastefully, although with little variety of tone. Mrs. Wyman was also heard in an arioso, by Delibes, wherein a similar monotony was noticeable, but which was sung in a manner broad and well sustained. Her efforts also won a warm response from the audience. The numbers performed by the quartet were the andante, from the string quartet in D major, by Tschaikowsky—a wholly exquisite movement, delightfully played; scherzo from Cherubini's quartet in E flat, and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet, the performance of which was marked by much delicacy and by a surpassingly fine ensemble that prevailed throughout. So ended the sixth season of this splend d quartet, whose artistic aims are more and more truly appreciated by many of the most musical people of Boston.

T. P. CURRIER.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 16.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op 17. ..... Paderewski
(First time in the United States.)
Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op 8, ... Arthur Whiting
(First time.)
Rakoczy March ..... Liszt

The concerto of Ignace Jean Paderewski was played last year in the cities of London, Paris, Berlin and Frankfort by the composer, and in each town the composition and the player evoked conflicting criticisms. Without doubt his personal appearance and mannerisms impaired the value of his performance. Last month he revisited Berlin, and Otto Lessmann, while he praised his playing, admitted that his long, dishevelled locks and the face of a poseur, which were once regarded as the exterior tokens of artistic temperament, prejudiced at first the hearer. In Paris he turned the heads of the women by the tenderness of his touch and the brilliancy of his bravura; but his concerto was not warmly praised by the musicians and critics, and the applause followed his playing of Liszt.

Paderewski evidently wrote this concerto as a show-piece, to be exhibited by him in the course of his wanderings; for it is a vehicle of virtuosity. It is written for the pianoforte, for that particular instrument and for its display; it is not written for a complete orchestra in which the pianoforte enters as an orchestral instrument. It is cast in the orthodox mould, the movements are separate, there is no attempt at great originality in treatment. It is a concerto which makes severer demands upon the player's technique than mind. The bravura-work is dazzling, and would be more effective were it not almost incessant. From the beginning to the end, there is but little relief, and technical difficulties are constantly held up before the eyes of the spectator. There is little or no depth of feeling, there is but very little feigned or genuine passion. Everything lies upon the surface, to be looked at, to be praised, to be forgotten. The concerto is like a long-continued setting-off of fireworks; rockets soar airward and die in fiery agony; pinwheels revolve and throw out dazzling sparks; colored lights and Roman candles, flower-pots and mines amuse and hold the attention; set pieces compel one to admire the art of the maker; the last spark is extinct, and the darkness which follows is the more intense.

Yes, this concerto is a show-piece, a collection of brilliant passages, a test of the performer's endurance; and Mrs. Rive-King played the pianoforte part exceedingly well. Difficulties were lost sight of in the ease with which she conquered them. The concerto is admirably adapted for the display of her peculiar talents. Her playing was characterized by crispness and clearness, accuracy and brilliancy. It was a pleasing exhibition of bravura, and that alone; for the music made no demands upon her temperament. There was no call upon the emotions of the player, there was no question of appealing to the feelings of the hearer. She was loudly applauded and twice recalled.

Mr. Whiting's suite is in six movements, and one of them, an intermezzo, was omitted Saturday evening. It is an ambitious, carefully-written work. It is free from triviality; it is devoid of even a suggestion of sensuousness. Such a work should certainly be treated with respect, for the aim of the composer is a lofty one, and his industry and perseverance are to be commended. But industry and perseverance when inspiration is not added unto them cannot produce a real and abiding thing of beauty. Airs which haunt and harmonies which delight are like unto the songs of the Elizabethan dramatists. "They are not to be hammered out by the most diligent ingenuity, not to be spun by the light of the most assiduously fed lamp. The wind of such inspiration blows where, and only where, it listeth."

Mr. Whiting takes his own music too seriously. Wishing to avoid sensuous strains, he strives to produce "intellectual" music; and he is apparently unable to stand at a distance from his work and hear it and judge it. It is the fashion in these days to sneer at the attention paid by some to the value of melody. But Handel and Bach, Mozart and Beethoven were men who invented tunes and took pains in the inventing of them. It is true that no composer thinks of a melody without certain accompanying harmonies; but in music which is destined to live and delight, the melody is definable and easily remembered. Mr. Whiting is unfortunately weak in melodic invention. He seeks to make up for this by a frequent and harassing use of odd rhythmical devices; and he almost always chooses the complex rather than the simple, to gain effects. The result is that much of his music seems strained and unnatural. Nor is it free from the reproach of dryness.

The scherzo of this suite is the most pleasing movement. It is graceful in thought and treatment, and is interesting throughout. The other movements seemed labored and perplexing. There was hearty applause after the finale, and Mr. Whiting was obliged to retire to it by bowing from his place in the parquet.

The other numbers of the programme are familiar and do not demand attention.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, March 21, includes Dvorak's Symphony in D minor; Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra"; and Spohr's Concerto for Violin in E minor, which will be played by Mr. Otto Roth. Miss Lena Little will sing an arie from Gluck's "Orfeo" and songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 16, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SATURDAY.

Mme. Julie Rive-King the Soloist in Paderewski's Concerto—A New Suite by Mr. Arthur Whiting—The Pianoforte Recital of Adele Aus der Ohe—Notes of Music.

There were some sharp contrasts in the concert of Saturday night, and at least one that was unfortunate. The programme began with a Bach Toccata arranged by Esser. The Toccata was one of the freest modes of expression used by Bach, and became with him a fantasie, or at times a prelude. It was frequently made to precede a fugue, in order that the free style might be contrasted with the stricter expression of counterpoint. Originally it was merely an instrumental fantasie intended to show the resources of some keyed instrument, most particularly the organ, and the root of the word in "Toccare" ("to touch") as well as the early application of the term by the Venetian organists illustrates this clearly. Such a work can rarely gain anything by orchestral transcription, and in a grandiloquent thundering forth of the composition by a modern full orchestra the spirit of the old master is reduced to a minimum. The work was also rather roughly played.

The concert for piano and orchestra by Paderewski was a totally different affair; it spoke of the "end of the century," in its bold modulations and its fiery tone-coloring. Yet the true Polish folk style was in it too, and the themes were interesting and well handled from the start. The chief fault of the first movement was that the piano and orchestra were served up separately, they seldom seemed to coalesce, and at times were even antagonistic, and had not Mme. Rive-King been possessed of a technique far above the common the piano part would have been crushed beneath the weight of instrumentation. The performance was a fine one, both on the part of the soloist and of the orchestra, and the ensemble was never disturbed. The themes in the first movement were all grandoise, but there was no straining to obtain an outre effect, as in the preceding sonata works of the composer. The cadenza of the movement was a brilliant affair, and Mme. Rive-King played it very finely.

In the romanza the solo instrument and the orchestra were better intertwined than in the allegro, and the themes were characteristic and in good contrast. The finale had something of the frenzy of Chopin's "Bacchanale," and there was a stupendous crescendo for piano and orchestra in which Mme. Rive-King held her own against the united power of the entire orchestra. At the conclusion of the work two recalls and the contents of a hothouse were poured out upon her.

The last number of the programme was Liszt's arrangement of the Rakoczy March, given with great brilliancy and power, but between the Polish fierté and the Hungarian bloodshed was sandwiched in a specimen of New England respectability, in the shape of Arthur Whiting's suite for strings and horns. The juxtaposition was unfortunate, and a most incongruous effect resulted, greatly to the disadvantage of the native work. It is not a pleasant task to condemn the ambitious work of a native composer, but the truth is that the "Appassionata" of the work was not impassioned, the "Romanza" not romantic, and the "Maestoso" not majestic, but excited. Difficulty there was in the work, enough and to spare, but mere difficulty does not constitute merit, and one can apply the old reply of Dorian, the Athenian, to the composition,—"Difficult! I wish it had been impossible!" The passages in arpeggioed chords for violins in the finale were very thorny for any but the greatest artists, but as our violinists are probably as fine a body of musicians as can be found in any orchestra in the world, the phrases were executed with considerable effect. The horns had also some difficult and original passages here. The musicians may well have asked themselves at the end of the work, as the little boy did when he had mastered the alphabet, "Is it worth while going through so much to get so little?" The Romanza seems to have met with shipwreck on the Wagnerian seas, and the influence of Brahms may also ve discerned in a few of its phrases. The Intermezzo was omitted; the suite was quite long enough without it. The aria, in which the cellos sustained the leading part, was the best movement of the whole work. Here there was no such striving after greatness such as marked the rest of the suite, and a good degree of melody, and a commendable shapeliness were apparent. But as a whole the work was disappointing and depressing. Every Bostonian will be glad that Mr. Nikisch is giving attention to the native muse, but one would still like to inquire if he has heard of Prof. John K. Paine and is aware that he is our greatest composer? A selection from "Oedipus Tyrannus" (which work is the high water mark of American composition) would be more acceptable than such a long and dry suite as an example of our musical efforts and advancement.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, MARCH 15, 1891.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with the admirable Esser arrangement of a Bach Toccata, which was brilliantly and beautifully played. It was followed by a concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17, by Ignace Jean Paderewski, the famous pianist, which was heard here for the first time. It is a strong work, characterized by originality, power and remarkable energy. It is in the most advanced phase of modern pianoforte technique, and is wholly of the new school, save that it is melodious, clear in meaning, and free from mere struggling after novelty at any cost. Unlike most piano concertos of contemporary date, it does not attempt to treat the solo instrument as an essential part of the orchestra, but fulfils the traditional office of the concerto to display the skill and taste of the player. It is well written, full of life and light, rich in finely contrasted effects, is nowhere vague, and is easily understood on a first hearing. The instrumentation is admirable. All three movements are equally interesting, musical and lucid, and a splendid vigor, unflaggingly sustained is a striking characteristic of the work. It was played by Mrs. Julia Rive-King who mastered the difficulties with which it bristles with brilliant finish. Her performance of the concerto was artistic thoughtful and inspiriting, her playing throughout being distinguished by ease, fluency, fire and thorough technical skill. Both the work and the artist were cordially applauded, Mrs. King receiving two recalls. After this came a suite for strings and four horns, in G-minor, op. 8, by Mr. Arthur Whiting. It consists of five movements,—a preamble, an aria, a scherzo, a romanza, and a finale. The music, with the exception of the scherzo, which is clear, bright and pleasing, is so vague, groping and unmeaning on a first hearing that we hesitate to pass a judgment on it. It seemed to us carefully made music, but with not a trace of inspiration or of anything resembling spontaneity in it; music always reaching out with great and apparent effort but failing to seize what it is grasping at. Its most curious aspect is its incongruous mingling of Brahms and Wagner; and it appears to have been made from the piano rather than thought out for the orchestra, much of the violin work suggesting piano rather than violin technique. It is studiously and well put together, but is full of struggle and polyphony signifying nothing. Mr. Whiting is manifestly a clever musician and an earnest student, but he does not appear to have any marked sense of tune. His work is always scholarly, but it is also always dry, labored and puzzling as to its meaning. It was finely played, and at its end there was much applause, the composer bowing his acknowledgments from the balcony in response to an evident call for him. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Liszt's "Rakoczy" march. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," Rubinstein; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus"; concerto for violin in E-minor, Spohr; a group of songs, and Dvorak's symphony in D-minor. There will be two soloists—Miss Lena Little and Mr. Otto Roth.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given on Monday night in Union Hall, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman assisting. The performances opened with a sonata for piano and violin, by Mrs. Hopekirk, a pleasing work, correct in form and abundant in spirit and freshness, but showing no marked skill in contrapuntal treatment and but little invention in thematic development. It is melodious, compact and, on the whole, effective and interesting. The opening movement is the best. Its themes stand in excellent contrast with each other, but the vigorous first subject is given such prominence by frequent repetition that the movement becomes monotonously lopsided. The andante is graceful and flowing in melody, and is not subjected to any elaborate working out. It is, in some respects, the most satisfying part of the sonata. The finale is fiery and its animation is well sustained, and themes from the preceding movements are ingeniously suggested. Here again, however, there is a lack of that contrapuntal treatment we look for in works of this kind, and again but little if any recourse is had to thematic development. On the whole the work is pretty rather than profound, but it has the merit of clearness, is never dull and the composer has always refrained from saying more than she was called upon to say. The work was played by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel with brilliancy and effect, and there was much hearty applause at the end, the composer receiving a cordial recall. The lovely andante of Tschaikowsky's quartet in D-major was exquisitely performed by the Quartet, as was also the Scherzo from Cherubini's Quartet in E-flat, major, a delightful movement. A masterly performance of Haydn's "Kaiser" Quartet brought the concert and the season to an end. Mrs. Wyman sang a tender and expressive ariosa by Delibes, and a group of four songs by the late Otto Dresel. The characteristics that have won for Mrs. Wyman's singing so large an appreciation here were heard in their fullest development, and the warm applause and the recalls that rewarded her efforts were fairly earned. The season of this organization has been very interesting. The works for strings performed were two quartets and a quintet by Beethoven, a quartet by Mozart, a quartet by Haydn, a quartet by Schumann, a quartet by Svensden, a minuet by Boccherini, a quartet satz by Schubert, and a scherzo by Cherubini. For piano and strings there were a quartet by Brahms, a piano trio and a fantasie for piano and violin by Schubert. The new works were a quartet for piano and strings by Arthur Foote, a sonata for piano and violin by Arthur Whiting, and a sonata for the same instrument by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 16, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the symphony concert Saturday evening was Mme. Julia Rive-King, who gave to the audience a performance of Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, its first production in America. It was as interesting on account of the beauty of the work itself as for the very thoughtful and brilliant interpretation of it by the pianist and orchestra. The composer is one of the noted pianists of the other country, and attained a large share of his proficiency on that instrument after he had become known as a composer. The concerto played Saturday evening was composed in 1888, and besides some octave passages in the last movement and some few difficult runs and trills it is more an ensemble work than a show piece for the piano. In fact, Mme. King might have selected from a number of other composers pieces more calculated to display the piano and her skill as a pianist. For this reason the choice was all the more creditable, the artist evidently preferring a new work and one that would be interesting from an artistic point of view. She was fully able to master the technical difficulties with ease, and she was at all times in perfect command of herself, the instrument and the spirit of the composition. The soloist was well received, and the rendition and work itself deserves leading mention in the performance of the evening.

Another novelty was a suite for strings and four horns, the composition of Arthur Whiting, one of our well known resident musicians. The suite is in six movements, only five of which were played, and the work is scholarly and marked by some very unique combinations for the different instruments. The aria is very pleasing, but as a whole the work appears at first hearing to be more pedantic than tuneful. It was listened to with interest by the audience, and the young composer who was seated in the gallery was compelled to acknowledge the plaudits of the auditors at its close. The suite was well played, under Mr. Nikisch, and for the other orchestral numbers there was a Toccata by Bach, arranged by Esser, and Liszt's "Rakoczy March." The latter gave much pleasure, and was superbly rendered. At the next concert there are to be two soloists—Otto Roth, violinist, and Miss Lena Little, a contralto, who has recently returned from Europe and has been received with much hearty commendation in New York. It will be Miss Little's first public appearance in this city.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, MARCH 20.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The seventh of the Cambridge series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was given last evening at the Sanders Theatre. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Prometheus" ..... Goldmark
First movement from Concerto for Violin ..... Brahms
Waldweben from Siegfried ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 3—"Im Walde" ..... Raff

Three of these numbers have been played at the concerts in Music Hall this season, and the concerto was brought out by Mr. Kneisel at the ninth concert of the Boston season of '89-'90. The programme was not the less interesting on this account.

The Goldmark overture gains somewhat upon a second hearing. At first the effective instrumentation seems to hide in a measure the inherent beauty and strength of the work, and it appears to be a collection of highly dramatic and brilliantly-colored passages. But there is more in this overture than merely well-contrived effects. It is a sincere and earnest composition, full of the modern spirit, showing here and there the marked influence of Wagner, as is the case with the later writings of Goldmark. Although it is not descriptive or programme music, it is very suggestive, and woe and compassion, vengeance and heroic suffering may be easily found in the overture by those who are not content unless music tells them something or has a "meaning." It was loudly applauded.

Between the modern Goldmark and the romantic Raff came the Waldweben of Wagner, and this excerpt from "Siegfried" evidently delighted the audience. Whether portions of Wagner's operas gain or lose by arranging them for concert purposes is a much debated question which it were idle here to discuss. There is no doubt, however, that such arrangements most favorably impress lovers of music who only know Wagner by his earlier operas and these excerpts. They thus hear the most musical pages of the later operas and are spared the dreary measures which come before and after. Audiences take it for granted that they are only sample numbers, and they fain would hear the complete operas. The whole is judged by a very small part. Then again such pages are more effective when thus isolated. The hearer's ear has not been fatigued, his mind is not jaded by the endless repetitions of the short phrases which are intended to constantly recall preceding scenes or anticipate those which ensue. It is by no means improbable that fifty years from now the Wagner of the "Ring" will be known chiefly by such extracts.

It was an excellent idea to give the first movement of the Brahms concerto and that movement alone. For the concerto is very long—the first movement takes twenty minutes—and however well it may be played, the attention flags before the end is reached. Mr. Kneisel played the extract superbly, with great beauty of tone, unexaggerated feeling, unfailing accuracy and rare intelligence. He was most enthusiastically applauded. The last concert of theseries will be given April 16.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[113]

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 16.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening at Music Hall, was as follows:

Toccata.....Bach—Esser
Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op 17.....Paderewski
(First time in the United States.)
Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op 8, MS.....Arthur Whiting
(First time.)
Rakoczy March.....Liszt

The concerto of Ignace Jean Paderewski was played last year in the cities of London, Paris, Berlin and Frankfort by the composer, and in each town the composition and the player provoked conflicting criticisms. Without doubt his personal appearance and mannerisms impaired the value of his performance. Last month he revisited Berlin, and Otto Lessmann, while he praised his playing, admitted that his long, dishevelled locks and the face of a poseur, which were once regarded as the exterior tokens of artistic temperament, prejudiced at first the hearer. In Paris he turned the heads of the women by the tenderness of his touch and the brilliancy of his bravura; but his concerto was not warmly praised by the musicians and critics, and the applause followed his playing of Liszt.

Paderewski evidently wrote this concerto as a show-piece, to be exhibited by him in the course of his wanderings; for it is a vehicle of virtuosity. It is written for the pianoforte, for that particular instrument and for its display; it is not written for a complete orchestra in which the pianoforte enters as an orchestral instrument. It is cast in the orthodox mould, the movements are separate, there is no attempt at great originality in treatment. It is a concerto which makes severer demands upon the player's technique than mind. The bravura-work is dazzling, and would be more effective were it not almost incessant. From the beginning to the end, there is but little relief, and technical difficulties are constantly held up before the eyes of the spectator. There is little or no depth of feeling, there is but very little feigned or genuine passion. Everything lies upon the surface, to be looked at, to be praised, to be forgotten. The concerto is like a long-continued setting-off of fireworks; rockets soar airward and die in fiery agony; pinwheels revolve and throw out dazzling sparks; colored lights and Roman candles, flower-pots and mines amuse and hold the attention; set pieces compel one to admire the art of the maker; the last spark is extinct, and the darkness which follows is the more intense.

Yes, this concerto is a show-piece, a collection of brilliant passages, a test of the performer's endurance; and Mrs. Rive-King played the pianoforte part exceedingly well. Difficulties were lost sight of in the ease with which she conquered them. The concerto is admirably adapted for the display of her peculiar talents. Her playing was characterized by crispness and clearness, accuracy and brilliancy. It was a pleasing exhibition of bravura, and that alone; for the music made no demands upon the emotions of the player, there was no question of appealing to the feelings of the hearer. She was loudly applauded and twice recalled.

Mr. Whiting's suite is in six movements, and one of them, an intermezzo, was omitted Saturday evening. It is an ambitious, carefully-written work. It is free from triviality; it is devoid of even a suggestion of sensuousness. Such a work should certainly be treated with respect, for the aim of the composer is a lofty one, and his industry and perseverance are to be commended. But industry and perseverance when inspiration is not added unto them cannot produce a real and abiding thing of beauty. Airs which haunt and harmonies which delight are like unto the songs of the Elizabethan dramatists. "They are not to be hammered out by the most diligent ingenuity, not to be spun by the light of the most assiduously fed lamp. The wind of such inspiration blows where, and only where, it listeth."

Mr. Whiting takes his own music too seriously. Wishing to avoid sensuous strains, he strives to produce "intellectual" music; and he is apparently unable to stand at a distance from his work and hear it and judge it. It is the fashion in these days to sneer at the attention paid by some to the value of melody. But Handel and Bach, Mozart and Beethoven were men who invented tunes and took pains in the inventing of them. It is true that no composer thinks of a melody without certain accompanying harmonies; but in music which is destined to live and delight, the melody is definable and easily remembered. Mr. Whiting is unfortunately weak in melodic invention. He seeks to make up for this by a frequent and harassing use of odd rhythmical devices; and he almost always chooses the complex rather than the simple, to gain effects. The result is that much of his music seems strained and unnatural. Nor is it free from the reproach of dryness.

The scherzo of this suite is the most pleasing movement. It is graceful in thought and treatment, and is interesting throughout. The other movements seemed labored and perplexing. There was hearty applause after the finale, and Mr. Whiting was obliged to response to it by bowing from his place in the gallery.

The other numbers of the programme are familiar and do not demand attention.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, March 21, includes Dvorak's Symphony in D minor; Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra"; and Spohr's Concerto for Violin in E minor, which will be played by Mr. Otto Roth. Miss Lena Little will sing an aria from Gluck's "Orfeo" and songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 16, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT OF SATURDAY.

Mme. Julie Rive-King the Soloist in Paderewski's Concerto—A New Suite by Mr. Arthur Whiting—The Pianoforte Recital of Adele Aus der Ohe—Notes of Music.

There were some sharp contrasts in the concert of Saturday night, and at least one that was unfortunate. The programme began with a Bach Toccata arranged by Esser. The Toccata was one of the freest modes of expression used by Bach, and became with him a fantasie, or at times a prelude. It was frequently made to precede a fugue, in order that the free style might be contrasted with the stricter expression of counterpoint. Originally it was merely an instrumental fantasie intended to show the resources of some keyed instrument, most particularly the organ, and the root of the word in "Toccare" ("to touch") as well as the early application of the term by the Venetian organists illustrates this clearly. Such a work can rarely gain anything by orchestral transcription, and in a grandiloquent thundering forth of the composition by a modern full orchestra the spirit of the old master is reduced to a minimum. The work was also rather roughly played.

The concert for piano and orchestra by Paderewski was a totally different affair; it spoke of the "end of the century," in its bold modulations and its fiery tone-coloring. Yet the true Polish folk style was in it too, and the themes were interesting and well handled from the start. The chief fault of the first movement was that the piano and orchestra were served up separately, they seldom seemed to coalesce, and at times were even antagonistic, and had not Mme. Rive-King been possessed of a technique far above the common the piano part would have been crushed beneath the weight of instrumentation. The performance was a fine one, both on the part of the soloist and of the orchestra, and the ensemble was never disturbed. The themes in the first movement were all grandoise, but there was no straining to obtain an outre effect, as in the preceding sonata works of the composer. The cadenza of the movement was a brilliant affair, and Mme. Rive-King played it very finely.

In the romanza the solo instrument and the orchestra were better intertwined than in the allegro, and the themes were characteristic and in good contrast. The finale had something of the frenzy of Chopin's "Bacchanale," and there was a stupendous crescendo for piano and orchestra in which Mme. Rive-King held her own against the united power of the entire orchestra. At the conclusion of the work two recalls and the contents of a hothouse were poured out upon her.

The last number of the programme was Liszt's arrangement of the Rakoczy March, given with great brilliancy and power, but between the Polish fierté and the Hungarian bloodshed was sandwiched in a specimen of New England respectability, in the shape of Arthur Whiting's suite for strings and horns. The juxtaposition was unfortunate; and a most incongruous effect resulted, greatly to the disadvantage of the native work. It is not a pleasant task to condemn the ambitious work of a native composer, but the truth is that the "Appassionata" of the work was not impassioned, the "Romanza" not romantic, and the "Maestoso" not majestic, but excited. Difficulty there was in the work, enough and to spare, but mere difficulty does not constitute merit, and one can apply the old reply of Dorian, the Athenian, to the composition,—"Difficult! I wish it had been impossible!" The passages in arpeggioed chords for violins in the finale were very thorny for any but the greatest artists, but as our violinists are probably as fine a body of musicians as can be found in any orchestra in the world, the phrases were executed with considerable effect. The horns had also some difficult and original passages here. The musicians may well have asked themselves at the end of the work, as the little boy did when he had mastered the alphabet, "Is it worth while going through so much to get so little?" The Romanza seems to have met with shipwreck on the Wagnerian seas, and the influence of Brahms may also be discerned in a few of its phrases. The Intermezzo was omitted; the suite was quite long enough without it. The aria, in which the cellos sustained the leading part, was the best movement of the whole work. Here there was no such striving after greatness such as marked the rest of the suite, and a good degree of melody, and a commendable shapeliness were apparent. But as a whole the work was disappointing and depressing. Every Bostonian will be glad that Mr. Nikisch is giving attention to the native muse, but one would still like to inquire if he has heard of Prof. John K. Paine and is aware that he is our greatest composer? A selection from "Oedipus Tyrannus" (which work is the high water mark of American composition) would be more acceptable than such a long and dry suite as an example of our musical efforts and advancement.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, MARCH 15, 1891.

The Symphony Concerts.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with the admirable Esser arrangement of a Bach Toccata, which was brilliantly and beautifully played. It was followed by a concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17, by Ignace Jean Paderewski, the famous pianist, which was heard here for the first time. It is a strong work, characterized by originality, power and remarkable energy. It is in the most advanced phase of modern pianoforte technique, and is wholly of the new school, save that it is melodious, clear in meaning, and free from mere struggling after novelty at any cost. Unlike most piano concertos of contemporary date, it does not attempt to treat the solo instrument as an essential part of the orchestra, but fulfils the traditional office of the concerto to display the skill and taste of the player. It is well written, full of life and light, rich in finely contrasted effects, is nowhere vague, and is easily understood on a first hearing. The instrumentation is admirable. All three movements are equally interesting, musical and lucid, and a splendid vigor, unflaggingly sustained is a striking characteristic of the work. It was played by Mrs. Julia Rive-King who mastered the difficulties with which it bristles with brilliant finish. Her performance of the concerto was artistic thoughtful and inspiriting, her playing throughout being distinguished by ease, fluency, fire and thorough technical skill. Both the work and the artist were cordially applauded, Mrs. King receiving two recalls. After this came a suite for strings and four horns, in G-minor, op. 8, by Mr. Arthur Whiting. It consists of five movements,—a preamble, an aria, a scherzo, a romanza, and a finale. The music, with the exception of the scherzo, which is clear, bright and pleasing, is so vague, groping and unmeaning on a first hearing that we hesitate to pass a judgment on it. It seemed to us carefully made music, but with not a trace of inspiration or of anything resembling spontaneity in it; music always reaching out with great and apparent effort but failing to seize what it is grasping at. Its most curious aspect is its incongruous mingling of Brahms and Wagner; and it appears to have been made from the piano rather than thought out for the orchestra, much of the violin work suggesting piano rather than violin technique. It is studiously and well put together, but is full of struggle and polyphony signifying nothing. Mr. Whiting is manifestly a clever musician and an earnest student, but he does not appear to have any marked sense of tune. His work is always scholarly, but it is also always dry, labored and puzzling as to its meaning. It was finely played, and at its end there was much applause, the composer bowing his acknowledgments from the balcony in response to an evident call for him. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Liszt's "Rakoczy" march. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," Rubinstein; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus"; concerto for violin in E-minor, Spohr; a group of songs, and Dvorak's symphony in D-minor. There will be two soloists—Miss Lena Little and Mr. Otto Roth.

The last of this season's series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartet was given on Monday night in Union Hall, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk and Mrs. Walter C. Wyman assisting. The performances opened with a sonata for piano and violin, by Mrs. Hopekirk, a pleasing work, correct in form and abundant in spirit and freshness, but showing no marked skill in contrapuntal treatment and but little invention in thematic development. It is melodious, compact and, on the whole, effective and interesting. The opening movement is the best. Its themes stand in excellent contrast with each other, but the vigorous first subject is given such prominence by frequent repetition that the movement becomes monotonously lopsided. The andante is graceful and flowing in melody, and is not subjected to any elaborate working out. It is, in some respects, the most satisfying part of the sonata. The finale is fiery and its animation is well sustained, and themes from the preceding movements are ingeniously suggested. Here again, however, there is a lack of that contrapuntal treatment we look for in works of this kind, and again but little if any recourse is had to thematic development. On the whole the work is pretty rather than profound, but it has the merit of clearness, is never dull and the composer has always refrained from saying more than she was called upon to say. The work was played by Mrs. Hopekirk and Mr. Kneisel with brilliancy and effect, and there was much hearty applause at the end, the composer receiving a cordial recall. The lovely andante of Tschaikowsky's quartet in D-major was exquisitely performed by the Quartet, as was also the Scherzo from Cherubini's Quartet in E-flat, major, a delightful movement. A masterly performance of Haydn's "Kaiser" Quartet brought the concert and the season to an end. Mrs. Wyman sang a tender and expressive ariosa by Delibes, and a group of four songs by the late Otto Dresel. The characteristics that have won for Mrs. Wyman's singing so large an appreciation here were heard in their fullest development, and the warm applause and the recalls that rewarded her efforts were fairly earned. The season of this organization has been very interesting. The works for strings performed were two quartets and a quintet by Beethoven, a quartet by Mozart, a quartet by Haydn, a quartet by Schumann, a quartet by Svensden, a minuet by Boccherini, a quartet satz by Schubert, and a scherzo by Cherubini. For piano and strings there were a quartet by Brahms, a piano trio and a fantasie for piano and violin by Schubert. The new works were a quartet for piano and strings by Arthur Foote, a sonata for piano and violin by Arthur Whiting, and a sonata for the same instrument by Mrs. Helen Hopekirk.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 16, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the symphony concert Saturday evening was Mme. Julia Rive-King, who gave to the audience a performance of Paderewski's concerto for piano and orchestra, its first production in America. It was as interesting on account of the beauty of the work itself as for the very thoughtful and brilliant interpretation of it by the pianist and orchestra. The composer is one of the noted pianists of the other country, and attained a large share of his proficiency on that instrument after he had become known as a composer. The concerto played Saturday evening was composed in 1888, and besides some octave passages in the last movement and some few difficult runs and trills it is more an ensemble work than a show piece for the piano. In fact, Mme. King might have selected from a number of other composers pieces more calculated to display the piano and her skill as a pianist. For this reason the choice was all more creditable, the artist evidently preferring a new work and one that would be interesting from an artistic point of view. She was fully able to master the technical difficulties with ease, and she was at all times in perfect command of herself, the instrument and the spirit of the composition. The soloist was well received, and the rendition and work itself deserves leading mention in the performance of the evening.

Another novelty was a suite for strings and four horns, the composition of Arthur Whiting, one of our well known resident musicians. The suite is in six movements, only five of which were played, and the work is scholarly and marked by some very unique combinations for the different instruments. The aria is very pleasing, but as a whole the work appears at first hearing to be more pedantic than tuneful. It was listened to with interest by the audience, and the young composer who was seated in the gallery was compelled to acknowledge the plaudits of the auditors at its close. The suite was well played, under Mr. Nikisch, and for the other orchestral numbers there was a Toccata by Bach, arranged by Esser, and Liszt's "Rakoczy March." The latter gave much pleasure, and was superbly rendered. At the next concert there are to be two soloists—Otto Roth, violinist, and Miss Lena Little, a contralto, who has recently returned from Europe and has been received with much hearty commendation in New York. It will be Miss Little's first public appearance in this city.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, MARCH 20.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The seventh of the Cambridge series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was given last evening at the Sanders Theatre. The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Prometheus".....Goldmark
First movement from Concerto for Violin....Brahms
Waldweben from Siegfried.....Wagner
Symphony No. 3—"Im Walde".....Raff

Three of these numbers have been played at the concerts in Music Hall this season, and the concerto was brought out by Mr. Kneisel at the ninth concert of the Boston season of '89-'90. The programme was not the less interesting on this account.

The Goldmark overture gains somewhat upon a second hearing. At first the effective instrumentation seems to hide in a measure the inherent beauty and strength of the work, and it appears to be a collection of highly dramatic and brilliantly-colored passages. But there is more in this overture than merely well-contrived effects. It is a sincere and earnest composition, full of the modern spirit, showing here and there the marked influence of Wagner, as is the case with the later writings of Goldmark. Although it is not descriptive or programme music, it is very suggestive, and woe and compassion, vengeance and heroic suffering may be easily found in the overture by those who are not content unless music tells them something or has a "meaning." It was loudly applauded.

Between the modern Goldmark and the romantic Raff came the Waldweben of Wagner, and this excerpt from "Siegfried" evidently delighted the audience. Whether portions of Wagner's operas gain or lose by arranging them for concert purposes is a much debated question which it were idle here to discuss. There is no doubt, however, that such arrangements most favorably impress lovers of music who only know Wagner by his earlier operas and these excerpts. They thus hear the most musical pages of the later operas and are spared the dreary measures which come before and after. Audiences take it for granted that they are only sample numbers, and they fain would hear the complete operas. The whole is judged by a very small part. Then again such pages are more effective when thus isolated. The hearer's ear has not been fatigued, his mind is not jaded by the endless repetitions of the short phrases which are intended to constantly recall preceding scenes or anticipate those which ensue. It is by no means improbable that fifty years from now the Wagner of the "Ring" will be known chiefly by such extracts.

It was an excellent idea to give the first movement of the Brahms concerto and that movement alone. For the concerto is very long—the first movement takes twenty minutes—and however well it may be played, the attention flags before the end is reached. Mr. Kneisel played the extract superbly; with great beauty of tone, unexaggerated feeling, unfailing accuracy and rare intelligence. He was most enthusiastically applauded. The last concert of theseries will be given April 16.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[113]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth programme (Saturday evening, March 14) was a strange one, without symphony. But not to that can we ascribe a smaller audience than usual. The counter-attraction of the theatre and Sarah Bernhardt must, we suppose, be held responsible for that. Yet the programme was unique and interesting in that way at least:

Bach-Esser: Toccata in F.
Paderewski: Op. 17, Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting: Op. 8, (MS.) Suite for Strings and four Horns in G minor.
(First performance.)
Liszt: Rakoczy March.
Soloist: Mrs. Julia Rivé-King.

The great Bach Organ Toccata, so effectively transcribed for orchestra by Esser, was a wholesome and a bracing introduction, as good as any but the greatest kind of overture. Played by many instruments, with an individual intelligence and will behind each, the melodic outline and the interweaving of the parts become to unaccustomed ears much clearer than when heard upon the organ. You have to listen long to the great ocean rolling in its waves before detecting any distinct form or figure; and a great full organ is not unlike the ocean in its multitudinous, bewildering mass of tones not set apart by accent. In Esser's arrangement the leading subject taken by the strings, entering and answered by one body after another of them, or tutti contrasted with alternating parts, on long-held pedal points, has a right hearty, reassuring sound; and the wind band, kept in reserve for the great chords of the counter-subject, comes in with splendid color and effect. A few concluding slow chords seem to have been appended to the arrangement, probably because the fugue, which commonly follows, is left off. The Toccata was nobly and superbly played. Each instrument told effectively; but it would be good to hear Professor Paine play it shortly after once more on the great organ, could that but come to life again!

It is long since we have had the pleasure of hearing that excellent pianist, Mrs. Rivé-King, perform in Boston. She was warmly greeted, had a very superior Chickering Grand to play on, and acquitted herself even more admirably than in the old Harvard Association concerts, where she won so much distinction. This time she grappled with a very novel, very original and trying task for a pianist, in the concerto by Paderewski, a much younger Russian composer than Tschaikowsky, and, judging by this first impression, one more original, imaginative, genial, satisfying. We confess we looked forward to the novelty not without fear, but were agreeably disappointed. This ambitious composition of the young Russian Pole (we should have called him) is much in the spirit of the Polish national music, proud and dreamy, and partaking of the Slavonic peculiarities of tonality. The Allegro begins with a long orchestral tutti. The themes are individual and striking, exciting expectation which is never disappointed. When the piano takes up the main thread of discourse, it develops it with brilliant life and spirit, and with great ingenuity and subtlety, never losing itself in devious passages bristling with all sorts of difficulties. And the game seems worth the candle. You feel that the movement has a meaning; it has something to say, something spontaneous, of inward prompting; whether you understand it, whether it quite understands itself, is not so sure. In the latter part of it are several cadenza-like passages, where the piano seems to enter upon a musing soliloquy, but is soon joined by sympathetic companions (a few instruments). These have great beauty and expression, and were beautifully done both by the solo and companion instruments. A real and elaborate cadenza soon follows, "starting largo and increasing in force, passion and speed as it proceeds." A solo for the English horn adds interest to this latter portion of the Allegro.

The second movement, a romanza (Andante), introduced by horns, but with the theme entering in the oboes, has justly been called "quaintly original and takingly melodious." The motion grows more and more animated and exciting toward the middle, but calms down to a quiet ending. The Finale (allegro molto vivace) fully vindicates that marking of its time and character. It has "a tremendous passage of octaves for both hands," and a "long peroration, replete with brilliant passages of octaves, scales, arpeggios and double shakes," which begin "broadly," wax to a presto and make an effective ending in the major of the key. Mrs. King was equal to all this, singularly perfect in technique, sure and discreet in reading, phrasing, accent, light and shade, and played her part, which is the principal, as if the music had taken full possession of her. Nor could she have had a better accompaniment, or complement, than she found in that orchestra.

A suite for string orchestra and four horns, and in six movements, most of them elaborate, was something new under the sun. The combination proved more interesting than we were prepared for, especially in several places where the four horns moved in two distinct pairs. The "mellow horn," as we are wont to hear it characterized, is also capable of a rough, stern quality of tone. It can work itself into a passion; and this was very largely the case in Mr. Whiting's Preambulum (Appassionato assai). It was indeed highly impassioned, like an outburst of conflicting emotions, a wellnigh desperate struggle and protest against fate, an impatient grapple with an insoluble life riddle. The horns seem in no good humor, and the strings wax and warm into a high state of excitement, a rapid and protracted agitato, rather interesting if one only knew what it was all about;—perhaps the moody, irrepressible and morbid youthful phase of a too conscious life? The prelude, although stormy, seems to be consistent and to hang together well. A calmer mood must follow. Hence the Intermezzo (Minuet tempo, which was omitted without warning to the hearers. Then comes a grateful relief. The horns (although they have not worn out their welcome) conclude to be silent for a while, and four 'celli take up the melody of the Aria (a graceful Allegretto in 4-4). This Aria is in D major, for modern Suites do not follow the example of those of the time of Bach and Handel, which confined all their many movements within the circle of one and the same key. In the fourth movement, a playful and vivacious Scherzo, in E-flat, 3-8, the horns are welcomed back with a fresh zest. They enter in a mood as lively and excited, if not as stormy, as that of the Preamble. They establish a merry motion of sixteenth notes by in the minor, with muted strings and syncopated rhythm, seemed to us by all odds the happiest, most original and most interesting movement of the Suite; it was certainly the most enlivening.

The Romanze (adagietto), in G, 4-4, is serious and serene again, and has considerable beauty, both in the horns and strings and in the way in which they help each other. Following up the thread of emotional development which we picked up at a venture in speaking of the preamble, we may imagine that the successive phases of life's history have here reached a certain height of reconciliation. And perhaps we may further recognize in the moderate and majestic movement of the Finale, which is in G major, 4-4, the period of useful life and action, self-controlled and balanced, equable, unswerving, strong.

This Suite is an ambitious, an elaborate, audacious and far-reaching effort, in some respects far-fetched. But it is an earnest, energetic effort. Perhaps certain modern idols (models) of the young composer are in some degree responsible for it. Be this as it may, we must own to following long passages of it with a clinging, pleased attention; and if we cannot fully understand it from a single hearing, and cannot claim a right to judge its worth, we cannot resist a feeling that there is something in it—indeed, much more than we expected.

Liszt's Racoczy March was Hungarian enough, spirited enough, sensational, ingeniously enough put together, full of surprises and contrasted color, to make a brilliant ending to a concert all so strange; but its impression is tame after that made by Berlioz with the same motives and material. Yet Liszt was the Hungarian, Berlioz only French.

J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1891.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Whiting's New Suite.

The nineteenth Symphony programme was:

Bach-Esser.....Toccata
Paderewski.....Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17.
Allegro.
Romanza (andante).
Alegro molto vivace.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting..Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8, MS.
Praeambulum (appassionato assai).
Aria (allegretto grazioso).
Scherzo (vivace e scherzando).
Romanze (adagieto).
Finale (moderato e maestoso).
(First performance.)
Liszt.....Rakoczy March

The piano concerto by Paderewski is a work which we cannot compute on a first hearing; it may be the production of genius; we would not undertake to say it was wholly formless and illogical—it certainly left a negative impression. In form it defers to the classic model, yet the treatment is modern. Its spirit is Slavonic, the peculiarity of some of its melodies being due to this fact. Paderewski is a Pole, and he writes with a good deal of ardor, the solo part of the concerto being brilliant, even vehement, in those movements where virtuosity is expected. With the orchestra he has a neat touch, while as to the qualities of fancy and imagination the slow movement (romanza) of a rhapsodic character is evidence. The concerto had a good performance, and it certainly is not Mme. Rive-King's fault that we did not take to it more decisively. Mme. King is to be complimented on her enterprise in bringing out the work—it had not been heard in the country before last Saturday—which doubtless made more of an appeal to her virtuosic than her spiritual side. She plays with great earnestness, yet not heavily, for her bravura is good, and in the passages admitting of sentiment she showed herself sympathetic.

There are qualities in Mr. Whiting's suite which lead one to think this disciple of Brahms is mellowing somewhat, for while the piece is full of "inward brooding and contemplation," more scholastic than emotional, there is a scherzo that is charming, and a finale so original and compact, without any extraneous matter, as to show a decided imagination. The romanze suffers from over development. Mr. Whiting has shown in the instrumentation of the suite a good deal of invention, and while we do not find ourselves impressed with the lasting value of his unique combination of instruments, he has worked out his problem skilfully, distributing his melodies about equally in the different parts, and with a nice estimate of values, some of the scoring for strings being very artistic. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance, and had evidently given the work careful study. The several movements, particularly the scherzo, were applauded, and at the end of the work the composer answered an evident call by bowing his acknowledgments from his seat in the gallery. The Bach-Esser toccata was finely played, and the Hungarian "Rakoczy," if it did not cause a wild fever of patriotism in the breasts of listening Americans, made the thoughtful reflect on the lack of something similarly inspiring in native lore. The next concert will be interesting. The programme is: Rubinstein, overture, "Antony and Cleopatra" (first time); Gluck, aria, "Orfeo"; Spohr, concerto for violin, in E minor. Songs with piano: (a) Brahms, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin"; (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not"; (c) Hiller, "Im Maien." Dvorák, symphony in D minor. Soloists: Miss Lena Little, Mr. Otto Roth.

Personals.

Mr. Nikisch has chosen a fine Wagner programme for performance in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington next week, namely: Overture and barcarolle "Tannhäuser" (Paris Version); Lohengrin's Legend, (Mr. Andreas Dippel); Waldweben, duet from Act I. of "Die Gotterdammerung," (Mme. Meilke and Mr. Dippel); "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey"; prelude and closing scene, from "Tristan."

[114]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK. — OVERTURE. "Prometheus."

BRAHMS. — FIRST MOVEMENT from CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

WAGNER. — WALDWEBEN from SIEGFRIED.

RAFF. — SYMPHONY No. 3. "Im Walde."

IN THE DAY TIME. (Allegro).—IN THE TWILIGHT. (Largo).—DANCE OF THE DRYADS. (Allegro assai).—NIGHT. SILENT BREATH OF NIGHT IN THE FOREST. ENTRANCE AND DEPARTURE OF THE WILD HUNT WITH FRAU HOLLE AND WOTAN. BREAK OF DAY. (Allegro.)

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Broadway Theatre, Norwich.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT,

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 26, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. — OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.

MAILLARD. — ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."

SCHUBERT. — UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.

SAINT-SAENS. — DANSE MACABRE.

SERVAIS — FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for VIOLONCELLO.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) GOLDMARK. — DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE. — THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF. — VORSATZ.

WAGNER. — OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth programme (Saturday evening, March 14) was a strange one, without symphony. But not to that can we ascribe a smaller audience than usual. The counter-attraction of the theatre and Sarah Bernhardt must, we suppose, be held responsible for that. Yet the programme was unique and interesting in that way at least:

Bach-Esser: Toccata in F.
Paderewski: Op. 17, Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting: Op. 8, (MS.) Suite for Strings and four Horns in G minor.
(First performance.)
Liszt: Rakoczy March.
Soloist: Mrs. Julia Rivé-King.

The great Bach Organ Toccata, so effectively transcribed for orchestra by Esser, was a wholesome and a bracing introduction, as good as any but the greatest kind of overture. Played by many instruments, with an individual intelligence and will behind each, the melodic outline and the interweaving of the parts become to unaccustomed ears much clearer than when heard upon the organ. You have to listen long to the great ocean rolling in its waves before detecting any distinct form or figure; and a great full organ is not unlike the ocean in its multitudinous, bewildering mass of tones not set apart by accent. In Esser's arrangement the leading subject taken by the strings, entering and answered by one body after another of them, or tutti contrasted with alternating parts, on long-held pedal points, has a right hearty, reassuring sound; and the wind band, kept in reserve for the great chords of the counter-subject, comes in with splendid color and effect. A few concluding slow chords seem to have been appended to the arrangement, probably because the fugue, which commonly follows, is left off. The Toccata was nobly and superbly played. Each instrument told effectively; but it would be good to hear Professor Paine play it shortly after once more on the great organ, could that but come to life again!

It is long since we have had the pleasure of hearing that excellent pianist, Mrs. Rivé-King, perform in Boston. She was warmly greeted, had a very superior Chickering Grand to play on, and acquitted herself even more admirably than in the old Harvard Association concerts, where she won so much distinction. This time she grappled with a very novel, very original and trying task for a pianist, in the concerto by Paderewski, a much younger Russian composer than Tschaikowsky, and, judging by this first impression, one more original, imaginative, genial, satisfying. We confess we looked forward to the novelty not without fear, but were agreeably disappointed. This ambitious composition of the young Russian Pole (we should have called him) is much in the spirit of the Polish national music, proud and dreamy, and partaking of the Slavonic peculiarities of tonality. The Allegro begins with a long orchestral tutti. The themes are individual and striking, exciting expectation which is never disappointed. When the piano takes up the main thread of discourse, it develops it with brilliant life and spirit, and with great ingenuity and subtlety, never losing itself in devious passages bristling with all sorts of difficulties. And the game seems worth the candle. You feel that the movement has a meaning: it has something to say, something spontaneous, of inward prompting; whether you understand it, whether it quite understands itself, is not so sure. In the latter part of it are several cadenza-like passages, where the piano seems to enter upon a musing soliloquy, but is soon joined by sympathetic companions (a few instruments). These have great beauty and expression, and were beautifully done both by the solo and companion instruments. A real and elaborate cadenza soon follows, "starting largo and increasing in force, passion and speed as it proceeds." A solo for the English horn adds interest to this latter portion of the Allegro.

The second movement, a romanza (Andante), introduced by horns, but with the theme entering in the oboes, has justly been called "quaintly original and takingly melodious." The motion grows more and more animated and exciting toward the middle, but calms down to a quiet ending. The Finale (allegro molto vivace) fully vindicates that marking of its time and character. It has "a tremendous passage of octaves for both hands," and a "long peroration, replete with brilliant passages of octaves, scales, arpeggios and double shakes," which begin "broadly," wax to a presto and make an effective ending in the major of the key. Mrs. King was equal to all this, singularly perfect in technique, sure and discreet in reading, phrasing, accent, light and shade, and played her part, which is the principal, as if the music had taken full possession of her. Nor could she have had a better accompaniment, or complement, than she found in that orchestra.

A suite for string orchestra and four horns, and in six movements, most of them elaborate, was something new under the sun. The combination proved more interesting than we were prepared for, especially in several places where the four horns moved in two distinct pairs. The "mellow horn," as we are wont to hear it characterized, is also capable of a rough, stern quality of tone. It can work itself into a passion; and this was very largely the case in Mr. Whiting's Præambulum (Appassionato assai). It was indeed highly impassioned, like an outburst of conflicting emotions, a wellnigh desperate struggle and protest against fate, an impatient grapple with an insoluble life riddle. The horns seem in no good humor, and the strings wax and warm into a high state of excitement, a rapid and protracted agitato, rather interesting if one only knew what it was all about;—perhaps the moody, irrepressible and morbid youthful phase of a too conscious life? The prelude, although stormy, seems to be consistent and to hang together well. A calmer mood must follow. Hence the Intermezzo (Minuet tempo, which was omitted without warning to the hearers. Then comes a grateful relief. The horns (although they have not worn out their welcome) conclude to be silent for a while, and four 'celli take up the melody of the Aria (a graceful Allegretto in 4-4). This Aria is in D major, for modern Suites do not follow the example of those of the time of Bach and Handel, which confined all their many movements within the circle of one and the same key. In the fourth movement, a playful and vivacious Scherzo, in E-flat, 3-8, the horns are welcomed back with a fresh zest. They enter in a mood as lively and excited, if not as stormy, as that of the Preamble. They establish a merry motion of sixteenth notes by way of accompaniment to the principal figure in the first violins. This Scherzo, with its Trio in the minor, with muted strings and syncopated rhythm, seemed to us by all odds the happiest, most original and most interesting movement of the Suite; it was certainly the most enlivening.

The Romanze (adagietto), in G, 4-4, is serious and serene again, and has considerable beauty, both in the horns and strings and in the way in which they help each other. Following up the thread of emotional development which we picked up at a venture in speaking of the preamble, we may imagine that the successive phases of life's history have here reached a certain height of reconciliation. And perhaps we may further recognize in the moderate and majestic movement of the Finale, which is in G major, 4-4, the period of useful life and action, self-controlled and balanced, equable, unswerving, strong.

This Suite is an ambitious, an elaborate, audacious and far-reaching effort, in some respects far-fetched. But it is an earnest, energetic effort. Perhaps certain modern idols (models) of the young composer are in some degree responsible for it. Be this as it may, we must own to following long passages of it with a clinging, pleased attention; and if we cannot fully understand it from a single hearing, and cannot claim a right to judge its worth, we cannot resist a feeling that there is something in it—indeed, much more than we expected.

Liszt's Racoczy March was Hungarian enough, spirited enough, sensational, ingeniously enough put together, full of surprises and contrasted color, to make a brilliant ending to a concert all so strange; but its impression is tame after that made by Berlioz with the same motives and material. Yet Liszt was the Hungarian, Berlioz only French.

J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1891.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Whiting's New Suite.

The nineteenth Symphony programme was:

Bach-Esser.....Toccata
Paderewski.....Concerto for piano and orchestra, in A minor, op. 17.
Allegro.
Romanza (andante).
Alegro molto vivace.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting..Suite for strings and four horns, in G minor, op. 8, MS.
Præambulum (appassionato assai).
Aria (allegretto grazioso).
Scherzo (vivace e scherzando).
Romanze (adagieto).
Finale (moderato e maestoso).
(First performance.)
Liszt.....Rakoczy March

The piano concerto by Paderewski is a work which we cannot compute on a first hearing; it may be the production of genius; we would not undertake to say it was wholly formless and illogical—it certainly left a negative impression. In form it defers to the classic model, yet the treatment is modern. Its spirit is Slavonic, the peculiarity of some of its melodies being due to this fact. Paderewski is a Pole, and he writes with a good deal of ardor, the solo part of the concerto being brilliant, even vehement, in those movements where virtuosity is expected. With the orchestra he has a neat touch, while as to the qualities of fancy and imagination the slow movement (romanza) of a rhapsodic character is evidence. The concerto had a good performance, and it certainly is not Mme. Rive-King's fault that we did not take to it more decisively. Mme. King is to be complimented on her enterprise in bringing out the work—it had not been heard in the country before last Saturday—which doubtless made more of an appeal to her virtuosic than her spiritual side. She plays with great earnestness, yet not heavily, for her bravura is good, and in the passages admitting of sentiment she showed herself sympathetic.

There are qualities in Mr. Whiting's suite which lead one to think this disciple of Brahms is mellowing somewhat, for while the piece is full of "inward brooding and contemplation," more scholastic than emotional, there is a scherzo that is charming, and a finale so original and compact, without any extraneous matter, as to show a decided imagination. The romanze suffers from over development. Mr. Whiting has shown in the instrumentation of the suite a good deal of invention, and while we do not find ourselves impressed with the lasting value of his unique combination of instruments, he has worked out his problem skilfully, distributing his melodies about equally in the different parts, and with a nice estimate of values, some of the scoring for strings being very artistic. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance, and had evidently given the work careful study. The several movements, particularly the scherzo, were applauded, and at the end of the work the composer answered an evident call by bowing his acknowledgments from his seat in the gallery. The Bach-Esser toccata was finely played, and the Hungarian "Rakoczy," if it did not cause a wild fever of patriotism in the breasts of listening Americans, made the thoughtful reflect on the lack of something similarly inspiring in native lore. The next concert will be interesting. The programme is: Rubinstein, overture, "Antony and Cleopatra" (first time); Gluck, aria, "Orfeo"; Spohr, concerto for violin, in E minor. Songs with piano: (a) Brahms, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin"; (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not"; (c) Hiller, "Im Maien." Dvorák, symphony in D minor. Soloists: Miss Lena Little, Mr. Otto Roth.

Paragraphs.

Mr. Nikisch has chosen a fine Wagner programme for performance in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington next week, namely: Overture and barcarolle "Tannhäuser" (Paris Version); Lohengrin's Legend, (Mr. Andreas Dippel); Waldweben, duet from Act I. of "Die Gotterdammerung," (Mme. Meilke and Mr. Dippel); "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey"; prelude and closing scene, from "Tristan."

[114]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19TH, AT 7.45, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Prometheus."
BRAHMS.	FIRST MOVEMENT from CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
WAGNER.	WALDWEBEN from SIEGFRIED.
RAFF.	SYMPHONY No. 3. "Im Walde." IN THE DAY TIME. (Allegro.)—IN THE TWILIGHT. (Largo).—DANCE OF THE DRYADS. (Allegro assai).—NIGHT. SILENT BREATH OF NIGHT IN THE FOREST. ENTRANCE AND DEPARTURE OF THE WILD HUNT WITH FRAU HOLLE AND WOTAN. BREAK OF DAY. (Allegro.)

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Broadway Theatre, Norwich.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT,

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 26, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.
MAILLARD.	ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
SAINT-SAENS.	DANSE MACABRE.
SERVAIS	FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for VIOLONCELLO
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE.	THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF.	VORSATZ.
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

The Beacon.

BOSTON. SATURDAY. MAR. 21, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and last pieces on last Saturday's programme were familiar—Esser's orchestral arrangement of the Bach Toccata in F, and Liszt's pictorial presentation of the Rococzy march. These were played with volume and spirit, but the former would have been improved by more of the steadiness of an organ and less of the fluctuating light and shade of an orchestral fantasia. The second place was occupied by the pianoforte concerto of the Polish composer and virtuoso, Paderewski, which has been given frequently in Europe during the last three years, but had not been heard in the United States before. Even more distinctively than the recently-performed concerto of Scharwenka, this is a composition made by a pianist for the display of the piano and of mastery over it. The solo instrument, although it joins constantly with the orchestra and is sometimes only tributary to it, is never merged in it, but stands forward clear, individual and attractive, whether as leader or accompanist. This is not all, however; it is full of melody and the melody is full of character and vitality, while the treatment commands respect for many merits in thematic development, tone-color and proportion in scoring, in spite of the fact that technique has unquestionably been considered above art, the player more than the composer. The opening bar attracts attention by its short decided group of notes which ring like a "Qui va là?"; this phrase, occurring frequently throughout the movement, keeps stirring anew the interest, which however, even without its appeal, would not be likely to flag. The energetic motion of the movement is interrupted by some graceful and reflective passages, and the conclusion runs up to a powerful climax. The second movement, which is shaped into a romance, is more Italian than Slavonic in form and feeling, and gives a quiet gratification. The finale is a mass of glittering phrases and brilliant effects, some of which are fairly flashed upon the listeners. A single calm and dignified episode gives fine relief to the splendor, and the conclusion is reached by a sustained flight through long and resplendent passages. Mme. Rivé-King fitted herself and her style perfectly to the concerto. Ever ready, even in the most perplexing difficulties, with execution lucent in purity and unhesitating in velocity, strong without excess and facile without triviality, she won great honors for herself and heightened the possible effects of the music. Another novelty was also given—five movements from a suite written by Mr. Arthur Whiting for a string orchestra re-enforced by the horn quartette. In a general way the idea underlying this combination is good, although the unmalleable horn quality limits the use to which that instrument can be put. But Mr. Whiting was not altogether sucessful in his results. He seemed at times to be thinking in the language of the piano and trying to put what he thought into the language of the other instruments; hence there were awkward and unfavorable passages for the violinists and a frequent distribution of chords through such arpeggios as only a piano or harp could give easily and adequately. The composition, apart from this defect, is well put together so far as scholarship and worthy intent are concerned; but it smells of the lamp, and intellect has more part in it than æsthetic disposition. The aria, without horns, is sweet and flowing, with a more gracious yielding to the spirit of melody than the other movements, while the scherzo has the most freshness and freedom of treatment, a florid counterpointed passage for the basses standing up strongly. The work was well received and Mr. Whiting was obliged to rise in his place and bow his acknowledgments of applause.

Tonight's programme names Dvorák's D minor symphony, Spohr's E-minor violin concerto to be played by Mr. Roth, the first performance of Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture, and vocal music by the contralto, Miss Lena Little, who will sing the "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orfeo," and songs by Brahms, Hiller and Secchi.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

Mrs. Lena Little and Mr. Otto Roth were the soloists for the twentieth Symphony concert in Music hall last evening. Mrs. Little has an uncommonly good contralto voice and sang with exceptionally artistic intelligence and feeling an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus" and songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller. Mr. Roth was heard in a refined and masterly performance of Spohr's seventh concerto. Cherubini's "Anacreon" and Dvorak's second symphony were admirably played by the orchestra.

[115]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Miss Lena Little, who has recently come to this country from England, is a singer to whom it is a pleasure to listen. She has a contralto voice, of fair compass, which has apparently been subjected to intelligent training. Most of her tones are excellent in quality, some of them warm and rich; although her voice is not one of power, its heighest notes especially being rather weak. At her first appearance in this city, at the twentieth symphony rehearsal and concert, she sang the aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's opera of "Orpheus," and a group of songs with pianoforte accompaniment. Her interpretation of the aria was characterized by an evident appreciation of the music; still, it must be confessed that in point of expressiveness, it was simple and dignified, rather than broad and passionate. Of the three songs, Miss Little was, perhaps, the most successful in "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," by Brahms, her phrasing being well considered and musical. Secchi's "Love me or not," afforded her an opportunity to display her power of sustaining tones, which she improved in an artistic manner; and Hiller's "In Maien" was sung with considerable freedom and facility. In both numbers, while there were indications that her style is not yet that of the full-fledged artist, and that her emotions were too studiously restrained, her singing evinced the possession of a genuinely musical temperament; and her efforts were warmly appreciated by the audience, who recalled her several times.

Mr. Otto Roth also appeared as soloist, in Spohr's concerto for the violin, No. 7, in E minor. He showed good judgment in his selection, for the concerto not only had the merit of comparative brevity, but it formed an admirable vehicle for the exhibition of his pure, delicate tone, and his technique in its present stage of development. It has the conventional three movements, of which the first is the weakest, both in matter and structure. The adagio has a streak of gentle melancholy, and is attractive throughout. The rondo, allegretto, is unusually fresh and bright, and its two principal themes are effectively contrasted. Altogether, the work is interesting, old-fashioned, of course, but warmed by a few of those color-effects, which came to Spohr, as all things come to the hand of genius, and free from the suspicion of "padding," either by the introduction of cadenzas, or by the senseless extension of "free fantasia" passages. Mr. Roth's performance demonstrated that he had made still further gains in repose and fluency, and was so finished and tasteful as to leave little to be desired. He, too, was warmly received, and was recalled with much heartiness.

The opening number was Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," in place of Rubinstein's new overture to "Antony and Cleopatra," which is now announced to be given at the next concert. After all, the change may prove to have been an agreeable one, unless this recent work of the Russian composer is more virile and original than are its immediate predecessors. Like the Spohr concerto, this favorite overture, by one of the fathers of the French school, has an atmosphere of transparent brightness about it that is reviving—perhaps, because it does not require that close attention that too often makes a labor of pleasure. From the first bar of the allegro, which turns one's thoughts involuntarily to the opening of the allegro of the "Eroica" symphony, all is tuneful and clear, and when played with as much smoothness, beauty of tone (in the strings, particularly), and discrimination, as was the case on this occasion, it must always be sure of a welcome from the true lover of music.

Dvorak's symphony, in D minor, opus 70, came at the end of the programme. That this work contains manifold beauties, hardly any one will deny. Its profusion of themes, the fascinating, skillful, and generally coherent elaboration of them, and its alternating warm and brilliant orchestration, all tend to retain one's interest to the end. And yet no deep note seems to have been sounded in any one of its four movements; while its beauties are by no means superficial, they are not of that nature that excites within one the desire to hear the work again and again. It was well-played, although the moderate, sometimes dragging tempi that Mr Nikisch permitted to prevail, particularly in the first and last movements, softened to an undue extent its natural ruggedness of character.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a fine performance of the perennially fresh and beautiful "Anacreon" overture, and ended with a richly colored, vigorous and impressive rendering of Dvorak's Symphony No. 2, in D minor. The contrasts in the concert were very great, Gluck, Cherubini, Spohr and Dvorak presenting a variety of styles that covered a remarkably wide field. After the overture came the "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," which was sung by Miss Lena Little. The artist's voice is a mezzo soprano quasi contralto, and shows every evidence of excellent and careful training. It is somewhat worn, however, and is dry and cold in quality, thin in the lower notes and hollow in the upper. She sings with skill and a certain refinement of taste, but in a perfunctory and colorless style. Her reading of the recitative to the Gluck aria was dry and undramatic, and the air itself was taken at too slow a pace to produce the most desirable effect, the result being tame and inexpressive. Later in the evening Miss Little sang "Wie bist du meine Koenigen," "Love me or not," by Secchi, and Hiller's "In Maien." The second of these, which, by the way, was hardly up to the standard of music which is, or which should be maintained at these concerts, was sung pleasingly and gracefully and was the artist's best success of the evening. The Brahms song was ineffectively given and the Hiller selection was unfortunate and was moreover sung in a "choppy" manner that did not improve it. Miss Little sings with sincerity and inoffensively, and might be heard to advantage in a smaller hall; but here she seemed lacking in force and warmth. She was heartily applauded, and recalled twice after both of her contributions to the concert. Mr. Otto Roth also appeared as a soloist, and played Spohr's concerto for violin, No. 7, in E minor, a work overflowing with graceful melody, beautiful in its orchestration, and of course masterly in the skill with which it is written for the solo instrument and for the display of the technical perfection and the taste of the soloist. Mr. Roth played it with exquisite finish and in a chaste and expressive style that was delightful in effect. Something more in volume of tone might have been desirable, but otherwise the performance was of the highest beauty, both in purity and warmth of sentiment and brilliancy and precision of technique. Above all it was artistic in the best sense, of the word, and two enthusiastic and appreciative recalls rewarded the artist at its close. The next concert will take place April 4, when will be performed: Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Svensden; Concerto for piano No. 2, in A, Liszt. [illegible] for orchestra, Lalo; and Rubinstein's overture [illegible] Cleopatra." The soloist will be

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 Season of 1890-91. ***

Leave Boston, Sunday, March 22, at midnight, Providence Depot.
Arrive in New York, Monday, March 23, 7 A. M.
Leave New York Monday, March. 23, at 9 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 11.35 A.M,
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal at 2.30 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, March 24, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore 12.35 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore Wednesday, March 25, 10.35 A.M.
Arrive Washington 11.30 A.M.
RIGGS HOUSE.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, directly after concert.
Arrive New York Thursday, March 26, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Thursday, March 26, 1 P.M.
Arrive New London 4.27 P.M.
Leave New London 4.30 P.M.
Arrive Norwich 5 P. M.
SUPPER WAUREGAN HOUSE.
Concert at Broadway Theatre 8 P.M.
Leave Norwich directly after concert.
Sleeping Cars ready at New London.
Arrive Boston Friday, March 27 at 7 A.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1891.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 22, 1891.

The Symphony Concert, Soloists, Lena Little, Otto Roth.

At last evening's Symphony concert, Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, brought forward a singer, in the person of Miss Lena Little, contralto, who stepped immediately into popular favor, and who honestly won the applause which her contributions to the programme called out. Miss Little came before her audience almost a stranger, as her position among the artists of the New York Metropolitan Opera House company during the season has not made her prominently known here, but she is a singer who will always find a welcome here in the future. Her voice is a singularly true one, and so musical in its quality as to give a peculiar charm to all her vocal efforts. She sings with admirable taste and expression, and shows a skill in technique that gives evidence of a thorough preparation for her position as a soloist.

Her intepretation of the grand aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," "I have lost my Eurydice," quite charmed the audience by the intelligence and good taste shown in its delivery, and in the group of songs at the piano, including Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Secchi's "Love me or not," and Hiller's "Im Maien," the singer fully confirmed the good impression she made in the aria. Mr. Nikisch gave his valuable aid as accompanist to the songs, and Miss Little was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause resulting from her efforts.

Mr. Otto Roth, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, was given his annual appearance as soloist, contributing the Spohr concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor, No. 7. The characteristics of this work were eminently in keeping with the style of this player, and he is to be heartily congratulated upon the success which he attained on this occasion. His tone has gained somewhat in breadth and fullness since his appearance at these concerts last season, and his playing shows a marked improvement in many ways. He was heartily applauded at the end of the concerto, and many times recalled.

The Cherubini overture "Anacreon" was splendidly played as the opening number of the programme, and an equally satisfactory rendering of Dvorak's symphony No. 2, in D minor, ended the concert.

The orchestra makes another of its occasional tours the coming week, resuming the season's series of concerts here on Saturday, April 4, when Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 23, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The concerts by the Symphony Orchestra are nearing the close of the season—that of Saturday evening being the twentieth in the series. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch had provided two soloists, Mr. Otto Roth, a member of the band, and Miss Lena Little, a young lady who has spent some years in London, and has done considerable singing there with success. It was her first public appearance in Boston, though she had been heard several times in New York. For the pleasure of listening to her singing the Music Hall audience is under great obligations to the management of these concerts—for it was indeed a pleasure. Her first selection, to the accompaniment of the orchestra, was the recitative and aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and served to show a broad and artistic style of delivery—possibly not so dramatic as has been heard in this aria—and a voice whose sweetness and power added to a charm of manner which was refinement itself, delighted the listener at once. At the same time it commanded the attention by something which it is difficult to describe. With the piano later in the evening she gave a group of songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller—each different in character and requiring entirely different interpretation. Miss Little met the requirements of each style in a masterly manner, demonstrating readily the secret of her reputation in England in this class of selections. The song by Secchi, "Love Me or Not," given in English, was very artistically done, showing excellence in sostenuto and entire absence from vibrato. The Brahms number was also well delivered. Her reception was very cordial, and she will be heartily welcomed to Boston in future appearances.

Mr. Roth chose a concerto for violin by Spohr—a work of great merit, and exceedingly pleasing withal. Mr. Roth improves at every appearance before the Symphony audiences, and his playing was marked by a conscientious understanding of the thought of the composer and a good technique. The accent in the rondo was strongly marked, without obtrusiveness, and the adagio was very cleanly played. He was vigorously recalled. The orchestra gave in a delightful manner Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, a change from the originally arranged programme, owing, it is understood, to the illness of the young harpist, and closed the concert with Dvorak's symphony in D minor. This production, so characteristic and so remarkable in its treatment, was given a broad rendition by the orchestra, and rounded out an excellent programme. This week there is no Symphony. At the next concert Mr. Arthur Freidheim, a pupil of Liszt, a pianist to whom the technical difficulties of the works of his teacher are said to be as play to him, is to be the soloist.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAR. 21, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and last pieces on last Saturday's programme were familiar—Esser's orchestral arrangement of the Bach Toccata in F, and Liszt's pictorial presentation of the Rococzy march. These were played with volume and spirit, but the former would have been improved by more of the steadiness of an organ and less of the fluctuating light and shade of an orchestral fantasia. The second place was occupied by the pianoforte concerto of the Polish composer and virtuoso, Paderewski, which has been given frequently in Europe during the last three years, but had not been heard in the United States before. Even more distinctively than the recently-performed concerto of Scharwenka, this is a composition made by a pianist for the display of the piano and of mastery over it. The solo instrument, although it joins constantly with the orchestra and is sometimes only tributary to it, is never merged in it, but stands forward clear, individual and attractive, whether as leader or accompanist. This is not all, however; it is full of melody and the melody is full of character and vitality, while the treatment commands respect for many merits in thematic development, tone-color and proportion in scoring, in spite of the fact that technique has unquestionably been considered above art, the player more than the composer. The opening bar attracts attention by its short decided group of notes which ring like a "Qui va là?"; this phrase, occurring frequently throughout the movement, keeps stirring anew the interest, which however, even without its appeal, would not be likely to flag. The energetic motion of the movement is interrupted by some graceful and reflective passages, and the conclusion runs up to a powerful climax. The second movement, which is shaped into a romance, is more Italian than Slavonic in form and feeling, and gives a quiet gratification. The finale is a mass of glittering phrases and brilliant effects, some of which are fairly flashed upon the listeners. A single calm and dignified episode gives fine relief to the splendor, and the conclusion is reached by a sustained flight through long and resplendent passages. Mme. Rivé-King fitted herself and her style perfectly to the concerto. Ever ready, even in the most perplexing difficulties, with execution lucent in purity and unhesitating in velocity, strong without excess and facile without triviality, she won great honors for herself and heightened the possible effects of the music. Another novelty was also given—five movements from a suite written by Mr. Arthur Whiting for a string orchestra re-enforced by the horn quartette. In a general way the idea underlying this combination is good, although the unmalleable horn quality limits the use to which that instrument can be put. But Mr. Whiting was not altogether sucessful in his results. He seemed at times to be thinking in the language of the piano and trying to put what he thought into the language of the other instruments; hence there were awkward and unfavorable passages for the violinists and a frequent distribution of chords through such arpeggios as only a piano or harp could give easily and adequately. The composition, apart from this defect, is well put together so far as scholarship and worthy intent are concerned; but it smells of the lamp, and intellect has more part in it than æsthetic disposition. The aria, without horns, is sweet and flowing, with a more gracious yielding to the spirit of melody than the other movements, while the scherzo has the most freshness and freedom of treatment, a florid counterpointed passage for the basses standing up strongly. The work was well received and Mr. Whiting was obliged to rise in his place and bow his acknowledgments of applause.

Tonight's programme names Dvorák's D minor symphony, Spohr's E-minor violin concerto to be played by Mr. Roth, the first performance of Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture, and vocal music by the contralto, Miss Lena Little, who will sing the "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orfeo," and songs by Brahms, Hiller and Secchi.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

Mrs. Lena Little and Mr. Otto Roth were the soloists for the twentieth Symphony concert in Music hall last evening. Mrs. Little has an uncommonly good contralto voice and sang with exceptionally artistic intelligence and feeling an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus" and songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller. Mr. Roth was heard in a refined and masterly performance of Spohr's seventh concerto. Cherubini's "Anacreon" and Dvorak's second symphony were admirably played by the orchestra.

[115]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Miss Lena Little, who has recently come to this country from England, is a singer to whom it is a pleasure to listen. She has a contralto voice, of fair compass, which has apparently been subjected to intelligent training. Most of her tones are excellent in quality, some of them warm and rich; although her voice is not one of power, its heighest notes especially being rather weak. At her first appearance in this city, at the twentieth symphony rehearsal and concert, she sang the aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's opera of "Orpheus," and a group of songs with pianoforte accompaniment. Her interpretation of the aria was characterized by an evident appreciation of the music; still, it must be confessed that in point of expressiveness, it was simple and dignified, rather than broad and passionate. Of the three songs, Miss Little was, perhaps, the most successful in "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," by Brahms, her phrasing being well considered and musical. Secchi's "Love me or not," afforded her an opportunity to display her power of sustaining tones, which she improved in an artistic manner; and Hiller's "In Maien" was sung with considerable freedom and facility. In both numbers, while there were indications that her style is not yet that of the full-fledged artist, and that her emotions were too studiously restrained, her singing evinced the possession of a genuinely musical temperament; and her efforts were warmly appreciated by the audience, who recalled her several times.

Mr. Otto Roth also appeared as soloist, in Spohr's concerto for the violin, No. 7, in E minor. He showed good judgment in his selection, for the concerto not only had the merit of comparative brevity, but it formed an admirable vehicle for the exhibition of his pure, delicate tone, and his technique in its present stage of development. It has the conventional three movements, of which the first is the weakest, both in matter and structure. The adagio has a streak of gentle melancholy, and is attractive throughout. The rondo, allegretto, is unusually fresh and bright, and its two principal themes are effectively contrasted. Altogether, the work is interesting, old-fashioned, of course, but warmed by a few of those color-effects, which came to Spohr, as all things come to the hand of genius, and free from the suspicion of "padding," either by the introduction of cadenzas, or by the senseless extension of "free fantasia" passages. Mr. Roth's performance demonstrated that he had made still further gains in repose and fluency, and was so finished and tasteful as to leave little to be desired. He, too, was warmly received, and was recalled with much heartiness.

The opening number was Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," in place of Rubinstein's new overture to "Antony and Cleopatra," which is now announced to be given at the next concert. After all, the change may prove to have been an agreeable one, unless this recent work of the Russian composer is more virile and original than are its immediate predecessors. Like the Spohr concerto, this favorite overture, by one of the fathers of the French school, has an atmosphere of transparent brightness about it that is reviving—perhaps, because it does not require that close attention that too often makes a labor of pleasure. From the first bar of the allegro, which turns one's thoughts involuntarily to the opening of the allegro of the "Eroica" symphony, all is tuneful and clear, and when played with as much smoothness, beauty of tone (in the strings, particularly), and discrimination, as was the case on this occasion, it must always be sure of a welcome from the true lover of music.

Dvorak's symphony, in D minor, opus 70, came at the end of the programme. That this work contains manifold beauties, hardly any one will deny. Its profusion of themes, the fascinating, skillful, and generally coherent elaboration of them, and its alternating warm and brilliant orchestration, all tend to retain one's interest to the end. And yet no deep note seems to have been sounded in any one of its four movements; while its beauties are by no means superficial, they are not of that nature that excites within one the desire to hear the work again and again. It was well-played, although the moderate, sometimes dragging tempi that Mr Nikisch permitted to prevail, particularly in the first and last movements, softened to an undue extent its natural ruggedness of character.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a fine performance of the perennially fresh and beautiful "Anacreon" overture, and ended with a richly colored, vigorous and impressive rendering of Dvorak's Symphony No. 2, in D minor. The contrasts in the concert were very great, Gluck, Cherubini, Spohr and Dvorak presenting a variety of styles that covered a remarkably wide field. After the overture came the "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," which was sung by Miss Lena Little. The artist's voice is a mezzo soprano quasi contralto, and shows every evidence of excellent and careful training. It is somewhat worn, however, and is dry and cold in quality, thin in the lower notes and hollow in the upper. She sings with skill and a certain refinement of taste, but in a perfunctory and colorless style. Her reading of the recitative to the Gluck aria was dry and undramatic, and the air itself was taken at too slow a pace to produce the most desirable effect, the result being tame and inexpressive. Later in the evening Miss Little sang "Wie bist du meine Koenigen," "Love me or not," by Secchi, and Hiller's "In Maien." The second of these, which, by the way, was hardly up to the standard of music which is, or which should be maintained at these concerts, was sung pleasingly and gracefully and was the artist's best success of the evening. The Brahms song was ineffectively given and the Hiller selection was unfortunate and was moreover sung in a "choppy" manner that did not improve it. Miss Little sings with sincerity and inoffensively, and might be heard to advantage in a smaller hall; but here she seemed lacking in force and warmth. She was heartily applauded, and recalled twice after both of her contributions to the concert. Mr. Otto Roth also appeared as a soloist, and played Spohr's concerto for violin, No. 7, in E minor, a work overflowing with graceful melody, beautiful in its orchestration, and of course masterly in the skill with which it is written for the solo instrument and for the display of the technical perfection and the taste of the soloist. Mr. Roth played it with exquisite finish and in a chaste and expressive style that was delightful in effect. Something more in volume of tone might have been desirable, but otherwise the performance was of the highest beauty, both in purity and warmth of sentiment and brilliancy and precision of technique. Above all it was artistic in the best sense of the word, and two enthusiastic and appreciative recalls rewarded the artist at its close. The next concert will take place April 4, when will be performed: Symphony No. 2, in B flat, Svenseden; Concerto for piano No. 2, in A, Liszt. Rhapsody, for orchestra, Lalo; and Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra." The soloist will be

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 Season of 1890-91. ***

Leave Boston, Sunday, March 22, at midnight, Providence Depot.
Arrive in New York, Monday, March 23, 7 A. M.
Leave New York Monday, March. 23, at 9 A. M., via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Philadelphia 11.35 A.M,
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
Rehearsal at 2.30 P.M.
Concert at Academy of Music, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, March 24, at 10 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 24th and Chestnut Streets.
Arrive Baltimore 12.35 P.M.
CARROLTON HOUSE.
Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 00 P.M.
Leave Baltimore Wednesday, March 25, 10.35 A.M.
Arrive Washington 11.30 A.M.
RIGGS HOUSE.
Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore & Ohio Depot, directly after concert.
Arrive New York Thursday, March 26, at 7.00 A.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Thursday, March 26, 1 P.M.
Arrive New London 4.27 P.M.
Leave New London 4.30 P.M.
Arrive Norwich 5 P. M.
SUPPER WAUREGAN HOUSE.
Concert at Broadway Theatre 8 P.M.
Leave Norwich directly after concert.
Sleeping Cars ready at New London.
Arrive Boston Friday, March 27 at 7 A.M., Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1891.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MARCH 22, 1891.

The Symphony Concert, Soloists, Lena Little, Otto Roth.

At last evening's Symphony concert, Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, brought forward a singer, in the person of Miss Lena Little, contralto, who stepped immediately into popular favor, and who honestly won the applause which her contributions to the programme called out. Miss Little came before her audience almost a stranger, as her position among the artists of the New York Metropolitan Opera House company during the season has not made her prominently known here, but she is a singer who will always find a welcome here in the future. Her voice is a singularly true one, and so musical in its quality as to give a peculiar charm to all her vocal efforts. She sings with admirable taste and expression, and shows a skill in technique that gives evidence of a thorough preparation for her position as a soloist.

Her intepretation of the grand aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," "I have lost my Eurydice," quite charmed the audience by the intelligence and good taste shown in its delivery, and in the group of songs at the piano, including Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Secchi's "Love me or not," and Hiller's "Im Maien," the singer fully confirmed the good impression she made in the aria. Mr. Nikisch gave his valuable aid as accompanist to the songs, and Miss Little was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause resulting from her efforts.

Mr. Otto Roth, a member of the violin section of the orchestra, was given his annual appearance as soloist, contributing the Spohr concerto for violin and orchestra in E minor, No. 7. The characteristics of this work were eminently in keeping with the style of this player, and he is to be heartily congratulated upon the success which he attained on this occasion. His tone has gained somewhat in breadth and fullness since his appearance at these concerts last season, and his playing shows a marked improvement in many ways. He was heart ly applauded at the end of the concerto, and many times recalled.

The Cherubini overture "Anacreon" was splendidly played as the opening number of the programme, and an equally satisfactory rendering of Dvorak's symphony No. 2, in D minor, ended the concert.

The orchestra makes another of its occasional tours the coming week, resuming the season's series of concerts here on Saturday, April 4, when Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 23, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The concerts by the Symphony Orchestra are nearing the close of the season—that of Saturday evening being the twentieth in the series. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch had provided two soloists, Mr. Otto Roth, a member of the band, and Miss Lena Little, a young lady who has spent some years in London, and has done considerable singing there with success. It was her first public appearance in Boston, though she had been heard several times in New York. For the pleasure of listening to her singing the Music Hall audience is under great obligations to the management of these concerts—for it was indeed a pleasure. Her first selection, to the accompaniment of the orchestra, was the recitative and aria, "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and served to show a broad and artistic style of delivery—possibly not so dramatic as has been heard in this aria—and a voice whose sweetness and power added to a charm of manner which was refinement itself, delighted the listener at once. At the same time it commanded the attention by something which it is difficult to describe. With the piano later in the evening she gave a group of songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller—each different in character and requiring entirely different interpretation. Miss Little met the requirements of each style in a masterly manner, demonstrating readily the secret of her reputation in England in this class of selections. The song by Secchi, "Love Me or Not," given in English, was very artistically done, showing excellence in sostenuto and entire absence from vibrato. The Brahms number was also well delivered. Her reception was very cordial, and she will be heartily welcomed to Boston in future appearances.

Mr. Roth chose a concerto for violin by Spohr—a work of great merit, and exceedingly pleasing withal. Mr. Roth improves at every appearance before the Symphony audiences, and his playing was marked by a conscientious understanding of the thought of the composer and a good technique. The accent in the rondo was strongly marked, without obtrusiveness, and the adagio was very cleanly played. He was vigorously recalled. The orchestra gave in a delightful manner Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, a change from the originally arranged programme, owing, it is understood, to the illness of the young harpist, and closed the concert with Dvorak's symphony in D minor. This production, so characteristic and so remarkable in its treatment, was given a broad rendition by the orchestra, and rounded out an excellent programme. This week there is no Symphony. At the next concert Mr. Arthur Freidheim, a pupil of Liszt, a pianist to whom the technical difficulties of the works of his teacher are said to be as play to him, is to be the soloist.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 23.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Aria, "I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus".....Gluck
Concerto for Violin, No. 7, in E minor.....Spohr
Wie Bist du Meine Koenigin.....Brahms
Love Me or Not.....Secchi
Im Malen.....Hiller
Symphony No. 2, in D minor, op. 70.....Dvorak

The voice of Miss Lena Little, who sang at the last rehearsal and concert, is a mezzo-soprano, and certain of its tones are of genuine contralto quality. It is not distinguished by warmth and color. The upper tones are pale, the lower tones are not free from harshness. Her voice moves slowly in rapid passages, as if with effort, and her delivery is at times sluggish. Yet she has been well taught, and in her singing the skill and patience of the teacher are more noticeable than any display of individuality or temperament. Her musical nature would seem to be phlegmatic.

Therefore her selection of the great air from Gluck's "Orpheus" was unfortunate, for it disclosed the lacks of her musical outfit. The delivery of the recitative was monotonous and devoid of dramatic expression. The air itself was taken in a tempo which was at variance with the rhythmical construction, the traditions, and the expressed wish of the composer. In the original score of the Italian version (1762), the air is marked vivace. In that of the French version (1774) it is marked andante con moto. In each version the half note is taken as the unit of measure and not the quarter note, and Gluck has indicated this. But in the absence of such directions the very character and rhythm of the air cry out against the tempo chosen by Miss Little. The episodes marked adagio and moderato were not read with dramatic feeling, and there was no contrast made between the passionate grief of the chief theme and the tenderness and entreaties of the episodes. And so the whole air suffered and its effect was lost. A contemporary of Gluck named Boyé claimed that if the words "I have found my Eurydice, and nothing can equal my joy," were substituted for the original text, Gluck's music would be as expressive in the one case as the other. But Miss Little was not seized by poignant grief or keen delight. Her Orpheus seemed as resigned to his loss as the hero of Offenbach's operetta, who would never have sought Eurydice had not Public Opinion coerced him.

The three songs sung later in the evening gave Miss Little a better opportunity for the display of her art, and the second, though it is a flimsy thing, was sung delightfully. The singer was loudly applauded, and she was recalled twice, after the aria and after the songs.

Mr. Otto Roth gave a very artistic performance of Spohr's violin concerto No. 7. It was admirable from a technical standpoint, and it was musically beautiful in conception and interpretation. Mr. Roth's tone is small in volume; but tone is by no means everything in violin playing, and the finish and purity of his art make ample amends for any deficiency in this respect. The concerto itself is a good example of Spohr's agreeable and melodious style, which is always free from that which could possibly offend; and perhaps for that very reason it produces no marked effect upon the hearer except to put him in a state of vague amiability. Mr. Roth was enthusiastically applauded, a fitting tribute to this modest and talented musician.

The "Anacreon" overture is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. It was given last season in Music Hall; it lately appeared upon the programme of a Cambridge concert; it was heard Saturday evening. Now Cherubini was not a man of one overture; he wrote others which would be listened to with pleasure. The "Anacreon" was better played by the orchestra than was the symphony of Dvorak. The latter was given with a vigor which at times was unbridled.

The programme of the next concert, which will be given Saturday evening, April 4, includes Svendsen's second Symphony, Lalo's Rhapsody, Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, and Rubinstein's overture "Anthony and Cleopatra," which will be played in Boston for the first time. Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1891.

Symphony Concerts Nearing Their Close.

There were two soloists at yesterday's Symphony concert, Miss Lena Little, contralto, and Mr. Otto Roth, violinist. Miss Little has been heard here in parlor and chamber concerts, but her appearance at Friday's rehearsal was practically an introduction to the Boston public. She made a decidedly pleasant impression. Her voice, without being remarkable for either compass or power, is exceedingly agreeable in tonal quality, and she sings with uncommon grace and ease. Her enunciation is always delightfully clear, and her phrasing is most artistic. Perhaps the least pleasing feature of her voice is the lack of richness in the upper register, but this is compensated for by the general smoothness of tone.

She first sang the aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus," with orchestral accompaniment. She interpreted the exquisite music with artistic effect and displayed a deal of sentiment, making the selection most welcome, even though it did occasionally betray the limitations of her voice. That Miss Little is a ballad rather than a dramatic singer, was shown in the group of songs she sang with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, later in the concert. Her delivery of the dainty, old-fashioned song by Secchi, entitled "Love Me or Not," could scarcely have been bettered. It was decidedly her best effort. Brahms' "Wie Bist du Mein Koenigin" was also well sung, but Hiller's "Im Malen" was not quite so satisfactory.

Mr. Otto Roth has not now to gain the recognition from Symphony audiences. He some time since established himself in their cordial favor. His performance of Spohr's delightful concerto for violin in E minor, No. 7, won him new honors. He was thrice recalled at its conclusion and well deserved all the hearty applause accorded him. Mr. Roth has an admirable command of technique, a fact made particularly evident by his execution of the brilliant and unusual staccato passages for which Spohr's concert is noted. Admirable also is the sincerity of his playing. He phrases superbly, and, in short, Mr. Roth is a young violinist for whom a brilliant future may be confidently expected.

Owing to the illness of the youthful harpist of the orchestra it was necessary to substitute Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" for the announced "Antony and Cleopatra" overture. Mr. Nikisch gave a splendid reading of this favorite work, and displayed, as not before, the beauties of Cherubini's novel melodies and strange orchestral effects. Dvorak's Symphony, No. 2, in D minor, op. 70, ended the programme. It was a satisfactory performance throughout, but was most enjoyable for the magnificent interpretation given the scherzo movement.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist at this week's concert and the programme will consist of Svendsen's symphony No. 2, in B flat; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major; Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra, and Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1891.

Mrs. Rive-King Produces Paderewski's Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

John S. Dwight contributes the following review of the Paderewski concerto, and a suite by an American composer to the Transcript:

The nineteenth programme (Saturday evening, March 14) was a strange one, without symphony. But not to that can we ascribe a smaller audience than usual. The counter-attraction of the theatre and Sarah Bernhardt must, we suppose, be held responsible for that. Yet the programme was unique and interesting in that way at least.

Bach-Esser: Toccata in F.
Paderewski: Op. 17, Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting: Op. 8 (MS.) Suite for Strings and four Horns in G minor.
(First performance.)
Liszt: Rakoczy March.
Soloist: Mrs. Julia Rivé-King.

The great Bach Organ Toccata, so effectively transcribed for orchestra by Esser, was a wholesome and a bracing introduction, as good as any but the greatest kind of overture. Played by many instruments, with an individual intelligence and will behind each, the melodic outline and the interweaving of the parts become to unaccustomed ears much clearer than when heard upon the organ. You have to listen long to the great ocean rolling in its waves before detecting any distinct form of figure; and a great full organ is not unlike the ocean in its multitudinous, bewildering mass of tones not set apart by accent. In Esser's arrangement the leading subject taken by the strings, entering and answered by one body after another of them, or tutti contrasted with alternating parts, on long-held pedal points, has a right hearty, reassuring sound; and the wind band, kept in reserve for the great chords of the counter-subject, comes in with splendid color and effect. A few concluding slow chords seem to have been appended to the arrangement, probably because the fugue, which commonly follows, is left off. The Toccata was nobly and superbly played. Each instrument told effectively; but it would be good to hear Professor Paine play it shortly after once more on the great organ, could that but come to life again!

It is long since we have had the pleasure of hearing that excellent pianist, Mrs. Rivé-King, perform in Boston. She was warmly greeted, had a very superior Chickering Grand to play on, and acquitted herself even more admirably than in the old Harvard Association concerts, where she won so much distinction. This time she grappled with a very novel, very original and trying task for a pianist, in the concerto by Paderewski, a much younger Russian composer than Tschaikowsky, and judging by this first impression, one more original, imaginative, genial, satisfying. We confess we looked forward to the novelty not without fear, but were agreeably disappointed. This ambitious composition of the young Russian Pole (we should have called him) is much in the spirit of the Polish national music, proud and dreamy, and partaking of the Slavonic peculiarities of tonality. The Allegro begins with a long orchestral tutti. The themes are individual and striking, exciting expectation which is never disappointed. When the piano takes up the main thread of discourse, it develops it with brilliant life and spirit, and with great ingenuity and subtlety, never losing itself in devious passages bristling with all sorts of difficulties. And the game seems worth the candle. You feel that the movement has a meaning; it has something to say, something spontaneous, of inward prompting; whether you understand it, whether it quite understands itself, is not so sure. In the latter part of it are several cadenza-like passages, where the piano seems to enter upon amusing soliloquy, but is soon joined by sympathetic companions (a few instruments). These have great beauty and expression, and were beautifully done both by the solo and companion instruments. A real and elaborate cadenza soon follows, "starting largo and increasing in force, passion and speed as it proceeds." A solo for the English horn adds interest to this latter portion of the Allegro.

The second movement, a romanza (andante), introduced by horns, but with the theme entering in the oboes, has justly been called "quaintly original and takingly melodious." The motion grows more and more animated and exciting toward the middle, but calms down to a quiet ending. The finale (allegro molto vivace) fully vindicates that marking of its time and character. It has "a tremendous passage of octaves for both hands," and a "long peroration, replete with brilliant passages of octaves, scales, arpeggios and double shakes," which begin "broadly," wax to a presto and make an effective ending in the major of the key. Mrs. King was equal to all this, singularly perfect in technique, sure and discreet in reading, phrasing, accent, light and shade, and played her part, which is the principal, as if the music had taken full possession of her. Nor could she have had a better accompaniment, or complement, than she found in that orchestra.

A suite for string orchestra and four horns, and in six movements, most of them elaborate, was something new under the sun. The combination proved more interesting than we were prepared for, especially in several places where the four horns moved in two distinct pairs. The "mellow horn," as we are wont to hear it characterized, is also capable of a rough, stern quality of tone. It can work itself into a passion, and this was very largely the case in Mr. Whiting's Præambulum (Appassionato assai). It was indeed highly impassioned, like an outburst of conflicting emotions, a well-nigh desperate struggle and protest against fate, an impatient grapple with an insoluble life riddle. The horns seem in no good humor, and the strings wax and warm into a high state of excitement, a rapid and protracted agitato, rather interesting if one only knew what it was all about—perhaps the moody, irrepressible and morbid youthful phase of a too conscious life? The prelude, although stormy, seems to be consistent and to hang together well. A calmer mood must follow. Hence the Intermezzo (Minuet tempo), which was omitted without warning to the hearers. Then comes a grateful relief. The horns (although they have not worn out their welcome) conclude to be silent for a while, and four 'cellos take up the melody of the Aria (a graceful Allegretto in 4-4). This aria is in D major, for modern suites do not follow the example of those of the time of Bach and Handel, which confined all their many movements within the circle of one and the same key. In the fourth movement, a playful and vivacious Scherzo in E flat 3-8, the horns are welcomed back with a fresh zest. They enter in a mood as lively and excited, if not as stormy, as that of the Preamble. They establish a merry motion of sixteenth notes by way of accompaniment to the principal figure in the first violins. This Scherzo, with its Trio in the minor, with muted strings and syncopated rhythm, seemed to us by all odds the happiest, most original and most interesting movement of the Suite; it was certainly the most enlivening.

The Romanza (adagietto), in G, 4-4, is serious and serene again, and has considerable beauty, both in the horns and strings and in the way in which they help each other. Following up the thread of emotional development which we picked up at a venture in speaking of the preamble, we may imagine that the successive phases of life's history have here reached a certain height of reconciliation. And perhaps we may further recognize in the moderate and majestic movement of the Finale, which is in G major, 4-4, the period of useful life and action, self-controlled and balanced, equable, unswerving, strong.

This Suite is an ambitious, an elaborate, audacious and far-reaching effort, in some respects far-fetched. But it is an earnest, energetic effort. Perhaps certain modern idols (models) of the young composer are in some degree responsible for it. Be this as it may, we must own to following long passages of it with a clinging, pleased attention; and if we cannot fully understand it from a single hearing, and cannot claim a right to judge its worth, we cannot resist a feeling that there is something in it—indeed, much more than we expected.

Liszt's Racoczy March was Hungarian enough, spirited enough, sensational, ingeniously enough put together, full of surprises and contrasted color, to make a brilliant ending to a concert all so strange; but its impression is tame after that made by Berlioz with the same motives and material. Yet Liszt was the Hungarian, Berlioz only French.

J. S. D.

Boston Post

MONDAY, MORNING, MARCH 23.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Aria, "I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus".....Gluck
Concerto for Violin, No. 7, in E minor.....Spohr
Wie Bist du Meine Koenigin.....Brahms
Love Me or Not.....Secchi
Im Maien.....Hiller
Symphony No. 2, in D minor, op. 70.....Dvorak

The voice of Miss Lena Little, who sang at the last rehearsal and concert, is a mezzo-soprano, and certain of its tones are of genuine contralto quality. It is not distinguished by warmth and color. The upper tones are pale, the lower tones are not free from harshness. Her voice moves slowly in rapid passages, as if with effort, and her delivery is at times sluggish. Yet she has been well taught, and in her singing the skill and patience of the teacher are more noticeable than any display of individuality or temperament. Her musical nature would seem to be phlegmatic.

Therefore her selection of the great air from Gluck's "Orpheus" was unfortunate, for it disclosed the lacks of her musical outfit. The delivery of the recitative was monotonous and devoid of dramatic expression. The air itself was taken in a tempo which was at variance with the rhythmical construction, the traditions, and the expressed wish of the composer. In the original score of the Italian version (1762), the air is marked vivace. In that of the French version (1774) it is marked andante con moto. In each version the half note is taken as the unit of measure and not the quarter note, and Gluck has indicated this. But in the absence of such directions the very character and rhythm of the air cry out against the tempo chosen by Miss Little. The episodes marked adagio and moderato were not read with dramatic feeling, and there was no contrast made between the passionate grief of the chief theme and the tenderness and entreaties of the episodes. And so the whole air suffered and its effect was lost. A contemporary of Gluck named Boyé claimed that if the words "I have found my Eurydice, and nothing can equal my joy," were substituted for the original text, Gluck's music would be as expressive in the one case as the other. But Miss Little was not seized by poignant grief or keen delight. Her Orpheus seemed as resigned to his loss as the hero of Offenbach's operetta, who would never have sought Eurydice had not Public Opinion coerced him.

The three songs sung later in the evening gave Miss Little a better opportunity for the display of her art, and the second, though it is a flimsy thing, was sung delightfully. The singer was loudly applauded, and she was recalled twice, after the aria and after the songs.

Mr. Otto Roth gave a very artistic performance of Spohr's violin concerto No. 7. It was admirable from a technical standpoint, and it was musically beautiful in conception and interpretation. Mr. Roth's tone is small in volume; but tone is by no means everything in violin playing, and the finish and purity of his art make ample amends for any deficiency in this respect. The concerto itself is a good example of Spohr's agreeable and melodious style, which is always free from that which could possibly offend; and perhaps for that very reason it produces no marked effect upon the hearer except to put him in a state of vague amiability. Mr. Roth was enthusiastically applauded, a fitting tribute to this modest and talented musician.

The "Anacreon" overture is evidently a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. It was given last season in Music Hall; it lately appeared upon the programme of a Cambridge concert; it was heard Saturday evening. Now Cherubini was not a man of one overture; he wrote others which would be listened to with pleasure. The "Anacreon" was better played by the orchestra than was the symphony of Dvorak. The latter was given with a vigor which at times was unbridled.

The programme of the next concert, which will be given Saturday evening, April 4, includes Svendsen's second Symphony, Lalo's Rhapsody, Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, and Rubinstein's overture "Anthony and Cleopatra," which will be played in Boston for the first time. Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Post.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1891.

Symphony Concerts Nearing Their Close.

There were two soloists at yesterday's Symphony concert, Miss Lena Little, contralto, and Mr. Otto Roth, violinist. Miss Little has been heard here in parlor and chamber concerts, but her appearance at Friday's rehearsal was practically an introduction to the Boston public. She made a decidedly pleasant impression. Her voice, without being remarkable for either compass or power, is exceedingly agreeable in tonal quality, and she sings with uncommon grace and ease. Her enunciation is always delightfully clear, and her phrasing is most artistic. Perhaps the least pleasing feature of her voice is the lack of richness in the upper register, but this is compensated for by the general smoothness of tone.

She first sang the aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus," with orchestral accompaniment. She interpreted the exquisite music with artistic effect and displayed a deal of sentiment, making the selection most welcome, even though it did occasionally betray the limitations of her voice. That Miss Little is a ballad rather than a dramatic singer, was shown in the group of songs she sang with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, later in the concert. Her delivery of the dainty, old-fashioned song by Secchi, entitled "Love Me or Not," could scarcely have been bettered. It was decidedly her best effort. Brahms' "Wie Bist du Mein Koenigin" was also well sung, but Hiller's "Im Maien" was not quite so satisfactory.

Mr. Otto Roth has not now to gain the recognition from Symphony audiences. He some time since established himself in their cordial favor. His performance of Spohr's delightful concerto for violin in E minor, No. 7, won him new honors. He was thrice recalled at its conclusion and well deserved all the hearty applause accorded him. Mr. Roth has an admirable command of technique, a fact made particularly evident by his execution of the brilliant and unusual staccato passages for which Spohr's concert is noted. Admirable also is the sincerity of his playing. He phrases superbly, and, in short, Mr. Roth is a young violinist for whom a brilliant future may be confidently expected.

Owing to the illness of the youthful harpist of the orchestra it was necessary to substitute Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" for the announced "Antony and Cleopatra" overture. Mr. Nikisch gave a splendid reading of this favorite work, and displayed, as not before, the beauties of Cherubini's novel melodies and strange orchestral effects. Dvorak's Symphony, No. 2, in D minor, op. 70, ended the programme. It was a satisfactory performance throughout, but was most enjoyable for the magnificent interpretation given the scherzo movement.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim will be the soloist at this week's concert and the programme will consist of Svendsen's symphony No. 2, in B flat; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major; Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra, and Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1891.

Mrs. Rive-King Produces Paderewski's Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

John S. Dwight contributes the following review of the Paderewski concerto, and a suite by an American composer to the Transcript:

The nineteenth programme (Saturday evening, March 14) was a strange one, without symphony. But not to that can we ascribe a smaller audience than usual. The counter-attraction of the theatre and Sarah Bernhardt must, we suppose, be held responsible for that. Yet the programme was unique and interesting in that way at least.

Bach-Esser: Toccata in F.
Paderewski: Op. 17, Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor.
(First time in the United States.)
Arthur Whiting: Op. 8 (MS.) Suite for Strings and four Horns in G minor.
(First performance.)
Liszt: Rakoczy March.
Soloist: Mrs. Julia Rivé-King.

The great Bach Organ Toccata, so effectively transcribed for orchestra by Esser, was a wholesome and a bracing introduction, as good as any but the greatest kind of overture. Played by many instruments, with an individual intelligence and will behind each, the melodic outline and the interweaving of the parts become to unaccustomed ears much clearer than when heard upon the organ. You have to listen long to the great ocean rolling in its waves before detecting any distinct form of figure; and a great full organ is not unlike the ocean in its multitudinous, bewildering mass of tones not set apart by accent. In Esser's arrangement the leading subject taken by the strings, entering and answered by one body after another of them, or tutti contrasted with alternating parts, on long-held pedal points, has a right hearty, reassuring sound; and the wind band, kept in reserve for the great chords of the counter-subject, comes in with splendid color and effect. A few concluding slow chords seem to have been appended to the arrangement, probably because the fugue, which commonly follows, is left off. The Toccata was nobly and superbly played. Each instrument told effectively; but it would be good to hear Professor Paine play it shortly after once more on the great organ, could that but come to life again!

It is long since we have had the pleasure of hearing that excellent pianist, Mrs. Rivé-King, perform in Boston. She was warmly greeted, had a very superior Chickering Grand to play on, and acquitted herself even more admirably than in the old Harvard Association concerts, where she won so much distinction. This time she grappled with a very novel, very original and trying task for a pianist, in the concerto by Paderewski, a much younger Russian composer than Tschaikowsky, and judging by this first impression, one more original, imaginative, genial, satisfying. We confess we looked forward to the novelty not without fear, but were agreeably disappointed. This ambitious composition of the young Russian Pole (we should have called him) is much in the spirit of the Polish national music, proud and dreamy, and partaking of the Slavonic peculiarities of tonality. The Allegro begins with a long orchestral tutti. The themes are individual and striking, exciting expectation which is never disappointed. When the piano takes up the main thread of discourse, it develops it with brilliant life and spirit, and with great ingenuity and subtlety, never losing itself in devious passages bristling with all sorts of difficulties. And the game seems worth the candle. You feel that the movement has a meaning; it has something to say, something spontaneous, of inward prompting; whether you understand it, whether it quite understands itself, is not so sure. In the latter part of it are several cadenza-like passages, where the piano seems to enter upon amusing soliloquy, but is soon joined by sympathetic companions (a few instruments). These have great beauty and expression, and were beautifully done both by the solo and companion instruments. A real and elaborate cadenza soon follows, "starting largo and increasing in force, passion and speed as it proceeds." A solo for the English horn adds interest to this latter portion of the Allegro.

The second movement, a romanza (andante), introduced by horns, but with the theme entering in the oboes, has justly been called "quaintly original and takingly melodious." The motion grows more and more animated and exciting toward the middle, but calms down to a quiet ending. The finale (allegro molto vivace) fully vindicates that marking of its time and character. It has "a tremendous passage of octaves for both hands," and a "long peroration, replete with brilliant passages of octaves, scales, arpeggios and double shakes," which begin "broadly," wax to a presto and make an effective ending in the major of the key. Mrs. King was equal to all this, singularly perfect in technique, sure and discreet in reading, phrasing, accent, light and shade, and played her part, which is the principal, as if the music had taken full possession of her. Nor could she have had a better accompaniment, or complement, than she found in that orchestra.

A suite for string orchestra and four horns, and in six movements, most of them elaborate, was something new under the sun. The combination proved more interesting than we were prepared for, especially in several places where the four horns moved in two distinct pairs. The "mellow horn," as we are wont to hear it characterized, is also capable of a rough, stern quality of tone. It can work itself into a passion, and this was very largely the case in Mr. Whiting's Præambulum (Appassionato assai). It was indeed highly impassioned, like an outburst of conflicting emotions, a well-nigh desperate struggle and protest against fate, an impatient grapple with an insoluble life riddle. The horns seem in no good humor, and the strings wax and warm into a high state of excitement, a rapid and protracted agitato, rather interesting if one only knew what it was all about—perhaps the moody, irrepressible and morbid youthful phase of a too conscious life? The prelude, although stormy, seems to be consistent and to hang together well. A calmer mood must follow. Hence the Intermezzo (Minuet tempo), which was omitted without warning to the hearers. Then comes a grateful relief. The horns (although they have not worn out their welcome) conclude to be silent for a while, and four 'cellos take up the melody of the Aria (a graceful Allegretto in 4-4). This aria is in D major, for modern suites do not follow the example of those of the time of Bach and Handel, which confined all their many movements within the circle of one and the same key. In the fourth movement, a playful and vivacious Scherzo in E flat 3-8, the horns are welcomed back with a fresh zest. They enter in a mood as lively and excited, if not as stormy, as that of the Preamble. They establish a merry motion of sixteenth notes by way of accompaniment to the principal figure in the first violins. This Scherzo, with its Trio in the minor, with muted strings and syncopated rhythm, seemed to us by all odds the happiest, most original and most interesting movement of the Suite; it was certainly the most enlivening.

The Romanza (adagietto), in G, 4-4, is serious and serene again, and has considerable beauty, both in the horns and strings and in the way in which they help each other. Following up the thread of emotional development which we picked up at a venture in speaking of the preamble, we may imagine that the successive phases of life's history have here reached a certain height of reconciliation. And perhaps we may further recognize in the moderate and majestic movement of the Finale, which is in G major, 4-4, the period of useful life and action, self-controlled and balanced, equable, unswerving, strong.

This Suite is an ambitious, an elaborate, audacious and far-reaching effort, in some respects far-fetched. But it is an earnest, energetic effort. Perhaps certain modern idols (models) of the young composer are in some degree responsible for it. Be this as it may, we must own to following long passages of it with a clinging, pleased attention; and if we cannot fully understand it from a single hearing, and cannot claim a right to judge its worth, we cannot resist a feeling that there is something in it—indeed, much more than we expected.

Liszt's Racoczy March was Hungarian enough, spirited enough, sensational, ingeniously enough put together, full of surprises and contrasted color, to make a brilliant ending to a concert all so strange; but its impression is tame after that made by Berlioz with the same motives and material. Yet Liszt was the Hungarian, Berlioz only French.

J. S. D.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth concert of the season, Saturday, March 21, was as follows:

Cherubini—Overture to "Anacreon."
Gluck—Aria, from "Orfeo," "I Have Lost My Eurydice."
Spohr—Violin Concerto, No. 7, in E minor.
Songs with Piano—
a—Brahms: "Wie bist du meine Königin."
b—Secchi: "Love me or not."
c—Hiller: "Im Maien."
Dvorak—Op. 70, Symphony (No. 2), in D minor.
Soloists—Miss Lena Little, contralto; Mr. Otto Roth violinist.

The programme was relished, beginning with three old masters and ending with a brilliant, original and somewhat wild Bohemian symphony. Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, although we have known good musicians to turn up their noses at its conventional and formal introduction, deserves the favor with which it is generally received; for, from the moment where the principal theme sets in, it is full of life and elasticity, and grows in interest to the end. It has a true Anacreontic spirit and smacks of never-failing youth and love of life. Surely the formal opening in Cherubini's mind meant something. First, the imperative strong chords from D onward, which seem to summon up fine, airy sprites. Then the Oberon horn phrase in which the spell begins to work. Then oboe, flute, clarinet, bassoon, one after another, answer the master's call in echoed phrase as obediently, if not with the same elfish alacrity (for these are not Shakspearian, English fairies, but much more deliberate), as do Mustard-Seed, Peas-Blossom and their fellows to the "translated" Bottom. Indulge the parallel or not, there can be no question that when the violin theme enters we have opened a rich vein of lifesome and exhilarating melody, which speaks of joyous, full content in life, keeping up the happiest spirits to the end. As a piece for ensemble violin playing, worthy of our noble corps of violins, few strains are more piquant, quickening; delightful to the sense and to the mind. The simple motive is developed with wonderful inventiveness and delicacy and strength, the appetite growing with what it feeds on; it is a leisurely, contented theme, it swells to an exciting climax and subsides; has many a pleasing episode and nice bits of color; finally, a yet livelier second theme, and then the two are worked up together in a most masterly way, and all is rounded to a satisfactory conclusion, The rendering was admirable in all respects.

Of Dvorak's symphony we know not what to say, save that it held our attention closely through all four movements, swarming with novel, interesting ideas, especially the Adagio with its four subjects, and the Scherzo with the most Bohemian cut of all. It is all put together, or rather seems to grow together, with the instinct and the art of a born and trained musician. It made its impression while it lasted, a pleased, a varied and a wondering one; but it leaves no impression which we can put into words, at least without further study. The orchestra performed it with spirit, clearness, light and shade and vividness of color.

Miss Lena Little, an evidently well trained contralto singer, known as such in England, was born, we understand, in New Orleans. She seems strongly organized physically and has a large voice, in the lower tones especially, but well developed through the mezzo-soprano range; a little veiled in quality, for which the east wind hardly seemed responsible. She sang the old Gluck aria: "Che farò senz' Euridice," in Italian, with intelligence and true conception, like a singer of experience, with good intonation, accent and expression, albeit without much magnetic warmth. It was good, honest and artistic singing, much above the average. In the three songs we felt more of a sympathetic quality in her voice, especially in the one by Secchi, which is commonplace enough. That by Brahms has more soul and music in it, and was perhaps the best sung of the three. That by Hiller seemed not to lie just in her vein. The singer was repeatedly recalled, and evidently left a very favorable impression.

Spohr has his mannerisms and his sameness. Even his violin compositions, which no one denies are masterly, are felt to be both cloying and old-fashioned. Yet Joachim loves to play them. This one in E minor was well selected by Mr. Roth to show his progress as an artistic violinist. If the Allegro is a little tame, and the Adagio rather sentimental, the Rondo finale is full of spirit and invention, and does not exhaust the interest of the listener. Mr. Roth played the whole work with a refined, pure tone, with finished, brilliant execution and with a subtle delicacy of expression, which only needed (perhaps) a little more strength for so large a hall, for now and then we lost the unaccented termination of a measure. He is one of the most conscientious and most genial artists of the orchestra and always sure of an appreciative welcome.

The orchestra are out on missionary work again next week. On Saturday, April 4, they will give us a programme altogether of "the newness:" Second symphony of Svendsen, in B-flat; second concerto of Liszt, in A, played by a new pianist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim; rhapsody by Lalo; overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," (first time here), by Rubinstein.

J. S. D.

Bulletin, Norwich, Conn.
3/21
Date.....

Symphony Orchestra Frogramme.

The following is the programme to be rendered in this city on Thursday evening next at the Broadway theater, by the Boston Symphony orchestra:

Overture. "Lenore," Fo. 3.....Beethoven
Aria. "Les Dragons deVillars".....Maillard
Mrs, Nikisch.
Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Allegro.
Andante con moto.
Danse Macabre.....Saint Saens
Solo for violoncello,
Fantasie Charaoteristique.....Servais
Mr. Hekking.
Songs with piano.
a "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
b "The Goldsmith".....Gade
c "Vorsatz".....Raff
Mrs. Nikisch.
Overture "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Anton

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 23, 1891.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Miss Lena Little and Otto Roth the Soloists.

It was rather a soloist's concert that of Saturday, yet it contained two very beautiful orchestral works. The first of these was the overture to "Anacreon," by Cherubini. Although the opera itself is a failure and somewhat heavy and dull, the overture is one of Cherubini's most marked successes, not a whit less attractive than that to "The Water-Carrier." The working up of a grand and noble crescendo is very effective in this composition, and although we of this year of grace are accustomed to such effects, the people of 1803 were not, and this is in fact the first example of such dramatic effect achieved in such a manner. It was played in a very brilliant style, and this was by no means a fault, for it is a mistake to perform Cherubini in a prim and periwigged vein; there is sufficient passion in the old composer spite of his clearness and symmetry. It is a pity that these qualities should be deemed unreconcilable by so many modern composers.

Miss Lena Little was the vocalist of the concert. She is a pupil of Randegger, and, although American, has dwelt many years in London. Her first number was Gluck's "Che Faro Senza Euridice." In this she showed herself possessed of a pleasant voice, true intonation, and generally good method, but there was a cold correctness, even in the portamento and appoggiatura effects, which should express anguish and pathos, and every point seemed nicely calculated beforehand, which detracted somewhat from the success of the number. In the group of songs which came later in the programme one was able to judge the singer definitely; she was at her best in a drawing-room ballad entitled "Love Me or Not," which she gave with taste and sweetness, but which was by no means a selection such as the standard of these concerts would seem to demand. In Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Königin" there was much intelligence displayed, but the climax was not broad enough. The pronunciation of the German words was, however, entirely commendable. Hiller's "In Maytime" showed limitations on the part of the singer; it was joyous enough, but in the final outburst of exhilaration on the words "Im Maien," where modulations and words both point to the broadest allargando, her voice was not powerful enough to carry out her evident intention, and spasmodic effort took the place of real power. It would be wrong to form a fixed opinion from a debut, where nervousness (although there were no evidences of it) forms an unpleasant factor in the result attained, but I should imagine Miss Little to be a very pleasant chamber-concert singer, rather than a vocalist suited for such great orchestral occasions. Of Mr. Nikisch's piano accompaniments one can speak only praise. If the public only knew the musicianship necessary to playing a perfect accompaniment!

Mr. Otto Roth was the other soloist. He is deservedly a great favorite with the public, and although young in years is a veteran in art. The Spohr concerto which he played is not the most interesting work in the world, but it is admirably calculated to display the violin, and all its effects are legitimate. The surety of the soloist bred a delightful sense of confidence in the minds of the auditors, and the intonation, the shading, and the clearness of the scale runs were all to be admired. In the adagio the bowing was free and broad, and Mr. Nikisch repressed the orchestra to perfect balance against the solo work. The rondo was attractive in spite of Spohr's rather squarecut and deliberate style, and after the brilliant ending the violinist was twice recalled with great and well-deserved enthusiasm. A broader tone is the only further advance the most critical need wish to Mr. Roth.

Dvorak's D minor symphony grows better with repeated hearing. It is good to hear such works at least once a season, for the new and original flavor cannot otherwise be appreciated. I still found the adagio rather vague, but the scherzo, with its wraiths of dance-themes appearing and vanishing like elves, became a little more intelligible because of familiarity and the excellent performance. Yet the first and last movements are distinctly the best, and are splendid examples of Slavonic music. The playing of these was most thorough; Mr. Nikisch goes into the very heart of Slavonic caprice, and really played on his orchestra as an organist upon his manuals. Yet many missed the grand culmination by joining in the exodus which made a practical protest against allowing a concert to continue after 9.30 P. M. The request that those desiring to leave early should retire after the third movement of the symphony was unheeded—they went before it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

News, Baltimore, Md.
3/22
e.....

Boston Orchestra's Wagner Concert.

The great Wagner concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be an event in the musical history of Baltimore. The Wagner opera singers are among the best in the world. They have just completed their engagement with the Metropolitan Opera in New York, and are to give this city a taste of their quality before their return to Europe. Mme. Antonie Mielke created great enthusiasm in New York during her farewell performances last week. Herr Deppel was almost equally successful. They will have a crowded house in Baltimore on Tuesday evening, as the sale of seats has already been very large.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1891.

Twentieth Symphony Concert—A New Singer.

Mr. Otto Roth Plays a Spohr Concerto—The Week's Concerts.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was:

Cherubini. Overture, "Anacreon."
Gluck. Aria, "I have lost my Eurydice."
Spohr. Concerto for Violin, No. 7, in E minor.
Songs with Piano:
Brahms. "Wie bist du meine Koenigin."
Secchi. "Love me not."
Niller. "In Maien."
Dvorák. Symphony, No. 2, in D minor.

The singer was Miss Lena Little, the violinist Mr. Otto Roth.

Miss Little is an American singer who had not sung in Boston before, though known in critical London circles. Her voice is more contralto than mezzo-soprano, of pleasant, natural quality, slight in volume and not of unusual range. It evidently was a hard organ to train, and there are yet some rough places in her scale, which, however, she conceals with skill. Miss Little sings with intelligence; in the heartfelt music of Gluck there was an avoidance of exaggerated pathos, but much of real feeling; the style in which the scene was given was artistic. The first two of the songs, especially the one by Brahms, which is also one of the best of his, were better sung from the standpoint of the vocalist than the Gluck selection; the sentimental piece by Secchi is, however, not of sufficient dignity for use at concerts of the highest grade. Miss Little sang the songs to the exquisite piano accompaniment of Mr. Nikisch. It is pleasant to note the sincerity of Miss Little's singing.

Mr. Roth gains artistically every year. Spohr writes lovingly for the violin, and his style is one which attracts a musician of Mr. Roth's fine grain. It was admirable violin playing; satisfactory in point of technique and of a highly expressive quality. Mr. Roth was warmly recalled.

What a colorist Dvorák is! This D-minor symphony of his, while it is less violently national in spirit than the D-major, is an ardent and spontaneous work; Slavonic in substance, of course, for Dvorák is imbued with patriotism, but first of all musical. Dvorák has respect for accepted forms, but he impresses upon them his own individuality. So that, while he charms the moderns by his romanticism, the core of his work remains classic. The symphony was beautifully played, the wind division of the orchestra being best in the melodious slow movement. Cherubini is not so bad once in awhile; the old fellow is not very vital, but with his formalism there is considerable charm.

The four concerts which remain to be given this season will make a memorable close. On April 4 the programme will be: Svendsen, Symphony No. 2, in B-flat; Liszt, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A-major; Lalo, rhapsody for orchestra; Rubinstein, overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," (first time in Boston). Arthur Friedheim will be the pianist. Friedheim is a celebrated Liszt player, who has not been heard in this country. On April 11, a Wagner programme; April 18, the first act of Beethoven's "Fidelio," and the fifth Symphony; April 25, Beethoven's ninth Symphony and a Bach selection.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia,
Date 3/20

MUSICAL NOTES.

As already stated, the programme for the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Monday evening will be exclusively Wagnerian. It has been arranged in such a way, it is said, "as to illustrate and epitomize Wagner's creative career." The opening number will be the Taunhauser overture and bacchanale, after which Lohengrin's narrative will be sung by Herr Dippel, of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Subsequent selections will include the effective "Waldweben," or "Forest Voices," scene from "Siegfried," the duet "In Neuen Thater," from "Die Gotterdammerung" (to be sung by Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel), and Hans Richter's orchestral arrangement of the music illustrating Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock, the morning dawn and Rhine journey. The concert is to end with the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and the love-duet which brings that opera to a close. To admirers of Wagner's music this programme ought to prove exceptionally interesting.

At the fifth concert of the Adamowski Quartet series, to be given in the Haseltine Galleries next Monday afternoon (when Mr. Knecht, viola, will assist), Beethoven's quintet in C major (op. 29), Mackenzie's Benedictus (violin solo, by T. Adamowski), Svendsen's andante and variations, from his op. 5 quintet, and movements from Mendelssohn's A major (op. 18) quintet will be played.

Date 3-20

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging from the great demand for seats for the Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy next Monday evening, Wagner is a name to conjure with in the musical circles of Philadelphia. In spite of the fact that it will be Holy Week, and that Bernhardt will be in the city, the audience promises to be very large and early application should be made for places.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 24, 1891.

Academy of Music—Wagner Music by the Boston Orchestra.

The somewhat hazardous experiment of giving a concert restricted exclusively to music by Richard Wagner was successfully carried out last night at the Academy of Music by Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The list was headed by the "Tannhaeuser" overture; it was the Paris version, containing the Venusberg bacchanal music, and, while in a measure interesting for its comparative novelty, the other makes a decidedly better concert overture. Lohengrin's "Legend" followed, and Mr. Dippel, from the Metropolitan Opera House, sang it in splendid style. He is a genuine tenor, with a voice that has music, ring, and the freshness of youth in it. He was heard afterward in the duet, In Neuen Thaten, from "Gotterdaemmerung," but in the meantime he had evidently been imprudent in subjecting himself to a change of temperature, for his voice was perceptibly deficient in clearness in its upper tones, though otherwise he again sang with fine effectiveness.

Mrs. Mielke, the other singer, is also from the Metropolitan Opera House, and proved an exceptionally good soprano. Her voice is not entirely even, and shows some signs of wear in its upper division, but of agreeable quality, and of the right power for such work as Wagner assigns to singers. In the contentions between herself and the immense orchestra in the climaxes, she easily dominated the band, a prime requirement under the circumstances. Both artists have, in addition to excellent voices, unusually graceful style for Wagner singers and good dramatic intelligence, and each was accorded a reception whose warmth and spontaniety was the best evidence of the audience's recognition of that fact. Mrs. Mielke also sang the closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde," with its long orchestral prelude (which would have been better omitted), with admirable dignity and feeling. It was regrettable that two such singers could not have been heard in something less severely Wagnerian.

The "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde," "Morning Dawn" and "The Rhine Journey," from the "Gotterdaemmerung," were the other dishes at the Wagner feast.

Mr. Nikisch was fairly successful in making this a representative programme in its way. As no example of Wagner prior to his "Tannhaeuser" (1845) period was included in the list, it cannot be said to have been either historically or progressively illustrative, and, as only two of the "Nibelungen" series and nothing of "Parsifal" had representation, it was by no means complete, although restricted exclusively to Wagner's operatic works. In one respect he was fortunate. His most important excerpts were used for years by Missionary Thomas as among his most powerful tracts among the Philistines here, and they had much to do with the appreciation that was developed here for the music of Wagner. As to the work of the orchestra, it would be needless to repeat now what has been so often and so freely acknowledged as to its superb quality and balance of tone and its almost matchless drill, and as for Mr. Nikisch's readings of works made delightfully familiar through many seasons by Mr. Thomas, it may be briefly recorded that they differ much and often radically from the latter's, and gain nothing thereby, especially in the quality of imaginativeness and spirit. One more concert closes the Boston Orchestra's season.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1891.

A WAGNER NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Unique Programme.

It was a Wagner night at the Academy of Music last night, and if any one previously had an idea that the prophet of Bayreuth was not popular in this city, that idea was dispelled by looking at the enormous crowd that could scarcely be accommodated.

There was great curiosity to discover how the Boston symphony orchestra would interpret a Wagner programme under Mr. Nikisch's direction. That curiosity is satisfied, but the desire is not satiated. The strings being so largely in the majority in this organization, it would be impossible to give the heavier dramatic passages of Wagner with that breadth which they require, and these were not attempted. What was done was done magnificently. In so far as Wagner's music is poetic, Mr. Nikisch's interpretations are all that could be asked. He did not last night attempt any heavy passages, knowing full well the limitations of his orchestra, but what he did attempt was carried out in such a way as to leave nothing desired. The Waldweben music from "Siegfried" was a dream of beauty. It is a selection just suited to bring out the possibilities of the orchestra. Where delicacy and tone texture are desired we may always count on this organization.

The soloists, Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Dippel, were very competent. The Lohengrin legend was charmingly sung, but the duet from "Die Gœtterdaemmerung," though admirably sung, was lacking in interest, not because of the singers, but because it is impossible to sing a Wagner duet satisfactorily in concert. It lacks the essential element of action.

The programme was delightfully varied, beginning with the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, following with the "Lohengrin" legend, the "Siegfried" wood music, the "Goetterdaemmerung" duet, Siegfried's passage and Rhine journey from the same opera, closing with the prelude and closing scene from "Jristan and Isolde." In these Mr. Nikisch ran nearly the whole gamut of Wagner's ideas. The grave, the gay, the light, the gloomy—everything but some of the dreary, obscure thunderings that have no place in concert.

It is a pleasure to note that the audience was composed almost exclusively of musical people, and not those who went simply because "Wagner" has been the fad in New York for years.

[117]

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its fifth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. The audience was very large. Every seat in the auditorium was occupied, and even the aisles were crowded with people who found themselves unable to secure accommodation elsewhere. As had been announced, the programme consisted exclusively of selections from the operas of Richard Wagner, chronologically arranged so as to present in a very impressive and satisfying manner an exhibition of the development of Wagner's genius and the progressive elaboration of the theories upon which he worked. Naturally enough, such being the scheme, the opening number was the overture to "Tannhauser," of all that Wagner wrote perhaps the best-known and the most generally enjoyed: and never surely has this famous composition had a more splendid and illuminative rendering. It was played with a brilliancy, with a passionate fervor, with a magnificent sonority which could not be surpassed, which transcended all previous recollections and stirred the audience to a tempest of applause. The Boston Orchestra has sometimes been criticised for a lack of breadth and vigor, for a tendency to magnify delicacy at the expense of strength, but no such criticism can be applied to last night's performance. In the exquisite "Waldweben" movement from Siegfried the unapproachable refinement of the strings produced a delicious effect, but where breadth and strength were called for the demand was amply met, the brasses were allowed all their proper prominence, and the concert showed that Mr. Nikisch is as able and sympathetic an interpreter of Wagner as he is of the elder classics. The soloists were Mrs. Antoine Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel, both members of the company that has been playing at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Both are excellent artists, and made a most favorable impression, but their work, good as it is, only showed once more the impossibility of making vocal extracts from the later Wagnerian operas properly effective.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

The Adamowski string quartet gave its fifth concert at Haseltine's Galleries yesterday afternoon. The programme included Beethoven's great quintet in C major, op. 29, which was splendidly played, and three movements from Mendelssohn's quintet in A major, op. 18. Mr. Adamowski also rendered Mackenzie's "Benedictus" for the violin, with a lovely tone and deeply sympathetic feeling.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 24, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Crowded House to Hear Wagner Music at the Academy.

The Academy of Music was thronged to hear the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme with reference to the departure of the German Opera from New York, consisted entirely of selections from Wagner, and here Herr Nikisch was on ground rendered so familiar by Thomas, Gericke and Seidl, that comparison became of great interest. Herr Nikisch is a very individual conductor. Where he has to employ the full orchestra and deal with an all-embracing score, he lifts the music out of the orchestra, as every Wagnerian conductor should, and plays with almost all the magnetic impetuosity of Seide. But where he has but a few instruments in hand, his temptation seems to be toward too great analysis, which was productive of unfamiliar results in parts of the Tannhaeuser overture and of the Waldweben. The Richter arrangement from Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung, however, was given to perfection, and so was the duet "In Neuen Thaten," which Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel sang with excellent effect and all the sincerity of German singers. Herr Dippel's legend from Lohengrin was noticeably direct and pleasing. But the Tristan Vorspiel and Leibestod were taken so slowly as to be almost passionless, while Frau Mielke's too sentimental rendering of the words invited the measuring of her voice against Lehmann's. Yet it was, on the whole, a finely successful concert, and one that showed how far the comprehension of Wagner has advanced in Philadelphia.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, March 24, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in a programme calculated to delight Wagnerian ears. It was made up entirely from the works of the great apostle of the music of the future, the excerpts ranging from "Tannhauser" through the Nibelungen Ring tetralogy to "Tristan und Isolde." Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel, of the New York Metropolitan opera, sang the love duet from "Tristan" and duet from "Gœtterdæmmerung," and Herr Dippel also sang Lohengrin's narrative. It was a great occasion for the Wagnerites, who were out in full force. The work of the orchestra throughout was superb.

The Press

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1891.

PHILADELPHIA

Academy—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Wagner programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music drew a very large audience of music lovers, who heard masterpieces of the German composer better rendered than they have ever been in this country, perhaps, outside the Metropolitan Opera House. The strings in Mr. Nikisch's orchestra showed to finest advantage and the good effects of the other instruments were not wanting. The overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" possibly on account of familiarity, were the most generously applauded. The noble theme of the overture given out first by the horn, then by the cellos and other instruments, is one of Wagner's most sublime creations, and no one could listen to the faultless performance of it without feeling that the name of Wagner would live had he written nothing else. The music was rendered according to the Paris version. The delicate shading and fine decrescendo at the end, were a revelation of the admirable skill of the trade.

The other numbers by the orchestra above were Waldweben, from "Siegfried," and Richter's arrangement of Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." The interest of the audience centered largely in the appearance of Mrs. Antoine Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel, from the Metropolitan Opera House.

Mr. Dippel displayed the capabilities of his fine tenor voice in Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin." He is young and has a most promising future. Later he sang with Mrs. Mielke in the duet "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung:" Mrs. Mielke sang the closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde" charmingly. Both vocalists were well received each time they appeared and left behind them pleasant memories of their first visit to Philadelphia.

Haseltine's—Adamowski Quartette.

The feature at the fifth concert of the Adamowski Quartette yesterday afternoon in Haseltines Galleries, was Mackenzie's "Benedictus for Violin," in which Mr. T. Adamowski displayed to the best advantage that fervor of interpretation which has gained for him many warm admirers in this city. As an encore Mr. Adamowski played a characteristic bit by Spohr. Selections from Svendsen's Quintette, op. 5, were also rendered in a style which merits especial notice.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, MAR. 25, 1891.

ALL WAGNER MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Successful Concert—The Soloists.

The whole programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Concordia, last night, was devoted to the performance of Wagner music, constituting without doubt the most successful concert the Boston Orchestra has ever given here. Fragments from "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" and "Die Gotterdammerung" were superbly rendered, so that when the final number was reached every one was in an enthusiastic frame of mind and ready to enjoy to the utmost the beauty of "Tristan." It was wisely put at the end of the programme, for where is the musical effect that can compare with it? Wagner's music is called the "music of the future," but surely it must be the music of all time—past, present or future—if it had only been given to man before to draw the veil aside and show what music really is. If it is the "music of the future," then the present generation is fortunate in being able to get a foretaste of what the future will bring forth. It would seem as if all the music of the past, all the efforts of other great composers, had worked toward this end, and Wagner came to put the master-stroke and crown all with the triumph of his genius. Yes, it is great music, these Wagner operas, the scene from "Tristan" alone seeming to draw from the "concord of sweet sounds" all that sound is capable of, leaving not one desire ungratified. Gradually, drawing upon the power of the orchestra for the wonderful effect that is to come, and intertwining the beautiful themes of the opera until they seem as one, the music sweeps on and on, growing every instant more intense, until one is hardly able to bear the nervous strain, the deep excitement of those ringing chords, and almost rebels against the long-delayed climax. With a mighty chord that seems to contain all music in its depths the climax comes, and the fulness and perfection of musical expression are reached, the longing for sound is satisfied. Great as this effect is, it is not at all forced. It seems not to have been deliberately fashioned and wrought out, but to have come of itself—born, not made. Such was the music that the Boston Orchestra interpreted last night under Arthur Nikisch, assisted by two eminent Wagnerian singers, Frau Antonia Mielke and Herr Andreas Dippel, who were with Anton Seidl in the German opera in New York. While not bringing to the opera music the roundness and fullness of Seidl's orchestra, the Boston Orchestra gave a superb performance of it. Frau Mielke was recalled again and again for her splendid work, and Herr Dippel also met with an enthusiastic reception. Franz Kneisel played a Wagner "Albumblatt" and the favorite violinist received the approval that his musical interpretation merited. The concert was the first public concert of only Wagner works ever given in Baltimore. The wish of many is that it may not be the last.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

A Brief Sketch of His Busy Musical Life.

Herr Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in the little village of Szt. Miklos, Hungary. It is an unimportant little place, dependent very largely upon a sugar refinery for the measure of prosperity it enjoys. Herr Nikisch's father was the treasurer of the refinery, so that the future musician was born into a comfortable and well-to-do home. His parents were not particularly musical people, though his father was fond of music as an amateur, and often had Viennese musicians come to the house to stay. It was these visits during his early childhood that created in Herr Nikisch his love for music, and to this he traces back the course which his life has taken. At six years of age he began to take lessons on the pianoforte and in composition, and at seven was placed under the tutorship of Herr Prochazka, a Slavic musician, who taught him pianoforte playing, harmony and counterpoint. At eight he made his first public appearance. At 11 the violin was taken up, and at graduation he received three first prizes, one each in violin, pianoforte and composition. From this time on Herr Nikisch's success was very great, and he played under Wagner's own conducting at the ceremony of the laying of the corner stone of Wagner's theatre; was a member of the Imperial Palace Orchestra of Vienna, playing the first violin; in 1878 conducted the orchestra at the opera house in Leipsic. Honors were thrust upon him in Leipsic, and it was here he made the acquaintance of Abbe Franz Liszt. Herr Nikisch conducted the great musical festivals of the Allgemeiner deutcher Musikverein in Magdeburg in 1881 and in Leipsic in 1883. Following the latter was a banquet at which Abbe Liszt was present, and he did him the distinguished honor of proposing his health, drinking, as he said, "to the health of the elect of the elect."

While conducting these and other concerts he was made the recipient of several decorations from European sovereigns. During his Leipsic engagement he conducted in nearly every important musical centre of Europe, notably Vienna, Berlin, Hamburg and Frankfurt.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Herr Nikisch lives in Brookline, Mass., and has two children. He brought his family to this country on his return last autumn. He likes this country, and said he used frequently to feel homesick for America when in Europe last summer.

Herr Nikisch says in regard to the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he proposes to keep on in his present policy, viz., to bring out a high class of music, giving fair values to all classes and neglecting none. He says: "If the music is good, it does not matter to me whether it is German, French or Italian; if it is not good enough, I hate it. I like best the works of Beethoven, Mozart and Schubert, but I am fond of the interesting works of the other masters, of whatever nationality they may be. I have no intention of allowing our music to become one-sided. I am studying hard all the time all the scores in the libraries, and such music as is sent me."

BALTIMORE AMERICAN

MARCH 25, 1891.

A NIGHT WITH WAGNER.

A Great Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

The Concordia packed, and the streets lined with carriages for two blocks in every direction, show at once the appreciation of Wagner music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the need of a new and larger hall in Baltimore. A more enthusiastic audience can hardly be imagined. Every number on the program was applauded to the echo. The reception of Nikisch, as a Wagner leader, amounted to an ovation, and the singers, Madame Mielke and Herr Dippel, were compelled to stand bowing a good while after each of their performances.

The Paris version of the "Tannhauser Overture," with the "Bacchanale," is quite different from the ordinary form as generally played, which ends with a return to the "Pilgrims' Hymn," with the full powers of the brass. The Paris version, although made by the composer with reluctance, is more in keeping with the musical theories he adopted later in life.

Herr Dippel's rendition of "Lohengrin's" legend was in the finest vein of Wagner art. The legend itself is pure, romantic and beautiful thought, expressed in the symmetry of poetry and the melody of music. It is quite within the comprehension of all who possess even the smallest amount of imagination. It was simply and charmingly delivered by Mr. Dippel, who has the good fortune to be able to present the part in looks as well as in voice. His recall was enthusiastic.

The fullness of Wagner's art-work, as he called it, can not be had without the action and scenery which are essential parts of it. But as music it will always be enjoyed for its own sake, although without the classic symmetry of form which assists the musical comprehension. Mrs. Mielke's closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde" ended a concert which will ever be memorable in Baltimore. It is seldom that the three essentials, of fine orchestra, fine conductor and fine soloists, are brought together. But last evening fortune came to us with both hands full—and the lovers of musical art in Baltimore are thankful.

STAR, Washington, D. C.

Date 3-26

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always enjoyable, for this band of musicians has reached a perfection rarely attained and it has a conductor whose education, intelligence and temperament most admirably fit him for control. All the concerts of this organization have been remarkably successful in this city. In fact the sale of season tickets before the first of the series was given insured a large attendance on every occasion. The best works of the greatest composers, both of the past and present, have been given, and the highest standard of selection and execution has been maintained. Usually the program has been so varied as to suit every shade of cultivated taste; but last night was a Wagner night, every number being from the works of that composer. The program included the Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the Legend from "Lohengrin," Voices of the Forest from "Siegfried," duet, "In Neuen Thaten;" Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Die Goetterdæmmerung," and the prelude and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde."

Of the work of the orchestra nothing but praise can be said. Thorough subjection to the conductor's will, perfect unity of action, accuracy of time and an evident understanding of the spirit of each movement according to the reading of Mr. Nikisch were manifest in every number. The "Tannhauser" overture, which was written before Wagner abandoned melody, is a delightful piece of orchestration and was exquisitely rendered. The ending with the Bacchanale was a novelty here, but was enjoyed. So, too, was the Voices of the Forest from "Siegfried," which is one of the most charming bits of descriptive musical writing that Wagner did. The orchestral work in the selections from the "Gotterdæmmerung" and "Tristan und Isolde" was all that could be desired, but there was a weariness felt by the majority of the audience in listening to masses of sounds and waiting for glimpses of melody, which were all too brief when they did come. Of the vocalists Mr. Dippel was inadequate to the task given him. The Lohengrin legend has been heard here so often that it is thoroughly familiar and it has always been given with more spirit and with better voice than last night. Mrs. Meilke has a voice of good compass and volume and of pleasing quality, though her constant employment of the tremolo marred the effect of her work.

THE BERNHARD LISTEMANN CLUB.—The musical entertainments of the week will close with a concert at the Congregational Church, Saturday evening by the celebrated Bernhard Listemann Club of Boston, being the fourth concert of the Bischoff course and the most brilliant of the series. Bernhard Listemann and Fritz Giese are a host in themselves. The former has been concertmeister and solo violinist of the Thomas and Boston symphony orchestras, but for the last three years he has given his whole time to the club which bears his name, and this will be the first time a Washington audience has had the opportunity to hear it. Fritz Giese is also well known from his four years' connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as leading 'cellist.

The proceeds of the Yale Glee and Banjo Club concert next Monday night at the Academy of Music are to be devoted to a fund for the assistance of poor students at Yale. Seats at Metzerott's.

The Adamowski Quartet concert at the Universalist Church tonight will give music lovers the first opportunity of hearing an organization that has made a high reputation for itself in Boston and the neighboring cities. The program is of unusual interest and contains several numbers that are new to Washington.

[118]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Monday Evening, March 23, at 8.

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Wednesday Evening, March 25, at 8.

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Tuesday Evening, March 24, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Broadway Theatre, Norwich.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT,

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 26, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.
MAILLARD.	ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
SAINT-SAENS.	DANSE MACABRE.
SERVAIS	FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for VIOLONCELLO.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE.	THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF.	VORSATZ.
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

[119]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Monday Evening, March 23, at 8.

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Wednesday Evening, March 25, at 8.

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Tuesday Evening, March 24, at 8.

PROGRAMME

4

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Broadway Theatre, Norwich.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT,

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 26, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.
MAILLARD.	ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
SAINT-SAENS.	DANSE MACABRE.
SERVAIS	FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for Violoncello.
	SONGS with Piano.
a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE.	THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF.	VORSATZ.
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

N HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1891

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture "Anacron..... .....Cherubini
"I have lost my Eurydice".....Gluck
Concerto for violin, No. 7 in E minor .....Spohr
Songs { Wie bist du mine Koenigin.....Brahms
Songs { Love me or not .....Secchi
Songs { Im Maien.....Hiller
Symphony No. 2 in D minor, op. 70.....Dvorak

* * * * *

Miss Lena Little is an American by birth who has lived and sung in London. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano, and certain of the tones of it are of pronounced contralto quality. While it is not in any respect a disagreeable voice, it is not warm or particularly sympathetic. Nor is it designed for the display of agility. It has been well trained, and Miss Little seems to have a well-developed sense of intonation and thoroughly grounded and correct principles of tone production. She at times is inclined to slightly force her lower tones, and this probably comes from a desire to gain a fervor of delivery and intensity of expression which do not lie in her nature. For she does not seem to have any marked temperament, and she should abstain from singing songs which demand passion and deep feeling. She is, however, evidently sincere in her work, and modest and dignified in her bearing; her claims as a singer should not be carelessly dismissed, but they should be treated with respectful consideration.

* * * * *

She sang with orchestral accompaniment the great air from Gluck's "Orpheus", and the selection proved unfortunate, for it made severe demands upon qualities which she does not possess. In the first place, the tempo chosen by her was entirely too slow. The indications by Gluck, the character of the music itself and all the traditions are against it. The recitative which precedes the air was read monotonously, and with an unvarying degree of intensity of tone. Inasmuch as there is a difference of opinion concerning the proper phrasing of the famous air itself, it may be of interest to consider the ideas of Pauline Viardot, the celebrated singer and teacher, who, when she sang the part of Orpheus in the revival of the opera in Paris (1859), stirred musical Paris and won the superb eulogy of Hector Berlioz. These ideas are found in a note to an edition of this aria which appeared in the collection called "Ecole classique du chant," a collection edited by her and now unfortunately out of print. Her remarks are as follows: "To properly deliver and phrase a dramatic aria taken from an opera, it is necessary to imagine the scene where it is placed, the situation which it expresses. Eurydice is here struck to earth by the look of her husband, who had obtained from the gods the right to take her from the shades only on the condition that he would not gaze upon her. The recitative should at once express the stupefaction with which this terrible and sudden blow strikes him, and it should be delivered with a smothered and concentrated voice which is scarcely able to articulate. The grief of Orpheus breaks out in the motive of the aria, which should be sung from one end to the other mezzo forte, without nuances. But when after the heart rending cry, 'Hear my voice which calls you,' the reprise of the motive follows, this first reprise, to express the depth of his sorrow, should be sung in a low tone, with a broken voice choked with sobs. Then after another appeal to Eurydice, followed by the words, 'Deathly silence! what torment tears my heart!' Orpheus, who has been kneeling, raises himself in a transport of remorse and sorrow, and the last reprise, more animated in movement, with fuller voice and greater energy of expression is nothing but one long cry of despair."

* * * * *

Now I do not say that because Miss Little did not sing the aria exactly in the manner prescribed by Mrs. Viardot, her performance should be judged unfavorably. If she had taken a directly opposite stand, and by her singing had shown the reasons for her conduct, while there might be a difference of opinion concerning her interpretation, nevertheless her performance might be praised. But she showed no individuality whatever, and no dramatic conception of the part. And as her tempo was radically wrong, the aria was of no effect.

* * * * *

Later in the evening she sang three songs and again showed the results of careful training. The second of the songs, a work of little merit and unfit for such an occasion, was sung extremely well, and was keenly enjoyed by the audience. She was loudly applauded after the aria and after the group of songs.

* * * * *

Mr. Otto Roth gave a thoroughly delightful performance of the Spohr concerto for the violin in E minor. It was technically free from reproach, and it was eminently musical. The concerto was played with loving care, and yet his playing was not labored. The task was so mastered that the effort seemed a spontaneous act. The details were scrupulously finished, yet the details were only the parts of a symmetrical and artistically rounded whole. It is true that a fuller tone might have been desired, but where there was so much to praise, it seems ungracious even to refer to this. He was enthusiastically applauded.

* * * * *

The orchestral numbers do not call for special remark. The Cherubini overture was finely played; and the Dvorak symphony would have been more effective no doubt, if the concert had not been prolonged to such undue length that the attention of the hearers flagged and the music was listened to perfunctorily. In fact many in the audience left the hall before the Scherzo.

* * * * *

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1, 1891.

NIKISCH DATES.—The engagements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch extend for weeks ahead. The orchestra played at Norwich, Conn., on Thursday, March 26, and will give three more concerts in Boston ending the season there April 25. A trip of four weeks begins at Philadelphia, April 27, thence to Baltimore, April 28, Washington, 29, Pittsburgh, 30 and May 1, Cleveland, 2, Detroit, 4, Ann Arbor (at the University), 5, Milwaukee, 6, Chicago, 7 and 9, Cincinnati, 11, Louisville (festival), 12 to 16, inclusive, and closing at Buffalo with one week of festival concerts ending May 28.

Stockbridge Programme

CIRCULATION, 32,000. PORTLAND, APRIL 1, 1891. CHAS. PAINE, PRINTER.

HINDS' HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM

FOR THE FACE, HANDS, SKIN, AND COMPLEXION.

FROM ANNIE LOUISE CARY (Raymond.)

My thanks for the bottle of HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM are late in being made, but I wished to test it thoroughly. I am greatly delighted with it, and wish you would send a dozen bottles to my New York address.

Sept. 21, 1888. ANNIE LOUISE RAYMOND.

BY TELEGRAPH.

(From the distinguished prima donna, who sang in the Stockbridge Course last season.)

NEW YORK, April 21, 1888.

To A. S. HINDS, Portland, Me. :—I leave for Europe next Tuesday. Send me at once six large bottles HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM to Westminster Hotel.

FRUSCH MADI.

LONDON, Eng., Aug. 8, 1888.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Sir:—Having had a bottle of your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM from Mme. Frusch Madi, and finding it agreeable to me, would you kindly send six bottles of the same to

MR. RUDI LANDAUER,
Rue et hotel de Helder, Paris.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, Feb. 4, 1887.

MR. HINDS:

Will you please send me as soon as possible, one and a half dozen HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM. I got two bottles when in Portland last fall, and like it so much that I want to distribute some among my friends in the hotel. I have never used anything for rendering the skin smooth that I like so much as this CREAM.

Yours very truly,
MRS. STANLEY.

HOTEL VENDOME, NEW YORK, April 20, 1887.

MR. HINDS:—My friends are delighted with the CREAM. One lady has sent an order through her druggist for six bottles. She told me she has never found anything before that she could use, her skin being very sensitive. MRS. STANLEY.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

Dear Sir:—I have used your HONEY AND ALMOND CREAM for a long time, in families where I have been called, and consider it invaluable for chafing and irritation of infants. I invariably recommend it in preference to anything else, and have always derived great satisfaction from its use.

Also, as a dressing for blisters, I have found it superior to anything I ever used, giving immediate relief and healing quickly.

MRS. H. J. POTTER, Nurse,
124 Emery Street, Portland.

MR. A. S. HINDS:

I have been troubled with Salt Rheum on my hands very badly for several years; at times they have been so bad that I could not use them. I have tried everything. Last March I saw your CREAM advertised and thought, as a last resort, I would try it; before I had used one bottle my hands were perfectly well. I think I cannot be without it. Thanking you for ever making such a blessing, I remain, etc.,

MRS. E. A. THOMAS.

PRICE, - - 50 CENTS
SPECIAL SIZE, - $1.00

PREPARED BY
A. S. HINDS, Pharmacist,
PORTLAND, MAINE.

WIT AND HUMOR.

"A little nonsense now and then
Is relished by the wisest men."

There is no full stop to the furnace in cold weather. It always requires the colon.

The first people to "elevate the stage" were the highwaymen. They were successful in "holding it up."

A Pennsylvania woman has worked on a crazy quilt all day for thirteen years. The quilt is not quite crazy, but she is.

Smith—The City of Paris, I hear, consumes more coal than other ship. Jones—That's a mistake. Smith—What ship beats it, then? Jones—Courtship.

She—Uncle Charles, what should you call Mr. Crossbar, a harper or a pianist? He—Neither. If I called him anything I should say he was a confounded nuisance.

Little Dick—Do you go to circuses? Circuses is wicked. Little Jack—Yes; the big shows is wicked, but the ten cent shows ain't. Pop always takes us to them.

Tommy—Say, Mr. Dryleigh, you can try it on me if you like. Rev. Mr. D.—I don't understand you, my child. Try what? Tommy—Why, ma says you can put anybody to sleep in five minutes. (Tableau—red light.)

Tired Child—Mamma, how much did you put in the collection? Mother—A quarter, my dear. Why? Tired Child (gaping)—Well, this preacher gives an awful lot for the money, don't he?

Wife—James, do you know that you are a very small man? Husband—How ridiculous! I am nearly six feet in height. Wife—That makes no difference; whenever I ask you for money to go shopping you are always short.

Self Preservation—Wealthy Old Gent—What! Marry my daughter! You are being supported by your father now, ain't you? Suitor—Yes, sir; but my father is tired of supporting me, and I thought I'd better get into another family.

An impossibility—Clara—I think it's a shame I can't entertain a gentleman alone. While Mr. Dashaway was in the parlor last night I just know that you were peeking through the keyhole. Maud—The idea! Why the key was on the inside.

Full of Suggestions.

You gaze into our store windows and the thought suggests itself, "that Chamber Set would look better in my room." You enter the store and promenade through the Parlor and Drapery Departments, and the tempting display of rich and entirely new goods suggest a few changes that might be made in your home, and to advantage.

Our Drapery Room Furniture is as exquisite as our Draperies are rich. Chenille and Irish Point, both have equal claims on your attention. The Library and Dining Room Oddities cannot fail to impress you, and when you draw out your check for your purchases the amount required to make your home a spot of beauty will be a pleasant surprise on account of it's small proportions.

No pains have been spared in selecting the goods, they are the first fruits of the New York and Western markets, Carpets especially. Portland citizens can revel in the luxuries of the East without leaving their city.

If medium grades of Furnishing are required, they are equally low in price and late in pattern. Visit our store and we guarantee you perfect satisfaction.

—THE—
Atkinson House Furnishing Co.,
COR. PEARL AND MIDDLE STS.,
PORTLAND, ME.

BRANCHES: Bangor, Auburn, Rockland, Biddeford, Norway, Gardiner, Waterville, Bath.

ISAAC C. ATKINSON, General Manager.

Clipping from Dispatch
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3—29

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Monday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in a programme calculated to delight Wagnerian ears. It was made up entirely from the works of the great apostle of the music of the future, the excerpts ranging from "Tannhauser" through the Nibelungen Ring tetralogy to "Tristan und Isolde." Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel, of the New York Metropolitan opera, sang the love duet from "Tristan" and duet from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Herr Dippel also sang Lohengrin's narrative. It was a great occasion for the Wagnerites, who were out in full force. The work of the orchestra throughout was superb.

[120]

- Philadelphia.

rch 23, at 8.

7ME

nager.
nt Manager.

- Washington.

March 25, at 8.

7ME

Manager.
tant Manager.

In drawing attention to their new linens department, Messrs. OWEN, MOORE & Co. are encouraged by the belief that in offering a choice and carefully selected stock of the finer grades of house-keeping linens at rather lower price than such goods are commonly sold for they accomplish a two-fold object,—do themselves and the linen buying public a good turn which will be more and more appreciated as the new department becomes better known.

Fine Leather Goods,

HOLIDAY GOODS,

Artistic Wall Papers,

—AT—

LORING, SHORT & HARMON'S,

Booksellers and Stationers,

Opp. Preble House, - CONGRESS STREET.

$4.50.

That is awful cheap for a Black Enamel Clock, eight day, half hour strike, Cathedral Gong.

95 cents for a first class Nickle Alarm Clock.

Only $1.50 for a genuine Peep O'Day Alarm Clock.

Only $14.99 for a genuine French Clock, Marble Case, Cathedral Gong, Visible Escapement. This clock will surely please you.

Largest stock of clocks in the city. Of course, my prices are the lowest.

First-class clock repairing by a first-class clock repairer.

McKenney the Jeweler,

MONUMENT SQ., UNDER U. S. HOTEL.

HENRY A. HARDING,

Formerly TIMMONS & HAWES,

Ladies' and Gents' Oyster Rooms,

No. 15 MONUMENT SQUARE,

New Brown Block.

The Finest Ladies' Room East of Boston.
Ladies' Room up one flight.

TELEPHONE, 586.

How jolly are the Esquimaux,
In the land of perpetual snaux,
And where the weather, you knaux,
Is always way down belaux Zeraux.

Carpet Salesman—Yes'm, that's genuine Brussels, made at Brussels by Mr. Brussels himself.

Mrs. Gazzam (to Sadie Bloobumper)—Where's your mamma, Sadie? Sadie—She went over to Mrs. Gargoyle's two hours ago to stay five minutes.

First Tramp—So you want me to go and ring the door bell while you sit here and rest? Second Tramp—Yes, Clarence, you press the button and I do the rest.

Ted—I suppose the best way to find out whether she loves me is to go right up and ask her? Ned—Not at all, my boy. Ask one of her girl friends.

Clara—Jack intends to have everything his own way when we are married. Clara's Mamma—Then why do you marry him? Clara—To relieve his mind of a wrong impression.

Minister—What a pleasure to be good! Are you good, Tommy? Tommy—No, not very, but I'm goin' to turn over a new leaf soon as I lick that Thompson kid—business before pleasure—that's my motto.

Lumley—Ah, Chum what are you doing nowadays? Chumley—Oh, I'm writing for a living. Lumley—Are you indeed? Do you write for newspapers or magizines? Chumley—Neither. I write to the old man for remittances.

FOSS'

PURE FLAVORING

EXTRACTS

—ARE THE—

Purest, Strongest, and Best!

Sold and recommended as the finest by some of the largest and best dealers in the country.

—PREPARED BY—

Schlotterbeck & Foss,

Manufacturing Chemists,

PORTLAND, ME.

Our valuable Receipts for Ice Cream and Sherberts, sent to anybody who will inclose a two cent stamp to pay postage.

HASKELL & JONES,

Manufacturers and Retailers of

MEN'S, YOUTHS' AND BOYS'

MEDIUM AND FINE CLOTHING.

In point of fit, style, and excellence of trimmings and workmanship, our Clothing is excelled by none in the Market.

Our Furnishing Goods Department is full of choice things for Fall and Winter.

Full Dress Furishings a Specialty. Dress Suits to Loan.

470 CONGRESS ST., MONUMENT SQUARE.

ABNER W. LOWELL,

Successor to W. S. LOWELL,

Fashionable Stationer.

Wedding, Party and Visiting Cards.

513 CONGRESS ST.

REMOVAL.

New Store, New Goods.

Watches, Jewelry.

SPECIAL SALE OF

OPERA GLASSES,

Best Imported Makers, now at 203 MIDDLE ST., Nearly Opp. Falmouth Hotel.

M. STEINERT & SONS,

Of Steinert Hall, Boston, Mass.,

Wholesale and Retail Representatives in the New England States for the Celebrated PIANOS of Steinway & Sons,

Hardman,
Gabler & Bro.,
Henning, and Pease,

Respectfully announce to the public that they have opened a branch house at 540 CONGRESS STREET, Portland, Me., under the management of

MR. T. C. McGOULDRICK, and they will constantly carry a large and varied stock of these world renowned Pianos.

M. STEINERT & SONS,

540 Congress St., Portland, Me.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.
MAILLARD.	ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
SAINT-SAËNS.	DANSE MACABRE.
SERVAIS	FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for VIOLONCELLO.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE.	THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF.	VORSATZ.
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

[119]

remark. The Cherubini overture was finely played; and the Dvorak symphony would have been more effective no doubt, if the concert had not been prolonged to such undue length that the attention of the hearers flagged and the music was listened to perfunctorily. In fact many of the audience left the hall before the Scherzo.

* * * * *

THE MUSICAL COURIER

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1

NIKISCH DATES.—The engagements of Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch extend ahead. The orchestra played at Norwich, Co day, March 26, and will give three more conce ending the season there April 25. A trip of f gins at Philadelphia, April 27, thence to Baltim

Washington, 29, Pittsburgh, 30 and May 1, Detroit, 4, Ann Arbor (at the University), 5 6, Chicago, 7 and 9, Cincinnati, 11, Louisvill to 16, inclusive, and closing at Buffalo with on tival concerts ending May 23.

[120]

BAKER'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

TRADE ✠ MARK.

The ladies appreciate FACTS,
And they know our flavoring extracts,
Compared with others STAND THE TEST,
And WITHOUT EXCEPTION ARE THE BEST.

BAKER'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are Favorably known at home, and far Away. Their DELICATE FLAVOR
And GREAT STRENGTH insures public favor.

For PURITY and STRENGTH as well
THESE EXTRACTS all other brands excel
And are sold (as a surety)
With a GUARANTEE OF PURITY.

Our Extracts are we wish to state
ALWAYS UNIFORM and of FULL WEIGHT
They are prepared with GREATEST CARE
FROM THE FRUITS and are sold everywhere.

ROBERT B. SWIFT,

OPTICIAN.

513 CONGRESS STREET.

Stockbridge's Music Store,

540 CONGRESS ST.,

Sheet Music, Music Books,

Musical Instruments,

STRINGS, TRIMMINGS,

MUSICAL MERCHANDISE,

Foreign Editions. Cheap Editions.

Maine Lecture and Musical Agency.

TELEPHONE, 415-B.

IRA C. STOCKBRIDGE.

Kuyler's Candies

We are the Sole Agents for these CANDIES which are acknowledged to be the Finest in the World.

Schlotterbeck & Foss,
PORTLAND, ME.

PROGRAMME.

ELEVENTH ENTERTAINMENT,

Wednesday Evening, April 1st.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra,

60——MUSICIANS——60

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

Miss FLORENCE JOSEPHINE LEE,
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

1. Overture, Lenore No. 3, Beethoven
2. "Ocean," Aria from Weber's "Oberon."
   MISS LEE.
3. Unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert
   Allegro moderato—Andante con moto.
4. Rondo Capriccioso for Violin, Saint-Saëns
   MR. ADAMOWSKI.
5. { a, "Moonlight," Schumann
   { b, "On the Manzanares, Jensen
   MISS LEE.
6. Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner
7. Grand Polonaise, Liszt

(SEE FOURTH PAGE.)

Deutsches Kolinskes Wasser

(OUR NEW GERMAN COLOGNE.)

Made from the Formula of JOHANN MARIE FARINA.

FRAGRANT! DELICATE! LASTING!

—BOTTLED BY—

Schlotterbeck & Foss,
PORTLAND, ME.

Grewer's Vienna Cafe,

508 CONGRESS STREET.

After the Entertainment, call at GREWER'S CAFE for ICE CREAM OR LUNCH.

Oysters served in Every Style.

I have fitted up rooms elegantly, for private parties, and most cordially invite your inspection.

LADIES

Who are accustomed to wearing FINE SHOES, will please take notice that

WYER GREENE & CO.,

Have the exclusive sale in Portland of the celebrated Laird, Schober & Mitchell Fine Shoes.

A larger variety than ever in SPRING GOODS.

539 CONGRESS ST.

CHAS. PAINE,

PRINTING.

118 EXCHANGE ST.,

Telephone, 555. PORTLAND.

PUT UP EXPRESSLY

FOR FAMILY USE

in 3, 5, and 10 lb. pails and 10 lb. tubs; also by the tierce, barrel, half barrels and tubs; is for sale by every first-class grocer and provision dealer—all lard rendered by us is free from all Cotton Seed Oil, Tallow, Suet, and other adulterations so commonly used, and WARRANTED STRICTLY PURE. None genuine without our name stamped upon the package.

PURE LARD

JOHN P. SQUIRE & Co.,
BOSTON, MASS.

MILLINERY.

We now have on exhibition some of the finest PATTERN HATS AND BONNETS ever offered by us.

All Ladies should visit our store while we have so large an assortment of fine goods.

JOHN E. PALMER,

543 Congress Street.

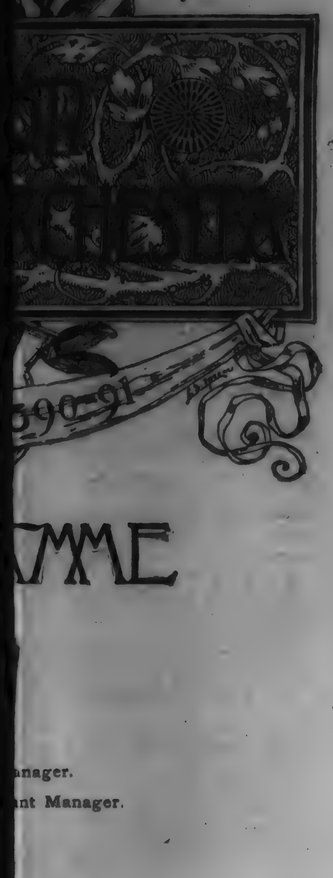
Clipping from Dispatch
Philadelphia Pa
Date 3—29

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Monday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in a programme calculated to delight Wagnerian ears. It was made up entirely from the works of the great apostle of the music of the future, the excerpts ranging from "Tannhauser" through the Nibelungen Ring tetralogy to "Tristan und Isolde." Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel, of the New York Metropolitan opera, sang the love duet from "Tristan" and duet from "Goetterdæmmerung," Herr Dippel also sang Lohengrin's narrative. It was a great occasion for the Wagnerites, who were out in full force. The work of the orchestra throughout was superb.

- Philadelphia.

March 23, at 8.



anager.

nt Manager.

- Washington.

March 25, at 8.

anager.

nt Manager.

RCHIVES

STOCKBRIDGE PROGRAMME.

DIAMONDS! FINE JEWELRY!

Waltham Watches.

WM. SENTER & CO.,

51 Exchange Street, - PORTLAND.

ARTHUR W. BEALE & CO.,

Clothing and Furnishings,

177 MIDDLE ST.,

Two Doors above Post-Office. PORTLAND, ME.

BUSINESS Education

Shaw's Business College,

507 1-2 Congress St., Over Owen, Moore & Co.

Has Theoretical, Practical and Ladies' Departments in Separate rooms, and accepts no payment in advance.

F. L. SHAW, Principal.

OVERCOATINGS.

We offer for your inspection in our Tailoring Department, an elegant assortment of Kersey and Melton Overcoatings,

For Fall and Winter use. The most popular fabric for this season's wear.

Tailoring Department,

ALLEN & COMPANY,

MIDDLE STREET.

A CARD.

I take pleasure in announcing to the patrons of this Course, that I have fitted up an elegant LADIES' ROOM on the second floor, in addition to the Gents' Room, which is the finest in its furnishings east of Boston. Oysters served in every style. Please give me a call. Very respectfully yours,

HENRY A. HARDING,
Formerly Timmons & Hawes,
15 Monument Square.

NOTE.—The doors will be kept closed during the performance of each number on the Programme.

All Pianos used at these Entertainments are from the Warerooms of M. STEINERT & SONS,

T. C. McGOULDRIC, MANAGER. 540 Congress St.

The Closing Entertainment in this Course will be given on Wednesday Evening, April 15th, by Miss Mary Howe, and other talent.

COMING ENTERTAINMENTS.

APRIL 3.—6th Popular. "Luttemann Sextette."

APRIL 15.—12th Stockbridge. "Miss Mary Howe."

APRIL 16.—4th Matinee. "Primrose and West's Minstrels."

APRIL 16.—Extra, Evening. "Primrose and West's Minstrels."

APRIL 20 and 21.—Extra. "Ship Ahoy."

APRIL 24.—5th Matinee. "Gilmore."

APRIL 24.—7th Popular. "Gilmore."

APRIL 25.—Extra, Matinee. "Gilmore."

APRIL 25.—Extra, Evening. "Gilmore."

MAY 16.—6th Matinee. "McGibeny."

MAY 16.—8th Popular. McGibeny."

Divorce suits and like domestic calamities are unknown in families where BAKER'S FLAVORINGS are used. A wise woman does not care to disturb her husband's otherwise sunny and never-to-be-ruffled disposition by experiments with impure and cheap extracts. She continues to use BAKER'S, notwithstanding the efforts of unscrupulous dealers to induce her to buy brands which they maintain are "just as good."

You'll make no mistake in buying your paints of us.

Whether you are going to paint your house or only a chair, you will find the right kind of paint and brushes at our store, and our prices are not too high.

H. H. HAY & SON, Middle St.

J. A. MERRILL & CO.,

Jewelers.

DIAMONDS.

503 Congress St., - PORTLAND.

J. A. MERRILL. A. KEITH.

CHAS. F. DAM,

SIGN PAINTER.

Glass Signs and Cards a Specialty.

118 EXCHANGE ST.,

PORTLAND, - MAINE.

THURSTON'S

PIANO HOUSE.

The Largest Assortment of

Pianos and Organs,

STOOLS, COVERS, SCARFS,

—AND—

MUSIC CABINETS.

Tuning to Order.

SAMUEL THURSTON,

3 Free St. Block, - 12 Free St.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Lenore" No. 3.
MAILLARD.	ARIA. "Les Dragons de Villars."
SCHUBERT.	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor. Allegro.—Andante con moto.
SAINT-SAENS.	DANSE MACABRE.
SERVAIS	FANTASIE CHARACTERISTIQUE for VIOLONCELLO.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) GOLDMARK.	DIE QUELLE.
b) GADE.	THE GOLDSMITH.
c) RAFF.	VORSATZ.
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MR. ANTON HEKKING.

[119]

remark. The Cherubini overture was finely played; and the Dvorak symphony would have been more effective no doubt, if the concert had not been prolonged to such undue length that the attention of the hearers flagged and the music was listened to perfunctorily. In fact many in the audience left the hall before the Scherzo.

* * * * *

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1, 1891.

NIKISCH DATES.—The engagements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch extend for weeks ahead. The orchestra played at Norwich, Conn., on Thursday, March 26, and will give three more concerts in Boston ending the season there April 25. A trip of four weeks begins at Philadelphia, April 27, thence to Baltimore, April 28, Washington, 29, Pittsburgh, 30 and May 1, Cleveland, 2, Detroit, 4, Ann Arbor (at the University), 5, Milwaukee, 6, Chicago, 7 and 9, Cincinnati, 11, Louisville (festival), 12 to 16, inclusive, and closing at Buffalo with one week of festival concerts ending May 23.

[120]

Clipping from Dispatch
Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 3-29

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Monday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in a programme calculated to delight Wagnerian ears. It was made up entirely from the works of the great apostle of the music of the future, the excerpts ranging from "Tannhauser" through the Nibelungen Ring tetralogy to "Tristan und Isolde." Frau Mielke and Herr Dippel, of the New York Metropolitan opera, sang the love duet from "Tristan" and duet from "Gœtterdæmmerung," Herr Dippel also sang Lohengrin's narrative. It was a great occasion for the Wagnerites, who were out in full force. The work of the orchestra throughout was superb.

...on, Norwich, Conn.

27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

While not crowded the Broadway theater was well filled, Thursday evening, when the much praised and long heralded Boston Symphony [illegible] engagement. Local curiosity was at concert pitch not alone to hear the musical wonders achieved by this famous organization, but to witness the manner and method of its noted conductor. In the many lengthy press notices of this orchestra there has been an almost amusing silence regarding the conducting proper, for the reason that Mr. Nikisch has been the despair of the critics. He deals with his men as one who gives them credit for knowing their own business; they know his mind and obey his look, and heed his slightest gesture often quite unperceived by the audience; and so he is an enigma to the critics, accustomed as they are to the hop-skip-and-a-jump, one-two-three-and-away species of leader. His baton, like the wand of the magician, with instantaneous and infallible power raises the listener to the ideal sphere of the varied and intense emotions which are taking form as their composers in ended.

Perhaps the most popular number last evening was the "Danse Macabre," the "Dance of Death," which has been interpreted by every world-famed orchestra. This composition does not follow the episode which Holbein's picture has made familiar, but is based upon a grotesque poem by Henry Cazalis, beginning

"Zig, zig, zig—grim Death, in cadence,
Striking with his heel a tomb,
Death at midnight plays a dance tune,
Zig, zig, zig, upon his viol."

Death is described as a fiddler, summoning the skeletons from their graves at midnight for a dance, the hour being indicated by the strings. The ghastly merriment is interrupted by sombre strains, kept up till cock-crow, the signal for the instant disappearance of the grim and clattering revelers. The poem is based upon these two themes: the dance measure punctuated by the clack of the bones; the other and more serious strains symbolical of night and the silence of the grave. The variations in both themes continue until the cock crow (given out by the oboe) sounds the signal for the close. It is really a waltz measure set off with grotesque and ingenious instrumentation. As a matter of course it was magnificently rendered, and was received with sincere and long continued applause.

It is only painting the lily to praise the playing of such an organization. Its performances carry with them a self-sustaining glory, which in harmonious effect transcend the descriptive power of words.

In Mrs. Nikisch the conductor has a helpmeet indeed; a lady with charming stage presence and with a voice which gives heart as well as ear pleasure.

Mr. Anton Hekking was heard in the Servais' "Fantasie Characterisque," which lost nothing of its charm by being so familiar to local audiences. Herr Hekking's treatment of this popular composition was a revelation of the possibilities of the cello when manipulated by an artist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a change in the announced programme Saturday night at the Symphony concert, made necessary by the continued illness of Mr. Nikisch. Had it been known positively early in the week that Mr. Nikisch would have been unable to appear it is probable that the original programme would have been carried out, for Mr. Kneisel proved himself to be a musician fully capable of conducting the orchestra whose concertmeister he has been for so long, and had he conducted the rehearsals, which were postponed, there is little doubt that the Svensden symphony and the Liszt concerto could have been successfully rendered. It was unfortunate that the latter number could not have been given by Arthur Freidheim, the piano soloist. It was stated that he was the favorite pupil of Liszt and excelled in the interpretation of the works of his teacher. As it was, he gave on Saturday night a Sonata of Chopin, an uninteresting number, and which was a disappointment. The artist has a very delicate touch, of sufficient power, however, when required, and produces a singing tone on the piano which is very beautiful. His tones are clearly made and his tecnique admirable, but he failed to bring the audience into that sympathy with him which De Pachmann always produces. At a series of recitals which he is to give later a better opportunity will doubtless be given, from the varied programmes which he is to render, to judge of his capabilities. The reputation which he has attained in European circles is surely a guarantee of his gifts, and, in fact, the solo numbers which he gave at the Friday afternoon rehearsal were more pleasing and gave less disappointment to those who were prepared to hear artistic interpretations. The orchestral numbers comprised Rubenstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," given for the first time, Lalo's "Rhapsody" and the Second Symphony by Beethoven. The works were all well played—the Rubinstein number being particularly well interpreted and giving much pleasure. Mr. Kneisel conducted along the lines laid down by Mr. Nikisch. At the same time it was marked in the symphony by a distinct personality which did not suffer from comparison with such a leader as Mr Nikisch. He is more magnetic as to outward appearances, held the band effect control, and was enthusiastically [illegible] The work of Saturday evening has [illegible] into stronger favor than [illegible] audiences. Mr. Adam-

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 6, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FIRST HEARING OF ARTHUR FRIEDHEIM, THE LISZTIAN.

A Very Favorable Impression Made by This Latest of the Pianists—Mr. Kneisel Conducts in Mr. Nikisch's Absence—The Marine Band Concert.

An attack of tonsilitis with which Mr. Nikisch is suffering, was the means of introducing a new conductor to the symphony orchestra last Saturday. Mr. Franz Kneisel assumed the baton and was greeted by the audience with an enthusiasm that must have given him a degree of confidence at the outset. His excellent work justified the reception; he was rather conservative as compared with the regular conductor, yet there was an intelligence in his readings, a decision in his beat, that showed at once that he is not to be classed with those automatic leaders whom the Germans graphically call "metronomes."

The programme began with a new overture by Rubinstein, entitled "Antony and Cleopatra" The inequality of the great composer is shown in this work, as in so many of his others, and the richness of the scoring does not always hide the paucity or the conventionality of the ideas. The languor of the Orient is mingled with the trumpets of imperial Rome, and a tale of love and war is told in a comprehensible manner, but the working out of the themes is often turgid, and the amount of percussion employed tends to cheapen the general effect. Too often does the composer take refuge in "sounding brass or tinkling cymbal." Another northern composer has recently given us a pair of Shakespeare's lovers in worthier guise; beside Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the presentation of "Antony and Cleopatra" seems but feeble.

Besides the change of conductors, another substitution was necessitated at this concert by the non-arrival of the orchestral parts of the concerto which Mr. Arthur Friedheim was to have played. Prof. Baermann, with characteristic courtesy, came to the rescue with these parts, but too late for the necessary rehearsals, and therefore Chopin's B minor sonata was substituted. It was well played, and it showed that Mr. Friedheim is not to be regarded merely as a Jupiter Tonans of the piano, but can do most delicate as well as crashing and thunderous work. Every part of the sonata was performed in a poetic, intelligent and musicianly manner: perhaps there was a trifling lack of passion and intensity, but even this was a failing that leaned to virtue's side. The scherzo was played too delicately for the hall, but in the finale the pianist became also a fortepianist, and rang out the chief theme with inspiring power. But he did not turn his music upside down, he did not make little speeches to the audience, he did not grimace, in short he acted as a gentleman should in a public concert, and therefore the frenzy which Pachmann awakened did not follow his performance, although two hearty recalls were given. It must be added, however, that Paehmann's delicacy in the lighter passages and his wonderful singing legato were not attained.

Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody" was splendidly read and the life of the Spring-Tanz and the hurly-burly of the Halling (most characteristic of Scandinavitan dances) were in its measures. The violins did excellently in this and the trumpets both here and in the first overture deserve especial mention.

The changes of programme did not end with the substitution by the pianist of Chopin's very rarely played sonata spoken of above, but Svendsen's symphony which had been announced, was metamorphosed into Beethoven's second symphony. This is a weaker sister among the nine, but it has interest enough for any but the most exorbitant. It is Beethoven's transition to a broader school, it presents the first symphonic scherzo, and it has a more earnest and vigorous finale than Mozart or Haydn ever dreamed of. Yet the scherzo, chronologically the first, is very minuet-like, far less of a scherzo in fact than the minuet of the first symphony. There is, however, one point in its trio which seems to have been unnoticed by the commentators; in this part Beethoven has brought in the most formal characteristics of the antique minuet; a squarecut, eight-barred theme with even the oldfashioned instrumentation (oboes and bassoon) seems to indicate that the master desired to present a contrast between the old Haydn manner and the new form with which he sought to replace it. The symphony was read by Mr. Kneisel in a manner that deserves the most cordial recognition, and if the sudden illness of our brilliant conductor caused the audience to partake of a species of musical pot-luck, at least the banquet was not less enjoyable than the musical feasts which have preceded it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 5, 1891.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been so singularly exempt from the usual accidental happenings incidental to such enterprises that the complete overturn in the programme of last evening created general surprise among the season's patrons.

The illness of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the faithful conductor of the orchestra, added to other causes, necessitated a rearrangement of the programme and put Mr. Franz Kneisel at the head of the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch.

The programme performed, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Friedheim as piano soloist, was Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," Chopin's sonata in B minor for piano, Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra in A, and Beethoven's second symphony.

The appearance of Mr. Friedheim was awaited with great expectations by those who had enjoyed a hearing of his interpretations of the Liszt numbers at the Friday rehearsal. In these numbers he gave the impression of being a player whose masterly attainments must instantly command recognition, and an artist who can realize the fullest possibilities of the piano in all his work. Technical attainments alone have come to be such a common qualification with modern day pianists that something more than such abilities are demanded to attract attention, and in Mr. Friedheim's playing on Friday technique appeared but a means to an end, and in such composition as were included in the programme he has few rivals now before the public. His method differs from that which finds general favor in these days, but he gets results which show its value and possibilities. His tone is wonderfully pure, his touch clean, clear and limpid, or equal to the severest demands of Liszt's composition as may be desired. He justified the use of the much ill used word "phenomenal" in describing his virtuosity, and it was quite evident that his first Boston audience realized his standing among the world's pianists as he was recalled with so much persistency after his announced numbers that the applause could not be quieted until he had added the raphsody No. 2, by Liszt.

Despite this successful debut Mr. Friedheim took occasion to make a change in this number for the concert, and played the Chopin sonata indicated above It was a dangerous experiment with the recollection of the Chopin playing of Pachmann so vividly in mind, and the result was what might have been easily predicted. With all his genius as a player, Mr. Friedheim lacks the certain something called magnetism, needed to give Chopin's compositions their best effect. His playing of the sonata was a masterly piece of work, but it failed to meet the full requirements and fell tamely upon an audience eager to repeat the enthusiastic recognition of the pianist's abilities given by the rehearsal audience.

The Rubinstein overture made the novelty of the evening and proved a vastly interesting descriptive work, in which the tone colors of the full modern orchestra have been applied with the masterly skill of its composer, and the leading themes fitly typify the characters of the drama; the strongly contrasting figures of Anthony and Cleopatra being given with rare distinctness in the orchestral combinations. It is an extremely interesting overture, and had an excellent reading by Mr. Kneisel.

The Lalo rhapsody was played with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel is to be especially commended for the spirit and taste shown in the performance of the second Beethoven symphony, which gained him the hearty favor of the audience.

A Wagner programme is promised for next Saturday evening.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6.

....

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert given Saturday evening in Music Hall was made up of Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture; Lalo's rhapsody in A, and Beethoven's second symphony. As Mr. Nikisch was sick, the orchestra was led by Mr. Franz Kneisel. Mr. Kneisel conducted with great skill, and as a result the playing of the orchestra was unusually good. The delightful rhapsody of Lalo was admirably given, and the Beethoven symphony, under Mr. Kneisel's direction, was played with a precision, a musical simplicity and clearness, an unexaggerated and therefore effective use of dynamics, that made the performance one to be long remembered. Mr. Kneisel did not slight many measures to suddenly gain an effect at variance with the text. He did not trifle with the tempos, and yet how perfect was the rhythmic swing of the scherzo. The gradations of tone were most carefully observed; pianissimos were respected; and fortes were not fortissimos. While the rights of the instruments were constantly regarded, and the thematic construction was therefore eminently clear, there was an absence of apparent labor and affectation; and so in the andante of the symphony the strings sang; they were not rasped. Mr. Kneisel was most heartily applauded after each number and at the end of the concert.

....

The Rubinstein overture was played last week for the first time in this city. It is not a great work, nor is it worthy of the reputation of the composer. Yet it is interesting in patches. The themes are fresh and the "Cleopatra" motive is very melodious. The themes are carelessly strung together and the developments are crude and rambling. The instrumentation is a mixture of cleverness and rawness and the "colors" are laid on with a knife. Mr. Kneisel in this overture made the most musician-like and stirring crescendo that has been heard in Music Hall this season.

....

Mr. Arthur Friedheim played Chopin's B minor sonata for the pianoforte. It would be fairer to speak of his powers, and possible limitations, after he has given his recitals; for his playing of the sonata leaves certain questions unanswered. He has a well developed technique, an agreeable touch, taste, and a modesty of bearing that instantaneously wins sympathy and respect. Whether he is a man of temperament, whether he has a marked individuality, this remains to be seen. He was twice recalled.

....

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, the 11th, will be made up of selections from the works of Wagner. Mrs. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Arthur Friedmann, the Piano Soloist—Franz Kneisel, Conductor.

Director Arthur Nikisch has been confined to his house by illness for several days past, so it was necessary to make several changes in the announced programmes of the symphony concerts for both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Franz Kneisel proved an acceptable substitute for Mr. Nikisch. He was heartily applauded upon first appearance because of long established personal popularity, and afterwards because of the satisfactory readings given the several selections played under his baton.

Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture was the novelty offered by the orchestra. This is the latest of the great composer's works, having been written at Badenweiler last summer. The overture is chiefly notable as an example of Rubinstein's unique instrumentation. It is not strikingly melodious, nor particularly suggestive of the subject treated, at least such was the impression left by a single hearing of the writing. There are three themes, strongly marked by individuality and colored with characteristic brilliancy. These are surrounded by a variety of well-contrasted and appropriate subjects, which combine to make the work of unusual interest. Lalo's dainty and charming rhapsody for orchestra, in A, was delightfully interpreted. The Beethoven symphony, No. 2, in D, substituted for the announced Svendsen symphony, was admirably performed.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim was the soloist. While he cannot be classed as the equal of several pianists who have recently been heard here, he is entitled to respect as a player of much merit. At the Friday afternoon rehearsal he played Liszt's ballad for pianoforte, No. 2, and two rhapsodies, Nos. 2 and 6. At last evening's concert he chose to give Chopin's sonata in B minor. The change was a surprise, and one not easily accounted for. Mr. Friedheim was a pupil of Liszt, and judging by the contrasted works played at the Symphony he is essentially an interpreter of the Liszt class of music. He is a brilliant performer, possesses extraordinary power and has a surprising command of technique. The second Liszt rhapsody showed him at his best, for he really gave a magnificent interpretation of this difficult work. The rehearsal audience applauded him with enthusiasm. Very cordial also was the recognition bestowed upon his Chopin interpretation. In this he displayed facility of execution and much musical intelligence, but after so recently hearing Chopin from the fingers of De Pachmann and Scharwenka, Mr. Friedheim's interpretation seemed to lack both warmth and expression.

A Wagner programme will be offered at the next Symphony concert. The soloists will be Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Last Evening's Concert Conducted by Mr. Kneisel.

The twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall last evening had no such programme as Conductor Nikisch had planned.

Conductor Nikisch was ill.

Concertmeister Kneisel conducted.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim was the soloist.

Mr. Kneisel evidently did not feel equal to the Svendsen Symphony, or the Liszt A major concerto; instead the orchestra played the Second Symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Friedheim's selection was the B minor sonata of Chopin.

Mr. Friedheim should have known in advance that only a Liszt or a Rubinstein ought to play the Chopin sonata. It is an inherently stupid work, written in the composer's worst possible vein, and absolutely unfit for public performance. Mr. Friedheim made it the medium for a superfluous display of technique. Mr. Friedheim has a brilliant surface-technique. He is not a great pianist, but he produces a charming tone from a Steinway, an instrument that bears the same relation to other piano-fortes that Liszt did to other pianists. Mr. Friedheim was once or twice politely recalled. Beethoven's Second symphony was ably read by Mr. Kneisel. Mr. Nikisch with his poetic hand would not have done so well with it. The remainder of the programme was well-played.

C. L. C.

[121]

Bulletin, Norwich, Conn.

3-27.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

While not crowded the Broadway theater was well filled, Thursday evening, when the much praised and long heralded Boston Symphony [illegible] engagement. Local curiosity was at concert pitch not alone to hear the musical wonders achieved by this famous organization, but to witness the manner and method of its noted conductor. In the many lengthy press notices of this orchestra there has been an almost amusing silence regarding the conducting proper, for the reason that Mr. Nikisch has been the despair of the critics. He deals with his men as one who gives them credit for knowing their own business; they know his mind and obey his look, and heed his slightest gesture, often quite unperceived by the audience; and so he is an enigma to the critics, accustomed as they are to the hop-skip-and-a-jump, one-two-three-and-away species of leader. His baton, like the wand of the magician, with instantaneous and infallible power raises the listener to the ideal sphere of the varied and intense emotions which are taking form as their composers in ended.

Perhaps the most popular number last evening was the "Danse Macabre," the "Dance of Death," which has been interpreted by every world-famed orchestra. This composition does not follow the episode which Holbein's picture has made familiar, but is based upon a grotesque poem by Henry Cazalis, beginning

"Zig, zig, zig—grim Death, in cadence,
Striking with his heel a tomb,
Death at midnight plays a dance tune,
Zig, zig, zig, upon his viol."

Death is described as a fiddler, summoning the skeletons from their graves at midnight for a dance, the hour being indicated by the strings. The ghastly merriment is interrupted by sombre strains, kept up till cock-crow, the signal for the instant disappearance of the grim and clattering revelers. The poem is based upon these two themes: the dance measure punctuated by the clack of the bones; the other and more serious strains symbolical of night and the silence of the grave. The variations in both themes continue until the cock crow (given out by the oboe) sounds the signal for the close. It is really a waltz measure set off with grotesque and ingenious instrumentation. As a matter of course it was magnificently rendered, and was received with sincere and long continued applause.

It is only painting the lily to praise the playing of such an organization. Its performances carry with them a self-sustaining glory, which in harmonious effect transcend the descriptive power of words.

In Mrs. Nikisch the conductor has a helpmeet indeed; a lady with charming stage presence and with a voice which gives heart as well as ear pleasure.

Mr. Anton Hekking was heard in the Servais' "Fantasie Characterisque," which lost nothing of its charm by being so familiar to local audiences. Herr Hekking's treatment of this popular composition was a revelation of the possibilities of the cello when manipulated by an artist.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a change in the announced programme Saturday night at the Symphony concert, made necessary by the continued illness of Mr. Nikisch. Had it been known positively early in the week that Mr. Nikisch would have been unable to appear it is probable that the original programme would have been carried out, for Mr. Kneisel proved himself to be a musician fully capable of conducting the orchestra whose concertmeister he has been for so long, and had he conducted the rehearsals, which were postponed, there is little doubt that the Svensden symphony and the Liszt concerto could have been successfully rendered. It was unfortunate that the latter number could not have been given by Arthur Freidheim, the piano soloist. It was stated that he was the favorite pupil of Liszt and excelled in the interpretation of the works of his teacher. As it was, he gave on Saturday night a Sonata of Chopin, an uninteresting number, and which was a disappointment. The artist has a very delicate touch, of sufficient power, however, when required, and produces a singing tone on the piano which is very beautiful. His tones are clearly made and his tecnique admirable, but he failed to bring the audience into that sympathy with him which De Pachmann always produces. At a series of recitals which he is to give later a better opportunity will doubtless be given, from the varied programmes which he is to render, to judge of his capabilities. The reputation which he has attained in European circles is surely a guarantee of his gifts, and, in fact, the solo numbers which he gave at the Friday afternoon rehearsal were more pleasing and gave less disappointment to those who were prepared to hear artistic interpretations. The orchestral numbers comprised Rubenstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," given for the first time, Lalo's "Rhapsody" and the Second Symphony by Beethoven. The works were all well played—the Rubinstein number being particularly well interpreted and giving much pleasure. Mr. Kneisel conducted along the lines laid down by Mr. Nikisch. At the same time it was marked in the symphony by a distinct personality which did not suffer from comparison with such a director as Mr Nikisch. He is more magnetic as master to outward appearances, held the band under perfect control, and was enthusiastically applauded. The work of Saturday evening has placed Mr. Kneisel into stronger favor than ever with recital audiences. Mr. Adamowski is concertmeister.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 6, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FIRST HEARING OF ARTHUR FRIEDHEIM, THE LISZTIAN.

A Very Favorable Impression Made by This Latest of the Pianists—Mr. Kneisel Conducts in Mr. Nikisch's Absence—The Marine Band Concert.

An attack of tonsilitis with which Mr. Nikisch is suffering, was the means of introducing a new conductor to the symphony orchestra last Saturday. Mr. Franz Kneisel assumed the baton and was greeted by the audience with an enthusiasm that must have given him a degree of confidence at the outset. His excellent work justified the reception; he was rather conservative as compared with the regular conductor, yet there was an intelligence in his readings, a decision in his beat, that showed at once that he is not to be classed with those automatic leaders whom the Germans graphically call "metronomes."

The programme began with a new overture by Rubinstein, entitled "Antony and Cleopatra" The inequality of the great composer is shown in this work, as in so many of his others, and the richness of the scoring does not always hide the paucity or the conventionality of the ideas. The languor of the Orient is mingled with the trumpets of imperial Rome, and a tale of love and war is told in a comprehensible manner, but the working out of the themes is often turgid, and the amount of percussion employed tends to cheapen the general effect. Too often does the composer take refuge in "sounding brass or tinkling cymbal." Another northern composer has recently given us a pair of Shakespeare's lovers in worthier guise; beside Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the presentation of "Antony and Cleopatra" seems but feeble.

Besides the change of conductors, another substitution was necessitated at this concert by the non-arrival of the orchestral parts of the concerto which Mr. Arthur Friedheim was to have played. Prof. Baermann, with characteristic courtesy, came to the rescue with these parts, but too late for the necessary rehearsals, and therefore Chopin's B minor sonata was substituted. It was well played, and it showed that Mr. Friedheim is not to be regarded merely as a Jupiter Tonans of the piano, but can do most delicate as well as crashing and thunderous work. Every part of the sonata was performed in a poetic, intelligent and musicianly manner: perhaps there was a trifling lack of passion and intensity, but even this was a failing that leaned to virtue's side. The scherzo was played too delicately for the hall, but in the finale the pianist became also a forteist, and rang out the chief theme with inspiring power. But he did not turn his music upside down, he did not make little speeches to the audience, he did not grimace, in short he acted as a gentleman should in a public concert, and therefore the frenzy which Pachmann awakened did not follow his performance, although two hearty recalls were given. It must be added, however, that Pachmann's delicacy in the lighter passages and his wonderful singing legato were not attained.

Lalo's "Norwegian Rhapsody" was splendidly read and the life of the Spring-Tanz and the hurly-burly of the Halling (most characteristic of Scandinavitan dances) were in its measures. The violins did excellently in this and the trumpets both here and in the first overture deserve especial mention.

The changes of programme did not end with the substitution by the pianist of Chopin's very rarely played sonata spoken of above, but Svendsen's symphony which had been announced, was metamorphosed into Beethoven's second symphony. This is a weaker sister among the nine, but it has interest enough for any but the most exorbitant. It is Beethoven's transition to a broader school, it presents the first symphonic scherzo, and it has a more earnest and vigorous finale than Mozart or Haydn ever dreamed of. Yet the scherzo, chronologically the first, is very minuet-like, far less of a scherzo in fact than the minuet of the first symphony. There is, however, one point in its trio which seems to have been unnoticed by the commentators; in this part Beethoven has brought in the most formal characteristics of the antique minuet; a squarecut, eight-barred theme with even the oldfashioned instrumentation (oboes and bassoon) seems to indicate that the master desired to present a contrast between the old Haydn manner and the new form with which he sought to replace it. The symphony was read by Mr. Kneisel in a manner that deserves the most cordial recognition, and if the sudden illness of our brilliant conductor caused the audience to partake of a species of musical pot-luck, at least the banquet was not less enjoyable than the musical feasts which have preceded it.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 5, 1891.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been so singularly exempt from the usual accidental happenings incidental to such enterprises that the complete overturn in the programme of last evening created general surprise among the season's patrons.

The illness of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the faithful conductor of the orchestra, added to other causes, necessitated a rearrangement of the programme and put Mr. Franz Kneisel at the head of the orchestra in place of Mr. Nikisch.

The programme performed, with the assistance of Mr. Arthur Friedheim as piano soloist, was Rubinstein's overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," Chopin's sonata in B minor for piano, Lalo's rhapsody for orchestra in A, and Beethoven's second symphony.

The appearance of Mr. Friedheim was awaited with great expectations by those who had enjoyed a hearing of his interpretations of the Liszt numbers at the Friday rehearsal. In these numbers he gave the impression of being a player whose masterly attainments must instantly command recognition, and an artist who can realize the fullest possibilities of the piano in all his work. Technical attainments alone have come to be such a common qualification with modern day pianists that something more than such abilities are demanded to attract attention, and in Mr. Friedheim's playing on Friday technique appeared but a means to an end, and in such composition as were included in the programme he has few rivals now before the public. His method differs from that which finds general favor in these days, but he gets results which show its value and possibilities. His tone is wonderfully pure, his touch clean, clear and limpid, or equal to the severest demands of Liszt's composition as may be desired. He justified the use of the much ill used word "phenomenal" in describing his virtuosity, and it was quite evident that his first Boston audience realized his standing among the world's pianists as he was recalled with so much persistency after his announced numbers that the applause could not be quieted until he had added the raphsody No. 2, by Liszt.

Despite this successful debut Mr. Friedheim took occasion to make a change in this number for the concert, and played the Chopin sonata indicated above It was a dangerous experiment with the recollection of the Chopin playing of Pachmann so vividly in mind, and the result was what might have been easily predicted. With all his genius as a player, Mr. Friedheim lacks the certain something called magnetism, needed to give Chopin's compositions their best effect. His playing of the sonata was a masterly piece of work, but it failed to meet the full requirements and fell tamely upon an audience eager to repeat the enthusiastic recognition of the pianist's abilities given by the rehearsal audience.

The Rubinstein overture made the novelty of the evening and proved a vastly interesting descriptive work, in which the tone colors of the full modern orchestra have been applied with the masterly skill of its composer, and the leading themes fitly typify the characters of the drama; the strongly contrasting figures of Anthony and Cleopatra being given with rare distinctness in the orchestral combinations. It is an extremely interesting overture, and had an excellent reading by Mr. Kneisel.

The Lalo rhapsody was played with fine effect, and Mr. Kneisel is to be especially commended for the spirit and taste shown in the performance of the second Beethoven symphony, which gained him the hearty favor of the audience.

A Wagner programme is promised for next Saturday evening.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6.

....

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert given Saturday evening in Music Hall was made up of Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture; Lalo's rhapsody in A, and Beethoven's second symphony. As Mr. Nikisch was sick, the orchestra was led by Mr. Franz Kneisel. Mr. Kneisel conducted with great skill, and as a result the playing of the orchestra was unusually good. The delightful rhapsody of Lalo was admirably given, and the Beethoven symphony, under Mr. Kneisel's direction, was played with a precision, a musical simplicity and clearness, an unexaggerated and therefore effective use of dynamics, that made the performance one to be long remembered. Mr. Kneisel did not slight many measures to suddenly gain an effect at variance with the text. He did not trifle with the tempos, and yet how perfect was the rhythmic swing of the scherzo. The gradations of tone were most carefully observed; pianissimos were respected; and fortes were not fortissimos. While the rights of the instruments were constantly regarded, and the thematic construction was therefore eminently clear, there was an absence of apparent labor and affectation; and so in the andante of the symphony the strings sang; they were not rasped. Mr. Kneisel was most heartily applauded after each number and at the end of the concert.

....

The Rubinstein overture was played last week for the first time in this city. It is not a great work, nor is it worthy of the reputation of the composer. Yet it is interesting in patches. The themes are fresh and the "Cleopatra" motive is very melodious. The themes are carelessly strung together and the developments are crude and rambling. The instrumentation is a mixture of cleverness and rawness and the "colors" are laid on with a knife. Mr. Kneisel in this overture made the most musician-like and stirring crescendo that has been heard in Music Hall this season.

....

Mr. Arthur Friedheim played Chopin's B minor sonata for the pianoforte. It would be fairer to speak of his powers, and possible limitations, after he has given his recitals; for his playing of the sonata leaves certain questions unanswered. He has a well developed technique, an agreeable touch, taste, and a modesty of bearing that instantaneously wins sympathy and respect. Whether he is a man of temperament, whether he has a marked individuality, this remains to be seen. He was twice recalled.

....

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, the 11th, will be made up of selections from the works of Wagner. Mrs. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1891.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Arthur Friedmann, the Piano Soloist—Franz Kneisel, Conductor.

Director Arthur Nikisch has been confined to his house by illness for several days past, so it was necessary to make several changes in the announced programmes of the symphony concerts for both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Franz Kneisel proved an acceptable substitute for Mr. Nikisch. He was heartily applauded upon first appearance because of long established personal popularity, and afterwards because of the satisfactory readings given the several selections played under his baton.

Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture was the novelty offered by the orchestra. This is the latest of the great composer's works, having been written at Badenweiler last summer. The overture is chiefly notable as an example of Rubinstein's unique instrumentation. It is not strikingly melodious, nor particularly suggestive of the subject treated, at least such was the impression left by a single hearing of the writing. There are three themes, strongly marked by individuality and colored with characteristic brilliancy. These are surrounded by a variety of well-contrasted and appropriate subjects, which combine to make the work of unusual interest. Lalo's dainty and charming rhapsody for orchestra, in A, was delightfully interpreted. The Beethoven symphony, No. 2, in D, substituted for the announced Svendsen symphony, was admirably performed.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim was the soloist. While he cannot be classed as the equal of several pianists who have recently been heard here, he is entitled to respect as a player of much merit. At the Friday afternoon rehearsal he played Liszt's ballad for pianoforte, No. 2, and two rhapsodies, Nos. 2 and 6. At last evening's concert he chose to give Chopin's sonata in B minor. The change was a surprise, and one not easily accounted for. Mr. Friedheim was a pupil of Liszt, and judging by the contrasted works played at the Symphony he is essentially an interpreter of the Liszt class of music. He is a brilliant performer, possesses extraordinary power and has a surprising command of technique. The second Liszt rhapsody showed him at his best, for he really gave a magnificent interpretation of this difficult work. The rehearsal audience applauded him with enthusiasm. Very cordial also was the recognition bestowed upon his Chopin interpretation. In this he displayed facility of execution and much musical intelligence, but after so recently hearing Chopin from the fingers of De Pachmann and Scharwenka, Mr. Friedheim's interpretation seemed to lack both warmth and expression.

A Wagner programme will be offered at the next Symphony concert. The soloists will be Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

Last Evening's Concert Conducted by Mr. Kneisel.

The twenty-first Symphony concert in Music hall last evening had no such programme as Conductor Nikisch had planned.

Conductor Nikisch was ill.

Concertmeister Kneisel conducted.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim was the soloist.

Mr. Kneisel evidently did not feel equal to the Svendsen Symphony, or the Liszt A major concerto; instead the orchestra played the Second Symphony of Beethoven, and Mr. Friedheim's selection was the B minor sonata of Chopin.

Mr. Friedheim should have known in advance that only a Liszt or a Rubinstein ought to play the Chopin sonata. It is an inherently stupid work, written in the composer's worst possible vein, and absolutely unfit for public performance. Mr. Friedheim made it the medium for a superfluous display of technique. Mr. Friedheim has a brilliant surface-technique. He is not a great pianist, but he produces a charming tone from a Steinway, an instrument that bears the same relation to other piano-fortes that Liszt did to other pianists. Mr. Friedheim was once or twice politely recalled. Beethoven's Second symphony was ably read by Mr. Kneisel. Mr. Nikisch with his poetic hand would not have done so well with it. The remainder of the programme was well-played.

C. L. C.

[121]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1891.

CONCERT AND OPERA.

A WEEK OF AN UNUSUAL NUMBER OF MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—EASTER MUSIC—THE SCHARWENKA, DE PACHMANN, MOLE AND OTHER CONCERTS.

It was indeed unfortunate that within a day or two after the announcement of the programme of the twenty-first rehearsal and concert—one of the most important of the series—Mr. Nikisch should have been taken ill. During the week Mr. Kneisel conducted the private rehearsals, and Friday afternoon probably the entire audience was surprised to see him step upon the platform, baton in hand.

The opening number was Rubinstein's new overture to "Antony and Cleopatra," which was written last summer, and performed not long ago in New York, for the first time in this country. By reason of its numerous and extended episodes, the overture takes on the form of the modern symphonic poem, rather than that of the concert overture. It opens at once in allegro tempo, with one of its principal themes, given out by the clarinet, with accompanying harmonies in the bassoons and full brass, which after being repeated and followed by an episode, leads to a second theme, broad, sustained and passionate. This again is followed by more episodic passages, until a sudden interruption by four trumpets occurs. Afterwards, some development takes place, the previous matter is again presented with new orchestration, and at the close, the first two themes are combined. At one hearing the work is disappointing. Of the themes, the second only is satisfying in its strength and meaning. The first seems to possess little character, and the trumpet theme is common-place. The work, too, seems to lack coherence; even its strongest parts, including the ending, seem of an indefinite and unimpressive nature; and its orchestration, although full, rich and at times descriptive, does not tend toward making its meaning more clear. It was fairly played and similarly received.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim, pianist, was the soloist. This young man was one of the few real favorites of Liszt, and report says that among them all he stood highest in the master's regard. Born in Russia, of German parents, and having spent most of his years in St. Petersburgh, he has enough of the Slavonic cast of feature to pass for a Russian in reality. There is also to be traced quite a resemblance to Rubinstein, which is rendered more striking by his "mane" of soft, dark brown hair, although his features are less heavy, and more refined. A very refined, indeed, and serious-minded appearing man, is Mr. Friedheim, with a general personality that at once attracts and holds the attention of the auditor.

Before he had played many measures it became apparent that his touch was as refined as his appearance; and one drew a long breath of relief upon realizing that he was disposed to treat his chosen instrument as a dear friend, instead of a venomous enemy. In a word, Mr. Friedheim did not "pound;" his touch was not of that nature which makes the hammers rebound noisily, and the strings jangle.

In consequence of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts in time for rehearsal, the production of Liszt's second concerto in A, was abandoned, and pianoforte solos were substituted. The pianist's first number was Liszt's second ballade, a long and beautiful, if at times, somewhat abstruse composition.

His conception was poetic and artistic in the extreme, and was tempered by a conservatism that rendered the ballade, as well as his playing wholly delightful. Following, came the sixth rhapsody, of which his treatment, though imaginative, wild and brilliant as one could wish, was astonishingly free from extravagance of any kind. Several prolonged recalls at length brought him to the piano again, and an equally fine performance of the second rhapsody was given, to the great delight of the audience. Through these numbers, Mr. Friedheim displayed a beautifully finished technique, and a true musician's sense of rhythm, values and color-effects. There were occasional indications in runs, and similar passage work, that his finger technique was, in strength and clearness, not quite up to the highest standard; but the few defects noticeable may have been due to temporary causes. His great forte is said to be Liszt's music, and in Europe he has accomplished the enormous task of playing nearly all that composer's works at one series of concerts. His coming recitals will, without doubt, be early anticipated by many of the lovers of pianoforte playing, who heard him at this first appearance.

Lalo's rhapsody in A, is a fine, as well as fascinating work. The broad, expressive character of the first part, displaying a wealth of melodic and harmonic fancy, and the gorgeous treatment in the presto, of the Scandinavian dance, with which a beautiful second theme is contrasted, all furnish the best reasons for placing Lalo in the front rank of modern composers of the Romantic school. It was finely performed, Mr. Kneisel showing, as he did in his conducting of the overture, decided ability as an orchestral leader. With Beethoven's second symphony, given in place of the Svendsen second, in B flat, he was equally successful, and the management is to be congratulated on having a concert-master upon whom they can rely with confidence in cases of emergency.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1891.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Arthur Freidheim.

The twenty-first Symphony programme was:

Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," op. 113 ..... Rubinstein
Sonata for Piano in B minor ..... Chopin
Rhapsody in A ..... Lalo
Symphony, No. 2 ..... Beethoven

Mr. Arthur Freidheim was the soloist.

This programme was a makeshift affair, made necessary by the temporary indisposition of Mr. Nikisch. The changes in the list originally announced were the Symphony — substituted for Svendsen's in B flat, and the selection for soloist, Liszt's A major concerto being the work Mr. Freidheim intended to play. As Mr. Kneisel was called upon to conduct both the concert and the Friday rehearsal, perhaps it was not fair to expect him to prepare in a short time the really arduous programme Mr. Nikisch had laid out, although his success with the intricate Rubinstein overture and the rhapsody indicated much ability to conduct the orchestra in what to him was a new work. The change in Mr. Freidheim's number was most regrettable, the Liszt concerto being a work of particulary susceptible character to the Liszt school of players, of whom Mr. Freidheim is reputed a shining ornament. In the Chopin sonata, however, Mr. Freidheim showed traits which the virtuosic and chaotic (as regards form) piece of Liszt's would not have permitted, the sonata being the essence of piano poetry, the concerto the sine qua non of licensed cacophony. Mr. Freidheim's touch is like velvet, and the tone he produces is of crystalline purity. The element of repose was conspicuous in his performance of the sonata, which was read most musically, without caprice or unreasonable transgression of what we like to consider as the sentiment of Chopin. In appearance Mr. Freidheim recalls the leonine Rubinstein, and slightly his master Liszt. As he is announced for a series of recitals here later in the month further discussion of his characteristics is deferred. On Saturday his playing was warmly received and he was recalled.

The new Rubinstein overture is a picturesque, and, in parts, beautiful work. Without following a set programme, the contrasting character of the principal themes and their suggestiveness shows the composer's thought as he pictured in music the drama of Shakespeare. Especially attractive and appealing in its sensuousness is the melody one instinctively connects with Cleopatra. Much of the music of the overture is of a dramatic character and while the composer's invention lags at times there is in general a largeness of treatment and an instinctive use of such instrumental combinations as fit the more heroic moods of music. As we have intimated, the overture was read by Mr. Kneisel with evident appreciation of its poetic contents, and was effective. In the performance of the rhapsody a good degree of expression obtained, while the Symphony received an excellent interpretation. Mr. Kneisel's quiet but firm beat is not the least of his gifts as conductor.

The next concert will be devoted to Wagner; Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, (who this year at the Metropolitan Opera House sustained the parts formerly taken by Lehmann,) and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor, will be the soloists.

[122]

Infantry Hall, - - - - Providence,

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

Tuesday Evening, April 7, at 8.

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

CHICKERING HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give SIX CONCERTS in New York during the season of 1891–92—the eleventh year of its existence, and the fifth of its acquaintance with New York music lovers. The concerts will take place at Chickering Hall, on the dates below, and seats for the series may be reserved, on and after to-morrow, February 25, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

DATES OF THE CONCERTS:

TUESDAY EVENING, Nov. 3, 1891.
TUESDAY EVENING, Dec. 8, 1891.
TUESDAY EVENING, Jan. 12, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, Feb. 9, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, March 15, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, April 26, 1892.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1891.

CONCERT AND OPERA.

A WEEK OF AN UNUSUAL NUMBER OF MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—EASTER MUSIC—THE SCHARWENKA, DE PACHMANN, MOLE AND OTHER CONCERTS.

It was indeed unfortunate that within a day or two after the announcement of the programme of the twenty-first rehearsal and concert—one of the most important of the series—Mr. Nikisch should have been taken ill. During the week Mr. Kneisel conducted the private rehearsals, and Friday afternoon probably the entire audience was surprised to see him step upon the platform, baton in hand.

The opening number was Rubinstein's new overture to "Antony and Cleopatra," which was written last summer, and performed not long ago in New York, for the first time in this country. By reason of its numerous and extended episodes, the overture takes on the form of the modern symphonic poem, rather than that of the concert overture. It opens at once in allegro tempo, with one of its principal themes, given out by the clarinet, with accompanying harmonies in the bassoons and full brass, which after being repeated and followed by an episode, leads to a second theme, broad, sustained and passionate. This again is followed by more episodic passages, until a sudden interruption by four trumpets occurs. Afterwards, some development takes place, the previous matter is again presented with new orchestration, and at the close, the first two themes are combined. At one hearing the work is disappointing. Of the themes, the second only is satisfying in its strength and meaning. The first seems to possess little character, and the trumpet theme is common-place. The work, too, seems to lack coherence; even its strongest parts, including the ending, seem of an indefinite and unimpressive nature; and its orchestration, although full, rich and at times descriptive, does not tend toward making its meaning more clear. It was fairly played and similarly received.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim, pianist, was the soloist. This young man was one of the few real favorites of Liszt, and report says that among them all he stood highest in the master's regard. Born in Russia, of German parents, and having spent most of his years in St. Petersburgh, he has enough of the Slavonic cast of feature to pass for a Russian in reality. There is also to be traced quite a resemblance to Rubinstein, which is rendered more striking by his "mane" of soft, dark brown hair, although his features are less heavy, and more refined. A very refined, indeed, and serious-minded appearing man, is Mr. Friedheim, with a general personality that at once attracts and holds the attention of the auditor.

Before he had played many measures it became apparent that his touch was as refined as his appearance; and one drew a long breath of relief upon realizing that he was disposed to treat his chosen instrument as a dear friend, instead of a venomous enemy. In a word, Mr. Friedheim did not "pound;" his touch was not of that nature which makes the hammers rebound noisily, and the strings jangle.

In consequence of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts in time for rehearsal, the production of Liszt's second concerto in A, was abandoned, and pianoforte solos were substituted. The pianist's first number was Liszt's second ballade, a long and beautiful, if at times, somewhat abstruse composition.

His conception was poetic and artistic in the extreme, and was tempered by a conservatism that rendered the ballade, as well as his playing wholly delightful. Following, came the sixth rhapsody, of which his treatment, though imaginative, wild and brilliant as one could wish, was astonishingly free from extravagance of any kind. Several prolonged recalls at length brought him to the piano again, and an equally fine performance of the second rhapsody was given, to the great delight of the audience. Through these numbers, Mr. Friedheim displayed a beautifully finished technique, and a true musician's sense of rhythm, values and color-effects. There were occasional indications in runs, and similar passage work, that his finger technique was, in strength and clearness, not quite up to the highest standard; but the few defects noticeable may have been due to temporary causes. His great forte is said to be Liszt's music, and in Europe he has accomplished the enormous task of playing nearly all that composer's works at one series of concerts. His coming recitals will, without doubt, be early anticipated by many of the lovers of pianoforte playing, who heard him at this first appearance.

Lalo's rhapsody in A, is a fine, as well as fascinating work. The broad, expressive character of the first part, displaying a wealth of melodic and harmonic fancy, and the gorgeous treatment in the presto, of the Scandinavian dance, with which a beautiful second theme is contrasted, all furnish the best reasons for placing Lalo in the front rank of modern composers of the Romantic school. It was finely performed, Mr. Kneisel showing, as he did in his conducting of the overture, decided ability as an orchestral leader. With Beethoven's second symphony, given in place of the Svendsen second, in B flat, he was equally successful, and the management is to be congratulated on having a concert-master upon whom they can rely with confidence in cases of emergency.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1891.

Symphony Concert — Mr. Arthur Freidheim.

The twenty-first Symphony programme was:

Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra," op. 113 ..... Rubinstein
Sonata for Piano in B minor ..... Chopin
Rhapsody in A ..... Lalo
Symphony, No. 2 ..... Beethoven

Mr. Arthur Freidheim was the soloist.

This programme was a makeshift affair, made necessary by the temporary indisposition of Mr. Nikisch. The changes in the list originally announced were the Symphony — substituted for Svendsen's in B flat, and the selection for soloist, Liszt's A major concerto being the work Mr. Freidheim intended to play. As Mr. Kneisel was called upon to conduct both the concert and the Friday rehearsal, perhaps it was not fair to expect him to prepare in a short time the really arduous programme Mr. Nikisch had laid out, although his success with the intricate Rubinstein overture and the rhapsody indicated much ability to conduct the orchestra in what to him was a new work. The change in Mr. Freidheim's number was most regrettable, the Liszt concerto being a work of particulary susceptible character to the Liszt school of players, of whom Mr. Freidheim is reputed a shining ornament. In the Chopin sonata, however, Mr. Freidheim showed traits which the virtuosic and chaotic (as regards form) piece of Liszt's would not have permitted, the sonata being the essence of piano poetry, the concerto the sine qua non of licensed cacophony. Mr. Freidheim's touch is like velvet, and the tone he produces is of crystalline purity. The element of repose was conspicuous in his performance of the sonata, which was read most musically, without caprice or unreasonable transgression of what we like to consider as the sentiment of Chopin. In appearance Mr. Freidheim recalls the leonine Rubinstein, and slightly his master Liszt. As he is announced for a series of recitals here later in the month further discussion of his characteristics is deferred. On Saturday his playing was warmly received and he was recalled.

The new Rubinstein overture is a picturesque, and, in parts, beautiful work. Without following a set programme, the contrasting character of the principal themes and their suggestiveness shows the composer's thought as he pictured in music the drama of Shakespeare. Especially attractive and appealing in its sensuousness is the melody one instinctively connects with Cleopatra. Much of the music of the overture is of a dramatic character and while the composer's invention lags at times there is in general a largeness of treatment and an instinctive use of such instrumental combinations as fit the more heroic moods of music. As we have intimated, the overture was read by Mr. Kneisel with evident appreciation of its poetic contents, and was effective. In the performance of the rhapsody a good degree of expression obtained, while the Symphony received an excellent interpretation. Mr. Kneisel's quiet but firm beat is not the least of his gifts as conductor.

The next concert will be devoted to Wagner; Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, (who this year at the Metropolitan Opera House sustained the parts formerly taken by Lehmann,) and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor, will be the soloists.

---

[122]

Infantry Hall, - - - - Providence,

CLOSING CONCERT OF THE SERIES.

Tuesday Evening, April 7, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1890-91

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

CHICKERING HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give SIX CONCERTS in New York during the season of 1891–92—the eleventh year of its existence, and the fifth of its acquaintance with New York music lovers. The concerts will take place at Chickering Hall, on the dates below, and seats for the series may be reserved, on and after to-morrow, February 25, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

DATES OF THE CONCERTS:

TUESDAY EVENING, Nov. 3, 1891.
TUESDAY EVENING, Dec. 8, 1891.
TUESDAY EVENING, Jan. 12, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, Feb. 9, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, March 15, 1892.
TUESDAY EVENING, April 26, 1892.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The generous, long season is very near the end. Three only of the four and twenty concerts remain. The twenty-first, last Saturday evening, was not without mishaps. Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, was unfortunately ill, which necessitated some change of programme. A Beethoven symphony was substituted for the one announced by Svendsen—a change for the better, except to those who care more for novelty than for intrinsic excellence. For is not a great work of Beethoven, as well as one of Shakspeare, almost heard for the hundredth time, more refreshing and inspiring and really more new than any ambitious effort by any of the new composers? Another accident, the non-arrival of the orchestra parts, made it necessary to set aside the Liszt Concerto in A for a work without orchestra by Chopin; again a gain, for in the latter we can surely count upon imaginative genius. As finally determined, the programme stood thus:

Rubinstein: Op. 16, Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra." (First time in Boston.)
Chopin: Op. 58, Third Sonata, in B minor.
Lalo: Rhapsody for Orchestra, in A.
Beethoven: Op. 36; Second Sympony, in D.
Pianist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim.

Upon the whole an interesting programme, better than we were before prepared for. The element of novelty was supplied not only by Rubinstein, but by the unexpected appearance as conductor of "Concertmeister" Kneisel, modest, quiet, sure, efficient. Under his baton the new Overture received full justice. It sounded very characteristic of Rubinstein, full of excitement and of strength, a little turbid as well as turbulent, as if crowds were stirring on the eve of conflict or of notable arrival, with harp, and ring and clash of "janissary music." There is a luxurious and Oriental-sounding melody which one may associate with "Egypt" (Egypt's queen) if he pleases—there is nothing to prevent him. And there are bolder, more heroic themes, which you may couple with Antony; a passage steeped in cloyed satiety, and startling trumpet calls and flourishes (four trumpets), sounding very clear and challenging, and plenty of the roar, and whirl, and clash of battle. Perhaps somewhere you might picture to your mind's eye Cleopatra's barge, with its fine odors, "hitting the sense of the adjacent shore." At any rate, here was a programme overture, only without a programme further than the two historic names (with Shakespeare's aid) suggest. In such a plight we will not be rash enough to venture into any attempts at detailed interpretation; for it would not be pleasant to be caught expatiating on the royal lovers indolently stretched upon that wondrous barge, when possibly we should have been expending our descriptive powers upon that basket of figs, with its secret squirming fatal occupant. The overture, however understood, proved interesting. It has power and life in it, and stirring progress; rich and brilliant instrumentation; characteristic melody and telling harmony. If not a creation of great genius, not to be measured against Beethoven, it is genial and original, and it was applauded warmly, although a good share of that applause was evidently designed for the young conductor.

Chopin's Sonatas cannot be called his most interesting compositions; at all events, they do not take a general audience like many of his works in other forms, always excepting the one movement in the second, the well-known funeral march. In this No. 3 (in B minor) there are many beauties; the Chopin individuality, his fine fire, the exquisite subtlety of his melody, his peculiar harmony, his even spiritually fine arabesque, pervade it; but they seem often out of place in the Sonata form, which he here adheres to mainly pretty closely. In all of the four movements (Allegro, Scherzo, Largo and Finale) there are lovely motives and delightful passages; but there is also more or less which sounds dry and coldly complicated. Mr. Friedheim is understood to have been one of the pupils in whom Liszt took a real interest, and one of the most competent who undertake to reproduce his compositions. Certainly he approved himself a masterly pianist in this rendering of Chopin. His style is quiet and refined, as we have had occasion to say, also, of Scharwenka. His technique is singularly free and perfect; his touch, his accent, phrasing and whole style are musical, expressive, soulful and go home to the listener.

The Rhapsody by Lalo seemed to be two wholly unrelated works. The first (Andantino; Allegretto) had a good deal of rich and delicate instrumentation, the violins being thrice divided, and harp, cymbals and soft touches of the triangle coloring the harmony; it also had some warm and tender sentiment, especially during the frequent recurrence of a motive in the oboe and clarinet. The second part, marked presto, changed the scene, the atmosphere, entirely. Much of it was in a turbulent, coarse vein, founded on a noisy Scandinavian dance tune, we are told.

Beethoven's Second Symphony was enthusiastically applauded after everyone of its four movements. It was admirably read and led by Mr. Kneisel, with closest loyalty to Beethoven, with the reins perfectly in hand, every instrument responding promptly in full sympathy, the tone colors blending and contrasting as if the hand, the soul, of Nature swayed their magic. Never have we heard a finer rendering of that delightful symphony.

Turning the leaf of the programme for the contents of next Saturday's feast we find the solitary name of Wagner in big letters! Two soloists are announced—Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple. Shall the season close without the Ninth Symphony? J. S. D.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.
Date 4-8

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Greatest of American Orchestras.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its sixth and last concert for the season in this city last evening. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore, No. 3".....Beethoven
Aria, "O, Lovely Halls," from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Mme. Antonia Mielke.
Symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde".....Raff
Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Mme. Mielke.
Grande Polonaise.....Liszt

Owing to the illness of Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducted. Mr. Kneisel wielded the baton to the satisfaction of the audience, and his control of the orchestra was such as to produce results perfectly creditable to the players and to the listeners. While he does not, perhaps, exert such a fine and delicate influence over the players as has distinguished Mr. Nikisch's work, and made it distinctive and valuable to the reputation of the organization, yet the difference between his work and that of the regular conductor would scarcely be perceived by an audience disposed to be particular and critical. Even the slight difference apparent to those with exceedingly fine musical sensibilities might disappear if Mr. Kneisel were invested with the authority that sustains Mr. Nikisch.

Mme. Antonia Mielke was new to Providence, but Providence hopes to be able to become much better acquainted with her. She is an artist one needs to study, despite the splendid talent and power she reveals upon first acquaintance. Her voice is a powerful soprano, capable of asserting itself above the orchestra. She is a magnificent singer. She comes to this city again this spring, when the extremely favorable impression created last night will secure for her a warm reception.

The orchestra numbers were by Beethoven, Raff and Liszt. Of course they were accorded adequate and artistic interpretation.

The Symphony season has been remarkably successful in all respects. There have been large audiences at all the concerts, though several of them had the ill fortune to come on stormy nights. It is perfectly plain that Providence appreciates the high class music given by this great orchestra. Next year, if it comes here to give a series of concerts, there will be none too much room in Infantry Hall to accommodate the people who will want to hear it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last Symphony concert underwent "a sea change," partly because Mr. Nikisch was ill, so that the second of Beethoven's symphonies had to be substituted for the expected Svendsen, and partly because the new pianist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim, had come unprovided with the orchestral parts for the Liszt concerto which he had promised to play and consequently put in its place the B-minor sonata of Chopin. The "Antony and Cleopatra" overture of Rubinstein was given, as expected, and received more warmly than in London. It is entertaining, because it has a good deal of decided melody and is richly colored in the scoring, variety not running into extravagance, however, nor weight of tone to excess. The themes are by turns martial and amorous, agitated and dreamy, so that one can take his pick among the episodes of history and fit a half dozen of them to appropriate movements and sentiments. There is some glitter, some clash, a good deal of the pomp of trumpets, something of the rattle of tambourines—which comes, oddly enough, at the finale—and a considerable rolling of drums, in which the artist in the southwest corner of the orchestra revelled illimitably. The other large work was Lalo's "Norwegian" fantasy, and all were played beautifully. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and it is no more than the truth to say that such fine consideration for Beethoven, such respect for delicate æsthetic details and such evenly-maintained and pure tone from the strings have not been had before during this season. It seems plain that when next a conductor shall be wanted, the right man can be found in the concert-master's seat. Mr. Friedheim appears to be rather an agreeable than an impressive pianist, although what reserve of strength and dash he may have for the Liszt music, in which he is said to excel, cannot as yet be even guessed. His technique is genuine and apparently adequate to emergencies; his tone smooth, pure and equable; his touch light, but firm; his scales and ornaments clear, and his chords balanced and full-voiced. He read the sonata unaffectedly and rather coolly, making more diversities of rhythm and volume than were borne out by feeling. We should guess that he will come out brilliantly and voluminously in music of the modern school, but that in the standard and classic his playing will be more intellectual and scholarly than enthusiastic and magnetic.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891

Mr. Nikisch was unable to lead the Symphony orchestra Saturday evening, and Mr. Kneisel took his place. Mr. Arthur Friedheim thought of playing Liszt's concerto for the pianoforte in A, but he forgot to bring either score or parts, and he played Chopin's Sonata in B minor. The orchestral selections were Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture, Lalo's rhapsody in A, and Beethoven's second symphony.

* * * * *

Rubinstein's overture was played for the first time in this city. It was written last year. The composer has called it an "Overture to the Tragedy of Anthony and Cleopatra", but whether he had in mind Shakespere, or Plutarch, or Suetonius, or Arsène Houssaye is immaterial. He gives it a name that suits his fancy. In spite of its brilliant passages of instrumentation, and the freshness of the themes (the Cleopatra motive is eminently characteristic), the overture cannot be called a remarkable work or one that will probably hold for a long time a place in the concert room. It does not seem to be firmly knit; it is not an organic whole. It is too panoramic. Still it is an interesting composition.

* * * * *

There have been several overtures written of late years upon this subject; but even the great opportunities offered for ballet, scenery, and musical color do not seem to tempt the modern composer. The lovers have appeared in opera many times, but without success. Such men as Cimarosa, Paer, and before them Graun, and still earlier, Mattheson, have told the story in opera; but who knows a scrap of the music? Why, Cleopatra tempted Antony in Venice as far back as 1662, and a good Franciscan monk named Father Daniel or Castrovillari, put music in her mouth. But monk and music sleep, forgotten.

* * * * *

The overture, as well as the other numbers, showed Mr. Kneisel's skill as a director. Indeed, the performance of Beethoven's second symphony was admirable in every respect, and the orchestra played with a care and a finish that have for many weeks been conspicuously absent. The performance of the andante and the scherzo was particularly fine. Mr. Kneisel was loudly applauded after each number and at the end of the concert.

* * * * *

Mr. Friedheim proposes to give a series of four pianoforte recitals later in the season, and it would be fairer to him to defer any extended criticism of his playing until his abilities and limitations are more clearly defined. It may justly be said, however, that Saturday evening he displayed considerable technique and fine taste; but excellent as his performance was in many respects, it seemed devoid of any intensity, exaggerated or suggested. Mr. Friedheim made a favorable impression upon his hearers, and he was twice recalled.

* * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1891.

A Symphony Concert Without A Symphony—A New Theatre of Immense Proportions—Entertainment in Aid of Trinity House.

The programme for the twenty-second Symphony concert was entirely devoted to the works of Richard Wagner. Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel were the soloists. Mielke has an excellent voice, the lower tones of which are notably resonant and sympathetic, but she is evidently one of the many victims of Wagner's unvocal style of writing. Mr. Andreas Dippel has a superb voice, but his vocalization is anything but artistic. The concert was attended by the usual large audience and the orchestra played superbly; but it was in no true sense of the term either musical or artistic and was evidently a bug-bear to the vast majority of the audience present, scores of whom left the house long before the concert was over.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT LAST NIGHT.

The last of the several great programmes, which, it was generally understood some time ago would cause the season of the Boston Symphony concerts to end in a blaze of glory, was presented at the twenty-second rehearsal and concert. It was a Wagner programme, and its announcement, recalling the magnificent success which attended the Wagner matinee early in the season, was sufficent to crowd Music Hall. Only one of the numbers of that concert was repeated: the arrangement that Hans Richter made, in accordance with Wagner's own suggestions, of certain instrumental portions of "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung." The other numbers were the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" "Lohengrin's Legend;" another concert arrangement from "Die Meistersinger;" the "Funeral March," the duet, "In neuen Thaten," and the closing scene from "Die Gotterdaemmerung."

It is doubtful if as fine a performance of the overture was ever heard in this city. One could begin and pile adjective on adjective, in the attempt to characterize adequately Mr. Nikisch's conception of that masterpiece; but it must suffice to say that both conception and performance were great. The introduction to the third act, the "Dance of Apprentices," "Procession of Mastersingers" and "Homage to Hans Sachs," made a delightful concert-piece. The introduction was beautifully played, all its serenity, and its nobility of sentiment being fully brought out. The effect of the piquant, fascinating dance was lessened to some degree by the unfinished staccato playing of the strings and woodwind, and the inelasticity of the tempo. The conclusion of the number also seemed excessively slow, although the balance was well maintained to the end.

But in the Richter arrangement and the funeral march, the genius of Mr. Nikisch shone resplendent. His many exquisite nuances, his thrilling climaxes, his instinctive appreciation of Wagner's subtle and glowing color effects, his absolute control of the orchestra through the maze of difficulties, all were but an added proof that he is one of the greatest conductors of the day.

This Richter arrangement impresses itself more and more on one as being the greatest symphonic poem extant. Beside it all others seem pigmy-like by comparison. And the Funeral March! Its grandeur, its pathos are indescribable.

Mr. Andreas Dippel, late of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, has a tenor voice of good, though not especially sympathetic quality. His delivery of the "legend" was not wholly effective, either in style or volume of tone. He did not seem to be able to hold his own against the heavy accompaniment, which in reality was heavier than it needed to have been; and altogether his singing was disappointing, although evidence was not lacking that he is an artist of ability. In the duet from "Die Gotterdaemmerung" he was joined by Mme. Antonia Mielke, also from New York. Here again both singers were so frequently overweighted by the orchestra that it is impossible to make a just estimate of their rendering of that unapproachable love scene.

In the closing scene of the Trilogy, Mme. Mielke was heard to better advantage. Her voice is a soprano, strong and musical, excepting its lower notes, which seemed rather coarse. That she is a singer of feeling and discrimination, was made clearly manifest in her artistic, if not powerful rendering of Brunhilde's "funeral" song. The singers that can make themselves heard without shouting in the midst of such accompaniments, are very few indeed. But, as is well known, Wagner intended that the players should be placed partly beneath the theatre stage; and only those who have attended the performances at Bayreuth can fully realize the mellow, yet exceedingly rich effects that his orchestration produces under those conditions. It must, then, be considered an injustice both to composer and singer to condemn either on the basis of a concert-room performance; fortunate indeed is the soloist who can make a pronounced success in such a manner.

The work of the orchestra was uneven in quality; and several instances of rough playing indicated inadequate preparation. Mr. Nikisch's illness and the addition of four extra horns, two trumpets, bass clarinet, English horn, and instruments of percussion, naturally had much to do with this state of affairs; still, there is no doubt that both conductor and men are overworked. In spite of everything, however, the concert was a memorable one. Of the conductor who can rise to such heights of musical expression as did Mr. Nikisch, enough cannot be said.

---

[123]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The generous, long season is very near the end. Three only of the four and twenty concerts remain. The twenty-first, last Saturday evening, was not without mishaps. Mr. Nikisch, the conductor, was unfortunately ill, which necessitated some change of programme. A Beethoven symphony was substituted for the one announced by Svendsen—a change for the better, except to those who care more for novelty than for intrinsic excellence. For is not a great work of Beethoven, as well as one of Shakspeare, albeit heard for the hundredth time, more refreshing and inspiring and really more new than any ambitious effort by any of the new composers? Another accident, the non-arrival of the orchestra parts, made it necessary to set aside the Liszt Concerto in A for a work without orchestra by Chopin; again a gain, for in the latter we can surely count upon imaginative genius. As finally determined, the programme stood thus:

Rubinstein: Op. 16, Overture, "Antony and Cleopatra." (First time in Boston.)
Chopin: Op. 58. Third Sonata, in B minor.
Lalo: Rhapsody for Orchestra, in A.
Beethoven: Op. 36.; Second Sympony, in D.
Pianist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim.

Upon the whole an interesting programme, better than we were before prepared for. The element of novelty was supplied not only by Rubinstein, but by the unexpected appearance as conductor of "Concertmeister" Kneisel, modest, quiet, sure, efficient. Under his baton the new Overture received full justice. It sounded very characteristic of Rubinstein, full of excitement and of strength, a little turbid as well as turbulent, as if crowds were stirring on the eve of conflict or of notable arrival, with harp, and ring and clash of "janissary music." There is a luxurious and Oriental-sounding melody which one may associate with "Egypt" (Egypt's queen) if he pleases—there is nothing to prevent him. And there are bolder, more heroic themes, which you may couple with Antony; a passage steeped in cloyed satiety, and startling trumpet calls and flourishes (four trumpets), sounding very clear and challenging, and plenty of the roar, and whirl, and clash of battle. Perhaps somewhere you might picture to your mind's eye Cleopatra's barge, with its fine odors, "hitting the sense of the adjacent shore." At any rate, here was a programme overture, only without a programme further than the two historic names (with Shakspeare's aid) suggest. In such a plight we will not be rash enough to venture into any attempts at detailed interpretation; for it would not be pleasant to be caught expatiating on the royal lovers indolently stretched upon that wondrous barge, when possibly we should have been expending our descriptive powers upon that basket of figs, with its secret squirming fatal occupant. The overture, however understood, proved interesting. It has power and life in it, and stirring progress; rich and brilliant instrumentation; characteristic melody and telling harmony. If not a creation of great genius, not to be measured against Beethoven, it is genial and original, and it was applauded warmly, although a good share of that applause was evidently designed for the young conductor.

Chopin's Sonatas cannot be called his most interesting compositions; at all events, they do not take a general audience like many of his works in other forms, always excepting the one movement in the second, the well-known funeral march. In this No. 3 (in B minor) there are many beauties; the Chopin individuality, his fine fire, the exquisite subtlety of his melody, his peculiar harmony, his even spiritually fine arabesque, pervade it; but they seem often out of place in the Sonata form, which he here adheres to mainly pretty closely. In all of the four movements (Allegro, Scherzo, Largo and Finale) there are lovely motives and delightful passages; but there is also more or less which sounds dry and coldly complicated. Mr. Friedheim is understood to have been one of the pupils in whom Liszt took a real interest, and one of the most competent who undertake to reproduce his compositions. Certainly he approved himself a masterly pianist in this rendering of Chopin. His style is quiet and refined, as we have had occasion to say, also, of Scharwenka. His technique is singularly free and perfect; his touch, his accent, phrasing and whole style are musical, expressive, soulful and go home to the listener.

The Rhapsody by Lalo seemed to be two wholly unrelated works. The first (Andantino; Allegretto) had a good deal of rich and delicate instrumentation, the violins being thrice divided, and harp, cymbals and soft touches of the triangle coloring the harmony; it also had some warm and tender sentiment, especially during the frequent recurrence of a motive in the oboe and clarinet. The second part, marked presto, changed the scene, the atmosphere, entirely. Much of it was in a turbulent, coarse vein, founded on a noisy Scandinavian dance tune, we are told.

Beethoven's Second Symphony was enthusiastically applauded after everyone of its four movements. It was admirably read and led by Mr. Kneisel, with closest loyalty to Beethoven, with the reins perfectly in hand, every instrument responding promptly in full sympathy, the tone colors blending and contrasting as if the hand, the soul, of Nature swayed their magic. Never have we heard a finer rendering of that delightful symphony.

Turning the leaf of the programme for the contents of next Saturday's feast we find the solitary name of Wagner in big letters! Two soloists are announced—Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dipple. Shall the season close without the Ninth Symphony? J. S. D.

TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.
Date 4-8

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Greatest of American Orchestras.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its sixth and last concert for the season in this city last evening. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Lenoore, No. 3".....Beethoven
Aria, "O, Lovely Halls," from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Mme. Antonia Mielke.
Symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde".....Raff
Aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Mme. Mielke.
Grande Polonaise.....Liszt

Owing to the illness of Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducted. Mr. Kneisel wielded the baton to the satisfaction of the audience, and his control of the orchestra was such as to produce results perfectly creditable to the players and to the listeners. While he does not, perhaps, exert such a fine and delicate influence over the players as has distinguished Mr. Nikisch's work, and made it distinctive and valuable to the reputation of the organization, yet the difference between his work and that of the regular conductor would scarcely be perceived by an audience disposed to be particular and critical. Even the slight difference apparent to those with exceedingly fine musical sensibilities might disappear if Mr. Kneisel were invested with the authority that sustains Mr. Nikisch.

Mme. Antonia Mielke was new to Providence, but Providence hopes to be able to become much better acquainted with her. She is an artist one needs to study, despite the splendid talent and power she reveals upon first acquaintance. Her voice is a powerful soprano, capable of asserting itself above the orchestra. She is a magnificent singer. She comes to this city again this spring, when the extremely favorable impression created last night will secure for her a warm reception.

The orchestra numbers were by Beethoven, Raff and Liszt. Of course they were accorded adequate and artistic interpretation.

The Symphony season has been remarkably successful in all respects. There have been large audiences at all the concerts, though several of them had the ill fortune to come on stormy nights. It is perfectly plain that Providence appreciates the high class music given by this great orchestra. Next year, if it comes here to give a series of concerts, there will be none too much room in Infantry Hall to accommodate the people who will wish to hear it.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last Symphony concert underwent "a sea change," partly because Mr. Nikisch was ill, so that the second of Beethoven's symphonies had to be substituted for the expected Svendsen, and partly because the new pianist, Mr. Arthur Friedheim, had come unprovided with the orchestral parts for the Liszt concerto which he had promised to play and consequently put in its place the B-minor sonata of Chopin. The "Antony and Cleopatra" overture of Rubinstein was given, as expected, and received more warmly than in London. It is entertaining, because it has a good deal of decided melody and is richly colored in the scoring, variety not running into extravagance, however, nor weight of tone to excess. The themes are by turns martial and amorous, agitated and dreamy, so that one can take his pick among the episodes of history and fit a half dozen of them to appropriate movements and sentiments. There is some glitter, some clash, a good deal of the pomp of trumpets, something of the rattle of tambourines—which comes, oddly enough, at the finale—and a considerable rolling of drums, in which the artist in the southwest corner of the orchestra revelled illimitably. The other large work was Lalo's "Norwegian" fantasy, and all were played beautifully. Mr. Kneisel conducted, and it is no more than the truth to say that such fine consideration for Beethoven, such respect for delicate æsthetic details and such evenly-maintained and pure tone from the strings have not been had before during this season. It seems plain that when next a conductor shall be wanted, the right man can be found in the concert-master's seat. Mr. Friedheim appears to be rather an agreeable than an impressive pianist, although what reserve of strength and dash he may have for the Liszt music, in which he is said to excel, cannot as yet be even guessed. His technique is genuine and apparently adequate to emergencies; his tone smooth, pure and equable; his touch light, but firm; his scales and ornaments clear, and his chords balanced and full-voiced. He read the sonata unaffectedly and rather coolly, making more diversities of rhythm and volume than were borne out by feeling. We should guess that he will come out brilliantly and voluminously in music of the modern school, but that in the standard and classic his playing will be more intellectual and scholarly than enthusiastic and magnetic.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891

Mr. Nikisch was unable to lead the Symphony orchestra Saturday evening, and Mr. Kneisel took his place. Mr. Arthur Friedheim thought of playing Liszt's concerto for the pianoforte in A, but he forgot to bring either score or parts, and he played Chopin's Sonata in B minor. The orchestral selections were Rubinstein's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture, Lalo's rhapsody in A, and Beethoven's second symphony.

* * * * *

Rubinstein's overture was played for the first time in this city. It was written last year. The composer has called it an "Overture to the Tragedy of Anthony and Cleopatra", but whether he had in mind Shakespere, or Plutarch, or Suetonius, or Arséne Houssaye is immaterial. He gives it a name that suits his fancy. In spite of its brilliant passages of instrumentation, and the freshness of the themes (the Cleopatra motive is eminently characteristic), the overture cannot be called a remarkable work or one that will probably hold for a long time a place in the concert room. It does not seem to be firmly knit; it is not an organic whole. It is too panoramic. Still it is an interesting composition.

* * * * *

There have been several overtures written of late years upon this subject; but even the great opportunities offered for ballet, scenery, and musical color do not seem to tempt the modern composer. The lovers have appeared in opera many times, but without success. Such men as Cimarosa, Paer, and before them Graun, and still earlier, Mattheson, have told the story in opera; but who knows a scrap of the music? Why, Cleopatra tempted Antony in Venice as far back as 1662, and a good Franciscan monk named Father Daniel or Castrovillari, put music in her mouth. But monk and music sleep, forgotten.

* * * * *

The overture, as well as the other numbers, showed Mr. Kneisel's skill as a director. Indeed, the performance of Beethoven's second symphony was admirable in every respect, and the orchestra played with a care and a finish that have for many weeks been conspicuously absent. The performance of the andante and the scherzo was particularly fine. Mr. Kneisel was loudly applauded after each number and at the end of the concert.

* * * * *

Mr. Friedheim proposes to give a series of four pianoforte recitals later in the season, and it would be fairer to him to defer any extended criticism of his playing until his abilities and limitations are more clearly defined. It may justly be said, however, that Saturday evening he displayed considerable technique and fine taste; but excellent as his performance was in many respects, it seemed devoid of any intensity, exaggerated or suggested. Mr. Friedheim made a favorable impression upon his hearers, and he was twice recalled.

* * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1891.

A Symphony Concert Without A Symphony—A New Theatre of Immense Proportions—Entertainment in Aid of Trinity House.

The programme for the twenty-second Symphony concert was entirely devoted to the works of Richard Wagner. Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel were the soloists. Mielke has an excellent voice, the lower tones of which are notably resonant and sympathetic, but she is evidently one of the many victims of Wagner's unvocal style of writing. Mr. Andreas Dippel has a superb voice, but his vocalization is anything but artistic. The concert was attended by the usual large audience and the orchestra played superbly; but it was in no true sense of the term either musical or artistic and was evidently a bug-bear to the vast majority of the audience present, scores of whom left the house long before the concert was over.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT LAST NIGHT.

The first of the several great programmes, which, it was generally understood some time ago would cause the season of the Boston Symphony concerts to end in a blaze of glory, was presented at the twenty-second rehearsal and concert. It was a Wagner programme, and its announcement, recalling the magnificent success which attended the Wagner matinee early in the season, was sufficent to crowd Music Hall. Only one of the numbers of that concert was repeated: the arrangement that Hans Richter made, in accordance with Wagner's own suggestions, of certain instrumental portions of "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung." The other numbers were the overture to "The Flying Dutchman;" "Lohengrin's Legend;" another concert arrangement from "Die Meistersinger;" the "Funeral March," the duet, "In neuen Thaten," and the closing scene from "Die Gotterdaemmerung."

It is doubtful if as fine a performance of the overture was ever heard in this city. One could begin and pile adjective on adjective, in the attempt to characterize adequately Mr. Nikisch's conception of that masterpiece; but it must suffice to say that both conception and performance were great. The introduction to the third act, the "Dance of Apprentices," "Procession of Mastersingers" and "Homage to Hans Sachs," made a delightful concert-piece. The introduction was beautifully played, all its serenity, and its nobility of sentiment being fully brought out. The effect of the piquant, fascinating dance was lessened to some degree by the unfinished staccato playing of the strings and woodwind, and the inelasticity of the tempo. The conclusion of the number also seemed excessively slow, although the balance was well maintained to the end.

But in the Richter arrangement and the funeral march, the genius of Mr. Nikisch shone resplendent. His many exquisite nuances, his thrilling climaxes, his instinctive appreciation of Wagner's subtle and glowing color effects, his absolute control of the orchestra through the maze of difficulties, all were but an added proof that he is one of the greatest conductors of the day.

This Richter arrangement impresses itself more and more on one as being the greatest symphonic poem extant. Beside it all others seem pigmy-like by comparison. And the Funeral March! Its grandeur, its pathos are indescribable.

Mr. Andreas Dippel, late of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, has a tenor voice of good, though not especially sympathetic quality. His delivery of the "legend" was not wholly effective, either in style or volume of tone. He did not seem to be able to hold his own against the heavy accompaniment, which in reality was heavier than it needed to have been; and altogether his singing was disappointing, although evidence was not lacking that he is an artist of ability. In the duet from "Die Gotterdaemmerung" he was joined by Mme. Antonia Mielke, also from New York. Here again both singers were so frequently overweighted by the orchestra that it is impossible to make a just estimate of their rendering of that unapproachable love scene.

In the closing scene of the Trilogy, Mme. Mielke was heard to better advantage. Her voice is a soprano, strong and musical, excepting its lower notes, which seemed rather coarse. That she is a singer of feeling and discrimination, was made clearly manifest in her artistic, if not powerful rendering of Brunhilde's "funeral" song. The singers that can make themselves heard without shouting in the midst of such accompaniments, are very few indeed. But, as is well known, Wagner intended that the players should be placed partly beneath the theatre stage; and only those who have attended the performances at Bayreuth can fully realize the mellow, yet exceedingly rich effects that his orchestration produces under those conditions. It must, then, be considered an injustice both to composer and singer to condemn either on the basis of a concert-room performance; fortunate indeed is the soloist who can make a pronounced success in such a manner.

The work of the orchestra was uneven in quality; and several instances of rough playing indicated inadequate preparation. Mr. Nikisch's illness and the addition of four extra horns, two trumpets, bass clarinet, English horn, and instruments of percussion, naturally had much to do with this state of affairs; still, there is no doubt that both conductor and men are overworked. In spite of everything, however, the concert was a memorable one. Of the conductor who can rise to such heights of musical expression as did Mr. Nikisch, enough cannot be said.

---

[123]

FESTIVAL BULLETIN

A Journal devoted to the Interests of the

LOUISVILLE MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL

Vol. I. LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 30, 1891. No. 4.

The • Commercial • Club,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

MEMBERSHIP 1,325.

ORGANIZATION FOR 1890-91

PRESIDENT:
FRANK N. HARTWELL.

FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT:
OWEN GATHRIGHT, JR.

SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT:
FRANK VON BORRIES.

DIRECTORS:

JOHN S. MORRIS, ANGUS R. ALLMOND,
PEYTON N. CLARKE, ALVAH L. TERRY,
T. J. BATMAN, GEO. BRADEN,
ROLAND WHITNEY, E. J. McDERMOTT,
TRACY UNDERHILL, A. H. ROBINSON.

SECRETARY:
LUCIEN M. ADKINS.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY:
THOS. P. CRAIG.

TREASURER:
J. M. BORNTRAEGER.

DIRECTOR OF CHORUS:
C. H. SHACKLETON.

Organized to promote the material interests of Louisville and the State. Offices, N. W. Cor. Fourth and Main streets, in the largest building of its character south of the Ohio river, and constructed by the young men of Louisville.

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

One of the most talented and interesting artists now before the public is Miss Gertrude Edmands, the Boston contralto, whose portrait adorns this page. Miss Edmands is associated with the leading concert and oratorio singers of the world, and has received the most generous and enthusiastic recognition everywhere. It is certain that she will delight the patrons of the Kentucky May Music Festival.

That Miss Edmands is an artist of the highest rank can not be doubted when one reviews the comments that have been made upon her by leading critics. Howard M. Ticknor wrote in the Boston Globe: "Miss Edmands' rendering was truly fine, her voice had dignity, tranquility, equalness and gentleness, her phrasing was broadly outlined and finished quickly and symmetrically, and she imparted to the whole music a fitting sense of reflective but warm emotion."

G. H. Wilson expresses himself thus in the Boston Traveller: "We do not know of a contralto singer in the country who combines a fine voice and a fine method in the same eminent degree."

Another Boston critic, Louis C. Elson, of the Advertiser, gives his opinion of her thus: "Miss Edmands is like Mr. Whitney, unique in her way. Nothing could excel the richness and finish of her rendering of the recitative 'Behold a Virgin,' and the aria which follows it, 'O thou that tellest.'"

The New York Sun adds to her laurels as follows: "Miss Gertrude Edmands made an impression which raises her far above most artists of her age. Possessing a smooth contralto voice of velvety quality, she has also an admirable method from her teacher, George Henschel. The selection from 'Achilleus' was nobly sung."

Other well-known writers have made comments, from which the following are taken: "Of the soloists Miss Edmands stands at the head. Possessing a rich, powerful contralto voice and attractive presence, she captured her hearers on her first appearance."

"Miss Gertrude Edmands is well known for her work—artistic work, which alone would make her famous. She adds to a rich, deep voice a wonderful power of expressing the meaning of her sentences."

"Miss Gertrude Edmands' rich contralto voice and refined and sympathetic singing were one of the most distinctive pleasures of the concert."

KENTUCKY'S MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL.

The Music Festival which is to be held at the Auditorium from May 12th to 16th will be the greatest musical event that has ever been given south of the Ohio river not only from an artistic standpoint, but also from the fact that it will establish a standard from which our growth as a musical center is to be developed and widened.

The idea of giving a grand festival in May originated in the Commercial Club, and after considerable discussion and careful investigation the Committee on Arrangements formulated a plan, upon which the Club went to work to secure the necessary guarantee fund. By the prompt and energetic action of the special committees the fund was quickly obtained, and the arrangements were pushed on to completion. The first step taken was the engagement of a grand orchestra, and the Music Committee were fortunate in being able to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which now ranks as the finest musical organization in the United States, and one of the finest in the world, having created for itself a unique position in the large Eastern cities, where concerts are being given during the winter season to immense audiences.

The next step was the engagement of soloists, the prime object being to secure the very best vocalists to be had in this country, without regard to cost. In this connection the committee acted wisely in securing quality rather than quantity. It would have been more economical to have engaged a number of second or third-rate artists with unpronounceable names, but it was thought that the reputation of the festival would be better maintained by having only the very best exponents of the art.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.

[124]

MISS DEVERE is without question the greatest soprano in America.

MISS EDMANDS has no superior as contralto.

MRS. NIKISCH is unsurpassed as an exponent of German lieder.

MR MOCKRIDGE has no equal as a lyric tenor, and has a voice of wonderful range and purity.

MR. LUDWIG is the grandest dramatic basso in the country, and is eminently fitted for the solo parts in the great works to be sung.

In addition to the above, there is also to be engaged another celebrated soloist, and celebrated instrumental soloists will be engaged to add to the attractions of the Festival, also such other vocal soloists as may be found necessary.

But the feature that will distinguish this Festival from all previous musical events in Louisville will be the Grand Festival Chorus of 250 select voices, which is now rehearsing energetically under the direction of Mr. C H. Shackleton, of the Musical Club.

Competent critics say that the chorus is the best organization of the kind ever heard here, and it is predicted that those who attend the Festival will have a great surprise in store for them in the grandeur and massive effects of the choral works.

The seats are being taken rapidly, and those who wish to secure favorable positions should lose no time in getting tickets.

During the Festival there will be a large influx of visitors on account of the races, the meeting of the Scotch-Irish Society, the Democratic Convention and the Elks Reunion. As the time approaches, many of these visitors will want seats, and it is pertinent to suggest that those who come first will be the best served.

The railroads and steamboats will give reduced rates from all points.

SALE OF SINGLE SEATS.

The sale of single seats will not begin until May 1. This plan will give the public twelve days in which to purchase single seats, and it is identical with that pursued at Cincinnati, Worcester, and other places where great musical festivals have proved so successful. Meanwhile, the sale of season tickets will proceed and now is the time for those who will not go every night to organize clubs to procure good seats for the entire series and divide them out under an equitable arrangement.

See the plan of the Auditorium in this paper, showing exactly how many and which seats have been marked off for the season.

WHAT THEY THINK OF MOCKRIDGE.

New York Music and Drama:—Mockridge, the tenor, made an absolute sensation in an air by Gounod.

New York Mail and Express:—The Siegmund in Max Bruch's 'Arminius,' was given by Whitney Mockridge, a favorite tenor of last year's festival. His beautiful voice, with his refined and spiritual timbre, together with his intuitive understanding of his part, and finished delivery, evidently deepened his firm hold upon the popular estimation.

Washington Post:—Mr. Whitney Mockridge sang 'Salve Dimora' with an exquisite perfection of finish, a beauty and feeling that have seldom been equaled. His voice is a strong tenor of much purity, possessing the sympathetic quality to an unusual degree. At its upper register it has a terse resonance which is saved from stridency by this sympathetic quality. He was vigorously applauded, giving for an encore "My Jane."

Toronto Globe:—Mr. Mockridge has a fine dramatic style, a beautiful voice and an excellent method, and he gave the audience a beautiful study of how care and thought and fine artistic feeling can embellish a good voice and method. No tenor who has visited Toronto in the last twenty years has made such a distinct success as Mr. Mockridge did in this aria. The audience insisting on a recall, he sang an English ballad in the same exquisite manner.

Toronto Mail:—Mr. Mockridge achieved his principal success later in the evening when he sang the "Salve Dimora" from Faust. This was a most finished and artistic effort. Mr. Mockridge won a most marked triumph, the audience tumultously applauding until they had literally compelled him to give an encore number.

ABOUT THE MENDELSSOHN.

In reply to a query, Mr. Alfred Pirtle, who has long been prominently identified with musical life in Louisville, writes as follows: "To the best of my recollection, the Mendelssohn Society was originated in this way. Mr. C. C. Hull, at the time leader of the Baptist church in musical matters, suggested the idea of getting a few music lovers together to practice classical music, and Mr. A. D. Miles invited him to ask his friends to his (Mr. Miles) house, then on First street between Gray and Broadway. This was in the winter of 1856. They met accordingly and took up the forty-second psalm which occupied several weeks. During the season it seemed necessary to have an organization, and a name as well, therefore Mr. Hull was made Director, and the name came naturally as the piece de resistance was one of Mendelssohn's greatest. 'Elijah' was not attempted for many months afterwards."

There will be nine days of splendid racing at the Louisville Jockey Club, beginning with Kentucky's famous Derby on May 14th.

M. A. HUSTON, Sec. THEODORE HARRIS, Pres.

Louisville Insurance Company,

251 FIFTH STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Fire, + Tornado + and + Cargo + Insurance.

☞ YOUR BUSINESS SOLICITED. ☜

J. J. FISCHER, President. EDMUND RAPP, Cashier.

GERMAN INSURANCE BANK,

North Side Market, bet. 2d and 3d.

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - - $500,000.00.

BANK OF DEPOSIT.

DIRECTORS.

J. J. FISCHER, W. H. EDINGER, NICK FINZER, H. WELLENVOSS, J. HAXTHAUSEN, CHAS. WINKLER, E W. HERMAN.

COLLECTIONS AND EXCHANGE.

The above Bank solicits deposits, pays interest on time deposits, buys and sells exchange on all principal cities in the United States, makes collections in any part of the country and issues exchange payable at sight in the principal cities of Germany, Switzerland, France, and in any part of Europe.

Telephone 1519-2.

JAMES C. McFERRAN,

FIRE INSURANCE,

Personal attention given to all Business. 606 COMMERCE.

NATIONAL LIBRARY CO. SUCCESSORS TO R. S. AYERS,

625 Fourth Avenue, Louisville, Ky.

DEALERS IN

Sheet Music, Music Books, Etc., Etc

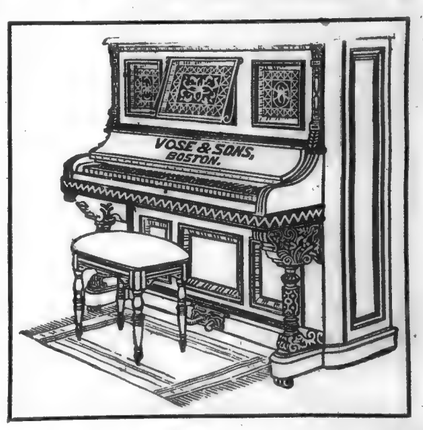
Send for a Catalogue of our Ten Cent Music, containing All the Late and Popular Pieces of the Day.

EMIL WULSCHNER.

HENRY F. MILLER PIANOS

The Artists' Favorite.

Used and endorsed by the LEADING ARTISTS OF THE DAY.



VOSE PIANOS HAVE BEEN Universal Favorites For 40 Years.

Customers delighted.

Competition bewildered.

A STOCK OF 14 OF THE LEADING MAKES OF PIANOS AND ORGANS.

PIANO TUNING A SPECIALTY.

C. RIEGGER, Mgr. 632 Fourth Ave., Louisville.

DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.

DO YOU WANT TO FURNISH AN OFFICE? Do you want to Furnish a House or any part of an Office or House? If so, do not begin doing it until you have looked through our stock of Carpets, Furniture and House Furnishings. Our price and elegant display is what takes to the buying public. Don't fail to visit us.

DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.

Business Education

THOROUGH INSTRUCTION IN BOOK-KEEPING, SHORT-HAND, TYPE-WRITING, PENMANSHIP, TELEGRAPHY, ETC., ETC., AT THE BRYANT & STRATTON BUSINESS COLLEGE SOUTH-WEST CORNER THIRD AND JEFFERSON STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY. CATALOGUE FREE.

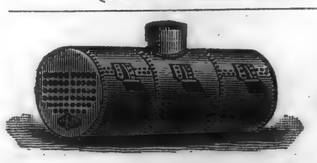
TRY ST. BERNARD COAL.

Office: 346 W. Main St., near Fourth. Telephone 932—Ring 2 & 1783—Ring 2.

ST. BERNARD COAL COMPANY.

YARDS: Kentucky St., bet. 13th & 14th. Floyd Street, North of Washington. 14th and Madison St.

H. S. NEWBOLD, Manager.



JOHN MITCHELL,

STEAM BOILER MANUFACTURER,

313, 315 & 317 ELEVENTH STREET,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

Telephone 725, Ring 2.

BALLARD'S OBELISK FLOUR

☞ ALWAYS RELIABLE.

Main Street Brewery,

SENN & ACKERMAN,

1710 to 1720 West Main Street,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD MOZART.

"At this time when we are all looking forward with so much pleasure and interest to our Spring Musical Festival," writes a well-known singer, "and especially to that portion of it which our own local talent is to contribute, it may not be out of place to recall some of the old associations connected with the music and musicians of Louisville as far back as thirty-five years, or thereabouts. So much has been recently said concerning the musical people of this place of the last twenty years, that it will doubtless be a surprise and revelation to the present generation to learn that there was really a great deal of musical taste and cultivation here before their day. There are quite a number of people who remember with the greatest affection and pleasure the old Mozart Society, which was organized in Christ Church Sunday-School room, somewhere in the fifties, and flourished for several years, under Mr. Gunter's direction, as no other musical organization ever flourished in Louisville.

"Mr. Gunter was a most able and enthusiastic leader, and inspired the members of his chorus with the same zeal and earnestness that he himself put into the work. He was assisted by Mr. Hull and Mr. Peters. In a short time this society grew to be of such importance, that Mr. John I. Jacob erected the building that now stands on the corner of Fourth and Jefferson streets, and which was called Mozart's Hall, for its accommodation. The open rehearsals, which were given every month, were very popular, and nearly every prominent family in Louisville attended these rehearsals as honorary members. Besides producing some other oratorios, some of the masses, and much popular music, the society gave 'Elijah' in a way that could scarcely be surpassed. It was on this occasion that Mr. Colliere made such an ideal Elijah that the audience was deeply impressed, and some of those who were present have never since heard the words of the oratorio read from the Bible without re-calling the grand old man with his beautiful voice and appearance, and the religious ferver which he felt. Mrs. Peters was the leading soprano of this large chorus. She had not a beautiful voice, but it was powerful and true, and she was never afraid of using it in the heaviest choral music. While I can not recall a complete list of the singers, some of them were Misses Eliza Turner, Laura Lucas, Eudora Lucas, Lucy Long, Julia Ruffner, Julia Anderson, Margaret Boynton, Helen Cochran, Miss Webster (now Sinton), the Misses Craik, Miss Selby, Miss Huyler, the Misses Clayland. Miss Gosling (now Mrs. George Whipple), Mrs. Kinney, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Sawtell, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Miller, Miss Davis, Dr. Raphael, Messrs. Julius Winter, Julius Sues, I. B. Webster, E. Z. Webster, J. Dolfinger, J. A. Copp, J. B. Smith, Joseph Griffith, Charles Weiss, George W. Carvill, George Zoeller, J. H. Rhorer, Lewis Thomas, J. Blanchard, E. W. Gunter, H. J. Peters, C. C. Hull, D. W. Kennedy, J. H. M. Morris, James A. Huber, James P. Hull, G. A. Hull, R. T. Miller, Reuben L. Post, Henry W. Keisker, A. Duffield Miles, G. S. Whipple, William Semple, Louis Hast, Dr. E W. Mason, G. W Braiderd, Prof. C. Colliere, S. S. Craik, Prof. Hamel C. Wolford, Mad Anna Ablamouriz, Messrs. Reutlinger, Eubank, LeJeune and Oberdorfer."

SELLING SEATS IN BOSTON.

The sale of $7 50 tickets for the Symphony rehearsals at Music Hall this morning says the Boston Transcript, was attended by three hundred or four hundred people. The bidding was at times quite spirited, and every seat in the house was sold. The lowest premium paid was $4.00; the highest was $27.00 for seats in the back row in the left balcony. As at the sale yesterday, a large number of tickets were bought by speculators presumably on orders, for at the extravagant prices paid it is not probable that speculators could realize any profit on sales made after the excitement of the auction has passed.

Some who were disappointed yesterday in their unsuccessful efforts to get tickets, came again to-day with renewed hopes and possibly with deeper pocket-books. But many of them were disappointed again, for prices kept high as a rule, only the poor seats at the rear of the hall, under the balcony, selling within reasonable bounds. One man got comfortably seated and waited quietly for the sale to open. But when the first seats knocked down brought a premium of $12.50, he at once left the hall, not waiting to see what the next lot would bring.

A young girl caused some amusement among those around her by persistently starting lot after lot at five dollars, following the bids up to ten dollars, and then sinking back in her seat with an expression of disgust. But she would rally promptly for the next lot, and in all, must have started twenty-five lots.

A woman remarked to a friend that last year she came on admission tickets and rushed for a seat in the upper balcony, but it cost so much for pairs to dresses that this year she thought it would be cheaper to buy a seat at a moderate premium.

There was a feeling during the sale this morning that the premiums bid were the offerings of music lovers. Ridiculously high premiums were paid yesterday, in many instances because it is the fashionable thing to go to the Symphony rehearsals. Those premiums were for seats on the floor, however, but the prices paid to-day were for seats in sections of the hall not considered especially fashionable, though many of the seats are as desirable for music-lovers as many of the high-priced seats in the fashionable quarter.

Send in your names to the Secretary and secure good seats now.

Capital, $300,000. Surplus, $80,000.

Farmers' & Drovers' Bank of Louisville

Pays Interest on Savings deposits and time Certificates. Solicits your account.

R. S. VEECH, PRESIDENT. J. W. NICHOLS, CASHIER.

J. H. LINDENBERGER, President. JNO. J. HARBISON, Vice-President.
WM. R. JOHNSON, Cashier. F. H. JOHNSON, Ass't Cashier.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK,

Capital, $500,000 LOUISVILLE, KY. Surplus and Profits, $200,130

GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Solicits the accounts of MERCHANTS, MANUFACTURERS and INDIVIDUALS.

DANIEL QUILP, Sole Proprietor and Manager JAS. B. CAMP, Business Manager.

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM,

4th AND HILL STREETS,

ONLY FOR GREAT ATTRACTIONS.

Next attraction "THE SOUDAN," week March 30, 1891.

WEAVER'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

N. E. Cor. Fourth and Market Streets, Louisville, Ky.

ENTRANCE ON FOURTH ST.

BEN C. WEAVER, President. L. COMINGOR, Secretary.
CLARENCE M. GORDON, Principal of Shorthand Department.

Book keeping, Commercial Arithmetic, Penmanship, Shorthand, Typewriting, etc.

P. S. CAMPBELL, LOUISVILLE, KY. ROOM No. 808 THE COMMERCE.

Insurance Fire Adjuster

LOUISVILLE, NEW ALBANY AND JEFFERSONVILLE ONLY.

Arthur Kaye STRANGERS ARE ALWAYS WELCOME.

564 FOURTH AVENUE,

Is now showing a large and beautiful Collection of DINNER SETS, at popular prices.

KENTUCKY LIFE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

We call attention to the advertisement of the above company, which appears in another part of this paper. The company is managed by some of the best known business men of this city. The officers of the company are Hon. W. B. Hoke, President; Dr. Geo. W. Griffiths, Vice-President and Medical Director; W. T. McCarley, Superintendent and Business Manager; and W. H. McKinley, Secretary. The Louisville Trust Company, Trustee of the Reserve and Guaranty Fund.

Judge Hoke, President of the Company has been Judge of the County Court of this county for more than twenty-five years, and is well known throughout the State. Dr. Geo. W. Griffiths is one of the most prominent physicians in this city, and ex-President of the Board of Aldermen of the city, and has held several high official positions in the city. W. T. McCarley, Superintendent of the Company, is a well known business man, and is well posted in the insurance business, and has been one of the company's most active members ever since its organization. W. H. McKinley, the Secretary of the Company, is a well known business man of the city, and has been with the company since it was organized.

We commend the company to our readers. rt.

WILLARD HOTEL

(Late ALEXANDER HOTEL)

W. R. LOGAN, Manager.

☞ Nearest Hotel to all Theatres.

Corner Jefferson, Center and Green Sts.,

Opposite Court House.

It is important that each member of the chorus should take personal interest in the success of the Festival, and the best way of doing this is by studying the difficult passages at home, by prompt attendance at rehearsals, and by taking special pride in rendering the choruses as well as possible.

There is danger of the chorus becoming negligent by reason of the praises which have been showered upon them. Those members who are conscientious will know how to value these compliments, and they should also remember that there is still the most difficult part of the program to be studied and overcome. Nothing but faithful and persistent work will accomplish what we have undertaken.

[124]

Boston Transcript
SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1891.
TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I.
Date 4-8
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891
Boston Courier.

The Festival Bulletin.

Issued semi-monthly under the auspices of the Press Committee of the Louisville Commercial Club, and edited by the Club's Secretary. Office, Room No. 1005, The Commerce Building, Louisville, Ky. For advertising rates, address John L. Moore, Business Manager.

LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 30, 1891.

WHY could not Louisville have a Festival Association? Not a half-hearted affair, but an organization, earnest in its purposes and backed by money and influence. The little city of Worcester, Mass., has a magnificent festival with great artists each year, under the auspices of its association. If such an association were organized in Louisville the Commercial Club would feel that the musical phase of the city's development was in good hands and could extend its usefulness in another direction with the time and energy returned to it. An annual music festival need never lose a cent for its promoters, and could be made a handsomely paying venture.

THE Commercial Club has a satisfactory bank account, a membership that is not approached numerically by any other commercial body in the world; and there is no factional feeling of a character calculated to injure its influence and usefulness, existing within its army of unselfish promoters of the general welfare. There is plenty of work to do and the club was never better prepared to undertake it. Its working forces are not idle, much quiet but effective labor being done. The noisiest and most self-important people do not accomplish the greatest good, as thoughtless critics would sometimes seek to convince us.

WHILE the enthusiasm that the Music Festival is certain to create is at its tide, the time will be ripe for perfecting plans that work out the permanent establishment of various phases of musical life in Louisville. Surely some devoted friends of the fine arts are looking a few weeks into the future, and will not let this golden opportunity slip.

FOUNDED and nourished upon a generous and intelligent sentiment, the Commercial Club has reached a dignity wherein it is dependent for existence upon its merits—its good works. It no longer expects the tender solicitude of its several parents and sponsors, for it is fit to fight the battle alone. Naturally, then, a stern business policy must be adhered to, and a wise conservatism kept in view. A big organization that seeks to influence all classes for good must preserve itself from just ridicule; indeed, a few false steps prompted by a mistaken sentiment has more than once destroyed a reputation. There are reasons why the club does not take up the cudgel at every suggestion made.

ALL results have gone to prove the wisdom of selecting Mr. Shackleton to train the Festival Chorus. The work is a labor of love to him, and he has brought to it not only ability and earnestless, but a personality extremely attractive in many ways. He instructs quietly and without waste of time, holds the attention and respect of the singers, and does not flurry them with explosions of grief or anger over inaccuracies.

THE man who "didn't know it was loaded," now wants aisle seats in the parquette and howls because he can't get them. There are still excellent seats to be had, however, but they are going rapidly.

SEMIQUAVERS.

The music at Christ church Easter Sunday must have excited the pride of the members and the admiration of visitors, and it assuredly added new honors to Mr. William Frese, the hard-working and talented director and organist.

***

There will be no speculation in festival seats, since very few, if any, persons have bought them except for the use of themselves and families. The gentleman who is currently reported to have 100 seats has not bought one as yet, and, consequently, can have none for sale.

***

It should not be forgotten that the sale of single-night seats does not begin until May 1st. Music lovers in interior towns and cities should organize clubs and purchase season tickets, thus securing desirable seats. An equitable division of the tickets can be made among the contributors to the pool.

***

There was not a chair vacant at the mass rehearsal last Monday night, and the perfection attained in singing the magnificent chorus from "Elijah" was highly commended by visiting critics. The "Stabat Mater" is also fast approaching a state of perfection, and Mr. Nikisch's representative, who will arrive in about two weeks, can not fail to be pleased with the material Louisville presents in its Festival chorus.

***

It requires the constant use of two of the fast-flying elevators at the Commerce to transport the members of the chorus to the tenth floor where they sing.

***

Two hundred and fifty trained voices, accompanied by the leading orchestral organization of the country, ought to create the greatest enthusiasm. Nothing approaching it has ever been heard here.

ABOUT THE SEATS.

If you wish information about seats or other festival matters, write to or call upon Lucien M. Adkins, Secretary Commercial Club, Commerce Building, Louisville, Ky. There are some excellent seats to be had now, but they are going rapidly. Send in your order, with check or money order, and it will be promptly and satisfactorily filled. Season tickets—six performances, are only $10.00.

WM. TILLMAN, Cashier. CHAS. MERIWETHER, Ass't Cashier.

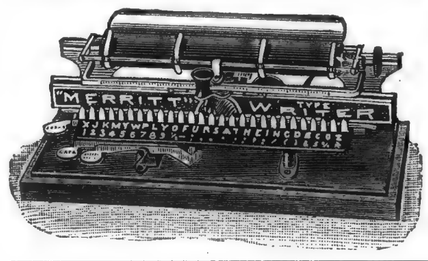
FALLS CITY BANK,
LOUISVILLE, KY.,

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - $676,101.60.

Transacts • a • General • Banking • Business.
Accounts of Merchants, Manufacturers and Bankers Solicited.
DEPARTMENT FOR SAVINGS. INTEREST ALLOWED ON SAVINGS DEPOSITS.

DIRECTORS:
JOHN T. MOORE, Prest. P. MEGUIAR. DENIS LONG, Vice-Prest.
CHARLES H. PETTET. J. W. E. BAYLY. H. C. WARREN. W. S. WYMOND.

KAUFMAN, STRAUS & CO.,
523—525 FOURTH AVENUE,
THE LARGEST IMPORTING RETAILERS OF
DRY ✣ GOODS
IN THE SOUTH-WEST.
WRITE FOR SAMPLES.



Louisville Cycle and Typewriter Co.
231 WEST JEFFERSON ST.,
— DEALERS IN —
BICYCLES, TYPEWRITERS, SHORTHAND WRITING MACHINES, RIBBONS, CARBON AND LINEN PAPERS, ETC.
— WRITE FOR CIRCULARS AND TERMS.—

IN selecting a piano or organ, it is very desirable to have a variety to select from, that is, two or three different makes of each grade, at about the same price, so as to afford a opportunity for selection as each make differs in tone, action and style. Until the opening of the new music house of Emil Wulschner, 632 Fourth Avenue, this advantage has been denied the purchasers of this city but as his stock embraces fourteen of the leading makes of pianos and organs, which is more than double the number carried by any other house, every opportunity is afforded for a judicious and satisfactory selection. 1t.

FOR CHURCHES AND MUSIC-ROOMS.

The most important invention of the XIX century is the Vocalion, a new musical instrument constructed upon the principles of the human voice, and consequently the best accompaniment to all vocal music, sacred or secular. The tone is undistinguishable from a finely voiced pipe organ, except that it has a sympathetic quality not obtained from pipes, and does not occupy one-fourth the space or cost one-half the price of a pipe organ of similar capacity. The clergy and organists hail its advent with unqualified satisfaction. For churches and private music-rooms it is unrivaled for beautiful musical effects. To be seen at D. H. Baldwin & Co's. 236 Fourth Avenue, Louisville. 1t.

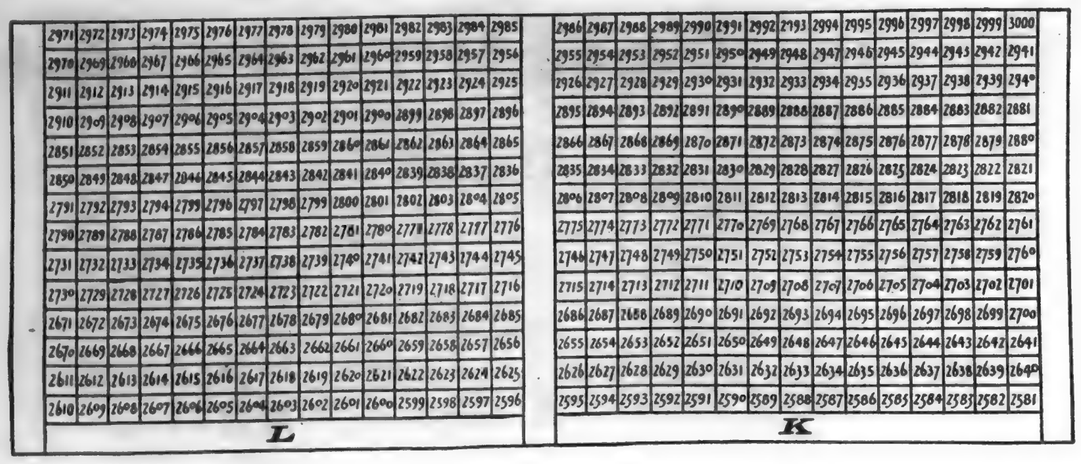
SMITH & NIXON offer special inducements to teachers Those having square pianos can make very favorable terms of exchange Call on them and secure prices on their instruments, which are always reliable. 1t

AMONG the many Royal Imperial Court and Government National Bands there are none more excellent or delightful to listen to than the United States Marine Band of our own Government at Washington. Especially since the appointment of its present conductor, Mr. John Philip Sousa, a most thorough and competent musician and composer, has the band increased to the foremost rank among similar organizations, and become the musical pride of the presidential household as well as the members of the cabinet and Congress, and the ladies who make up the social element of Washington. President Harrison and Secretary Tracy, of the Navy Department, to which the Marine Band is attached, have been prevailed upon to grant Prof. Sousa and his entire organization of musicians a leave of absence for the purpose of visiting the largest cities of the country to give a limited number of exhibition concerts. Manager James B. Camp, of the Auditorium, announces one concert to be given in this city on April 28th, which news will delight the hundreds of admirers of good music. Seats will be placed on sale at Baldwin's, 236 Fourth avenue, Monday, April 6th. 1t

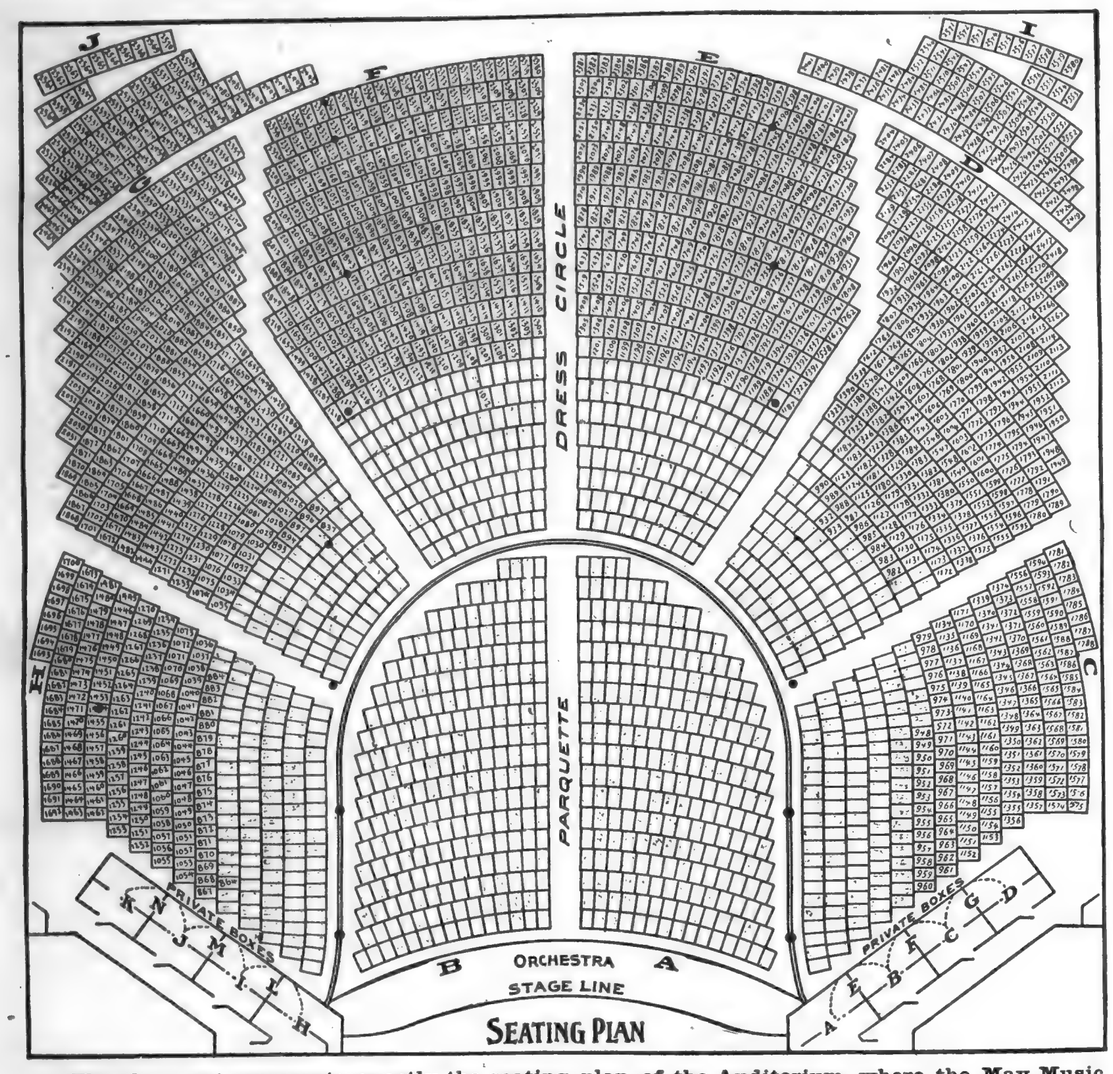
ON EASY PAYMENTS.

Secure from D. H. Baldwin & Co., 236 Fourth Avenue, Louisville, a piano or organ on easy monthly payments until paid for, of the following standard makes: Decker Brothers, Haines Brothers, J. C. Fischer, D. H. Baldwin & Co., Cottage Upright pianos, and Estey, Hamilton and Shoninger organs. 1t.

[123]



BALCONY.



The above cut represents exactly the seating plan of the Auditorium, where the May Music Festival is to be given, and shows, by the blank spaces, just how many seats have been marked off. It will be seen that the entire parquette has been sold, and many of the dress circle seats. Select your seats and send the numbers to the Secretary. If the seats you have chosen have been marked off, he will send you seats as close to them as possible. Enclose check, cash or money order with your request.

WHAT ONE CAN SEE.

There was something written recently about the points of interest in Baldwin & Co.'s Fourth-street house, but it did not cover all of them. For instance, on the second floor is the teaching department, where a number of Louisville's most prominent musicians give instruction to many pupils daily. The rooms are handsomely furnished and the acoustics are arranged particularly with a view to the best effect. On this floor also is the organ stock-room, where several hundred organs of the Estey, Story & Clark and Hamilton makes are on public view. One can secure an organ here costing but a few dollars, or a very elegant instrument at a higher but entirely reasonable figure. In fact, this firm deals in nothing but standard makes, either in cheap or high price goods, and the prices are as low as consistent with quality.

1t.

Capital Paid up, $750,000. ESTABLISHED 1890. Surplus, $50,000.

UNION NATIONAL BANK,

S. E Cor. 6th & Main Sts., Louisville, Ky.

Accounts of Individuals, Manufacturers, Corporations, Banks and Bankers Solicited.

GEO. W. SWEARINGEN, PREST. W. P. OTTER, VICE-PREST. L. O. COX, CASHIER.

Removes Freckles, Moth Patches, Pimples and all Blemishes of the Skin.

—CONSULTATION INVITED.—

Ladies with good complexions should use my "soap" and "almond meal compound" and keep them so.

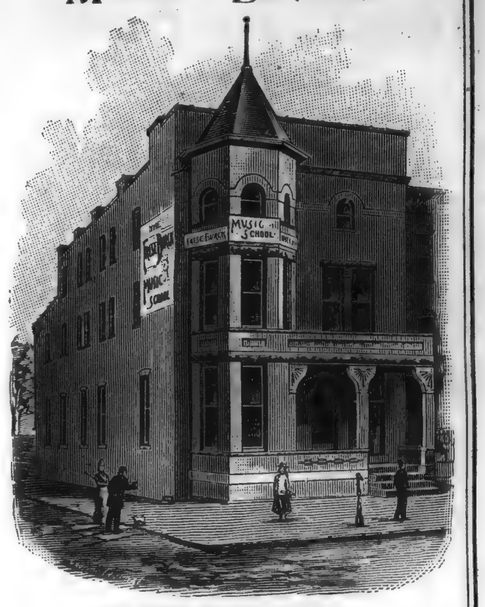
Valuable hints about washing, wiping, and preserving good complexions given free. Prominent Louisville physicians and hundreds of Louisville ladies who have used the Bleach as references.

Marion Walker Face Bleach

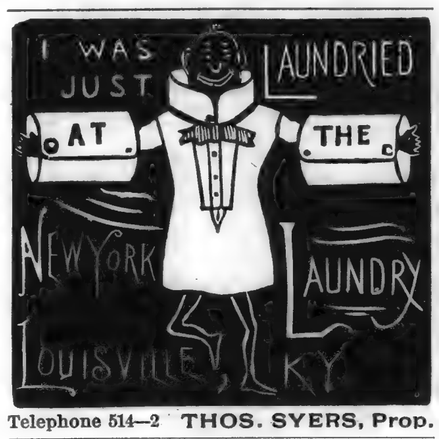
Mrs. Marion Walker,
514 FOURTH AVE.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIAMONDS
WM KENDRICKS SONS,
336. 4TH AVE
LOUISVILLE, KY.
WATCHES JEWELRY SILVERWARE
OUR STORE & ART ROOM ALWAYS OPEN TO RECEPTION OF VISITORS.

THE FRESE-BURCK
Music School,



424 WEST WALNUT STREET.
CATALOGUE FURNISHED ON APPLICATION.



Telephone 514—2 THOS. SYERS, Prop.

BALLARD'S
OBELISK
FLOUR
ALWAYS RELIABLE.

F. TEUPE,
PIANOS and ORGANS,
713—715 East Gray Street.
BEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY
Prices Guaranteed Lower than at any other Store.

Caligraph
STANDARD TYPEWRITER.
Typewriter and Stenographers' Supplies of all kinds and for all machines.
THE
AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO.,
246 FIFTH ST., LOUISVILLE, KY.
WRITE FOR CATALOGUES.

REMINGTON STANDARD
TYPEWRITER
The Remington has stood the test of time and use and is acknowledged to be the Standard and the Best. Call and examine the Remington, No. Five. A complete stock of typewriter ribbons, paper, etc., always on hand. Send for sample book of papers.
G. M. ALLISON & CO.,
No. 448 W. Main St., LOUISVILLE, KY.

[124]

Boston Transcript MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1891.
TELEGRAM, Providence, R. I. Date 4-8 SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
BOSTON HOME JOURNAL. SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1891
Boston Courier.

A. C. LEWIS,
HATTER AND FURRIER,
415 Fourth Avenue,
AGENT FOR Dunlap's Celebrated Hats
AND
CHRISTY'S ENGLISH HATS.

CUT FLOWERS.
ROSE BUDS A SPECIALTY.
FLOWERS ARTISTICALLY ARRANGED.
F. WALKER & CO.,
Telephone 1388—2. 644 FOURTH AVE.
Nursery and F

BICYCLES!
COLUMBIA,
HARTFORD, ROVER.
Bicycles for Ladies, Men,
Girls and Boys,
ALL SIZES AND PRICES.
Bicycling Sundries.
— Call for Catalogue. —
G. M. Allison & CO.,
448 W. Main St.,
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIRECTORY
OF THE
LEADING BUSINESS HOUSES
OF
LOUISVILLE.

Lumber, Doors, Sash and Blinds.
S. P. Graham, 810 Magazine Street.
W. J. Hughes & Sons Co., Fourteenth and Maple streets.
G. Kline & Son, 1900 West Main Street.

Hotels.
Galt House, $3 to $5 per day, First and Main streets.
Hotel Rassinier, Market, between Fourth and Fifth streets.

Hardware and Cutlery.
W. B. Belknap & Co., Nos. 115 to 121 West Main street.

Architects.
Walters & Stillman, No. 601 Commerce Building.

Piano Dealers.
Smith & Nixon.
Emil Wulschner, No. 632 Fourth avenue.

Banks.
German Insurance, Market, near second.
Farmers' and Drovers', Market, near Fourth avenue.
Falls City, Seventh and Main Streets.
Merchants' National, Main, between Fifth and Sixth streets.

Wagon Manufacturing.
Kentucky Wagon Manufacturing Company.

Life Insurance Companies.
New York Life Insurance Company, Commerce Building.
Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company, No. 436 West Jefferson street.
The Sun Life Insurance Company of America, No. 502 West Main street.

Trust Companies.
Columbia Finance and Trust Company, Fifth and Main streets.

Gas Plumbing and Mill Supplies.
The Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Co.

Suburban Billiard Parlors,
HENRY HEATH, Prop.
247 Fourth Avenue, LOUISVILLE, KY.

AGENT FOR
Brunswick Balke-Collender Company's Billiard Tables
AND SUPPLIES
Repairing Tables a Specialty. All Orders promptly attended to. Prices on application.

FEASTS OF SOLEMN MUSIC.

In commenting upon a recent choral service in New York, the scholarly musical critic of The Living Church presents several ideas worthy of consideration, especially as they are prompted by a view of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," which we are to hear at the May Music Festival He writes:

"The Dvorak 'Stabat Mater' is surely the 'Stabat Mater' for present and future. The orchestral support is of the gravest importance, and so is such an organ accompaniment as Mr. Parker provides Its place is in the Lord's house. All its sanctions are profoundly ecclesiological and religious. It is much to be desired that Mr. Warren should place it upon his list not only another season, but that it shall rise up into the full supremacy of its Lenten edification, even as 'The Messiah' has come by universal consent to dominate Christmas-tide The vestments of the chorus and soloists, were they desirable? Why not? Never were choralists more beautifully designated as singers of the Lord's songs in the Lord's house. Only let the heads of the women, henceforth, be 'covered.' And why should not there be three or four such feasts of 'solemn music' in each season? And why should not other Christian bodies in New York promote such organizations; and why should they not spring up in all our principal cities to the edification of the faithful and to the greater glory of God?"

BOOK OF PROGRAMS.

We shall publish, in a short time, a book of descriptive programs giving a critical analysis of the larger works to be performed and shorter items of interest relating to all the other numbers. We would advise that persons who expect to attend the Festival should purchase the program book early and make themselves familiar with the works before they reach the concert hall. The books will be placed on sale at the music and book stores and at the hall during the Festival.

Louisville ✣ Music ✣ Festival,

(UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMMERCIAL CLUB.)

✣

PROGRAM.

TUESDAY NIGHT, MAY 12th.

GRAND SYMPHONY CONCERT.
Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Celebrated Vocalist.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 13th.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR, LIGHT CLASSICAL MUSIC,
With a Famous Soloist.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, MAY 13th.

OPEN REHEARSAL OF SELECTED CHORUSES.
Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MAY 14th.

GRAND CLASSICAL NIGHT—WAGNER PROGRAM,
With One or More Great Soloists.

FRIDAY NIGHT, MAY 15th.

FIRST PART.
DVORAK'S "STABAT MATER,"
With Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

SECOND PART.
CLASSICAL PROGRAM.

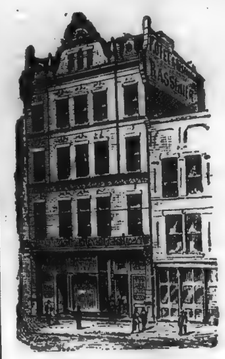
SATURDAY NIGHT, MAY 16th.

MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.
Double Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

COR. SIXTH, HILL & A, LOUISVILLE, KY.

GERNERT BROS., & KOEHLER CO.,
Wholesale and Retail
Lumber, Sash, Doors and Blinds,
Turned and Scroll Work of all kinds.
SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

— THE —
Central Thomson-Houston Co.,
No. 603 COMMERCE BUILDING.
The best Electric Machinery for Lighting, Railroads and Mines. Used everywhere.
Write for Circulars.



HOTEL
RASSINIER,
Octave Rassinier,
PROPRIETOR.
(EUROPEAN PLAN)
415-417 West Market St.,
LOUISVILLE, KY.
New and Complete in all its Appointments.
First-Class Restaurant for Ladies and Gentlemen.

G. KLINE & SON, DEALERS IN SASH, DOORS, BLINDS, MOULDINGS, LUMBER & SHINGLES. Cor. 19th & Main, LOUISVILLE, KY.

VICTOR BICYCLES.

JEFFERIS BROS.,
620 Third Ave., LOUISVILLE, KY.
First-class Repair Shop connected with Store.

MRS. L. RICHARDSON,
SUCCESSOR TO
— MISS GARRITY. —
FOURTH & MARKET STREETS,
PHOTOGRAPHER.
SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

Organs of the best make known and at prices to suit all pocket-books at D. H. Baldwin & Co. 1t

DR. SPINNEY & CO.
✣ SPECIALISTS, ✣
506 Fifth Street, LOUISVILLE, KY.

D. H. Baldwin & Co., are showing a fine line of elegant pianos, among others the renowned Decker. 1t

[123]

MAY'S MANY BIG ATTRACTIONS.

Louisville will be crowded with visitors from all sections of the country during May, attracted here by the several interesting events that are on the programme. First of all in interest to many will be the Musical Festival, beginning on the night of May 12th, ending on the night of May 16th and including a matinee on Wednesday, May 13th.

Arrangements for the Scotch-Irish Congress, which will be held in this city from May 14th to 17th, are being pushed to completion. Rev Dr. John S. MacIntosh, of Philadelphia, one of the greatest orators of the age, and Hon. A. E. Stevenson, of Bloomington, Ill., Ex-Assistant Postmaster-general, in addition to the speakers heretofore announced, will deliver addresses. A paper on the Scotch-Irish pioneers of California, will be submitted by Mr. Alexander Montgomery, of San Francisco. Mr. Montgomery is one of the greatest millionaires of the Golden State, and will be remembered as the philanthropist who gave $250,000 to establish a theological seminary in San Francisco two years ago.

Governor Buckner will deliver the address of welcome.

Rev. Dr. John Hall, of New York, another one of the great orators, will preach in Dr. Hamilton's church on Sunday morning, the 17th, and at the Auditorium on the night of the same day.

The music for the occasion will be furnished by the Goshen band, which is the most celebrated in the world for its rendition of Scotch and Irish airs.

Among the cities that presented pressing invitations to the Congress to hold this year's session in their midst were San Francisco, Atlanta and Charlotte, N. C., but notwithstanding their urgency, Louisville was finally chosen because she was nearer than any of them to the center of the society's membership and because nowhere else is Scotch-Irish blood purer and nowhere else are Scotch-Irish Associations stronger than in Kentucky. The early pioneers were nearly all of this race, and they and their descendants have given to the State her most distinguished sons. Among the leaders of the present day who are of the race, might be mentioned her Breckinridges, Carlisles, Lindsays, Knotts, MacKenzies, and so on through nearly the whole list.

The special object of this Congress is to celebrate the achievements of these pioneers and their descendants in Kentucky. There is not a county in the State that is not rich in the blood, nor one in which some of the leaders are not of the race. It is therefore hoped that not one of them will be unrepresented.

The reduced fare, especially from local points, will enable all who wish to visit the city at small cost and to enjoy the popular exercises of the Congress, which are entirely free.

The programmes will be so arranged that visitors to the Music Festival can hear the distinguished orators of the Congress in the mornings and afternoons if they wish. A reception will be given to members of the society, probably on the first evening, at one of the hotels of the city.

Mr. Helm Bruce, of this city, is local Secretary, and will be glad to give further information to those wishing to attend.

The Southern Afternoon Press Bureau will hold a convention here May 14 to 16 inclusive, and the event will attract wide-awake newspaper men from every section of the South.

There will be nine days of splendid racing at the Louisville Jockey Club, beginning with Kentucky's famous Derby May 14. The race-track and buildings have been extended and beautified, and President M Lewis Clark declares that the events this year will be unusually attractive, and that the Derby will be a brilliant tournament.

On May 16th, 17th and 18th the Grand Lodge of Elks will hold its annual reunion here. It is confidently expected that there will be at least 10,000 Elks in the city, and a number of big entertainments will be given for them and other visitors.

The State Democratic Convention, which will attract statesmen, politicians and citizens generally, will convene in this city May 13th. There will be over 700 delegates and the convention proceedings will be extremely interesting.

The Southern Literary Society has also indicated that it will meet here about the time of the festival.

The workingmen are agitating the question of repeating the great May celebration of last year and there is very little doubt that they will do it. The celebration shows a very interesting phase of life in a great city. There will also be several conventions of various business interests in Louisville during May, and there are other events in prospect that have not yet been announced.

BOXES FOR THE FESTIVAL.

The scheme for the sale of boxes for the festival has not yet been announced. It is probable, however, that a certain price will be placed upon the seats in each box, and it will then be knocked down to the highest bidder. The best boxes ought to bring big premiums

EVERY SEAT AVAILABLE.

There is not a seat in the Auditorium from which the best effects of a choral and orchestral concert can not be had. For a dramatic or operatic event it is, of course, desirable to be as close to the stage as possible, but, when there is a great volume of sound, it is considered preferable by many to be some distance from the music. The acoustics of the Auditorium are of such a character that a whisper on the stage - that is a stage whisper—can be heard in the extreme rear of the house; so it can readily be understood that every seat in the place is available for use during the May Music Festival. There are still splendid seats to be had, and now is the time to purchase them. Come and mark them off, or send in your order to the Secretary, by mail.

INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE.

The Sun Life Insurance Company
OF AMERICA.

HOME OFFICE, No. 502 W. MAIN STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Branch Offices: 580 Fourth Avenue, Louisville; Covington, Newport, Lexington, Henderson, Frankfort, Owensboro, Nashville, Knoxville, Memphis. Others being constantly opened. Agents wanted.

OFFICERS:

ALBERT S. WILLIS, President. M. W. ADAMS, Vice-President. GEO. H. LAKE, Secretary.

TELEPHONE 1093—2.
T. C. CAUMMISAR,
HEADQUARTERS FOR BROOMS
AND BROOM MAKERS' SUPPLIES,
No. 168 FOURTH AVENUE.
EXCELSIOR | For Upholsterers, Mattress and Furniture Manufacturers, Carriage Makers, Undertakers and Packing Purposes.

Grand Performance.

(Under Auspices of American Accident Co., of Louisville, Ky.)

PROGRAM.

GRAND CHORUS.

ENDORSEMENT OF THE COMPANY'S PLANS AND METHODS,
By Ten Thousand Policy Holders.

LOCAL CHORUS.

SONG OF PRAISE,
By Three Thousand Policy Holders in Louisville Alone.

HALLELUJAH.

CHORUS OF 500 CLAIMANTS
Who Have Been Paid Promptly at Sight.

QUARTET.

BY MOTHER, WIFE, WIDOW AND FATHER,
To Whom Total Losses Have Been Recently Paid.

LOUISVILLE TRUST CO.,

BACKS THIS ORGANIZATION WITH $100,000.00,
So that no Performer Need Fear Being "Stranded" on the Road, but will be Paid Promptly and Fully.

ROBT. SKENE, JR.,
SECRETARY AND GENERAL MANAGER,
No. 338 West Main Street. Louisville, Ky.

Columbia Finance and Trust Co.,

FIFTH AND MAIN STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Executors, Administrators, Trustees, Guardians, Receivers, Assignees and Financial Agents.

E. T. HALSEY, President. R. J. MENEFEE, Vice-President. W. W. HILL, Secretary.

THAT the popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra increases with each visit to a city, is attested by the Philadelphia North American in the following:

"Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded last night as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the room which the aisles afford were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking as usual like a work of art, stepped upon the stage twenty minutes late, but apparently quite dry, he faced a larger audience than he had ever before confronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, or if less efficient missionary work had preceded them, how popular these Boston Symphony Concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The third concert drew a great house, and it was supposed that the debut of Mrs. Nikisch was accountable for the increase. Vladimir de Pachmann, a great artist, but not well enough known here to have much drawing power, and who played here before to very poor 'business,' was the soloist last night, and the audience was the largest yet. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and the further fact that it comes here in its entirety. There is no thinning out to save expense. The orchestra goes on the road in its full force of eighty-three members, and that is a policy of liberality which people like."

AT BALTIMORE LAST WEEK.

The Concordia packed, and the streets lined with carriages for two blocks in every direction, show at once the appreciation of Wagner music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the need of a new and larger hall in Baltimore. A more enthusiastic audience can hardly be imagined. Every number on the program was applauded to the echo. The reception of Nikisch, as a Wagner leader, amounted to an ovation. * * * It is seldom that the three essentials of fine orchestra, fine conductor and fine soloists, are brought together. But last evening fortune came to us with both hands full—and the lovers of musical art in Baltimore are thankful.

A NIGHT WITH WAGNER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in Philadelphia last week, of which the North American relates:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its fifth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. The audience was very large. Every seat in the auditorium was occupied, and even the aisles were crowded with people who found themselves unable to secure accommodation elsewhere. As had been announced, the program consisted exclusively of selections from the operas of Richard Wagner, chronologically arranged so as to present in a very impressive and satisfying manner an exhibition of the development of Wagner's genius and the progressive elaboration of the theories upon which he worked. Naturally enough, such being the scheme, the opening number was the overture to 'Tannhauser,' of all that Wagner wrote perhaps the best known and the most generally enjoyed; and never surely has this famous composition had a more splendid and illuminative rendering. It was played with a brilliancy, with a passionate fervor, with a magnificent sonority which could not be surpassed, which transcended all previous recollections and stirred the audience to a tempest of applause. The Boston Orchestra has sometimes been criticised for a lack of breadth and vigor, for a tendency to magnify delicacy at the expense of strength, but no such criticism can be applied to last night's performance. In the exquisite 'Waldweben' movement from Siegfried the unapproachable refinement of the strings produced a delicious effect, but where breadth and strength were called for the demand was amply met, the brasses were allowed all their proper prominence, and the concert showed that Mr. Nikisch is as able and sympathetic an interpreter of Wagner as he is of the elder classics."

SMITH & NIXON'S new piano warerooms, 622 and 624 Fourth avenue, are the finest in the South, having a frontage of fifty feet on Fourth avenue, with a total depth of 150 feet, and are fitted up with elegant offices, etc. Their trade, which is now the largest in Louisville, is the direct result of selling high-grade pianos at low prices, and on reasonable terms. 1t.

NEW YORK LIFE,

ORGANIZED 1845

KENTUCKY BRANCH OFFICE,

Fourth Floor, THE COMMERCE.

BARGAINS

THIS MONTH IN

PIANOS

That have been used.

☞ CHICKERING BABY GRAND. Used at concerts only.

☞ STEINWAY PONY GRAND. Slightly used: low price, reasonable terms.

☞ KURTZMANN UPRIGHT. Slightly used; beautiful tone.

☞ THREE nearly new Uprights or other makes.

☞ FOUR Squares in good condition; very low.

☞ ALSO the largest variety of new Uprights ever offered in this city—Walnut, Mahogany and Rosewood cases; reasonable monthly or quarterly payments.

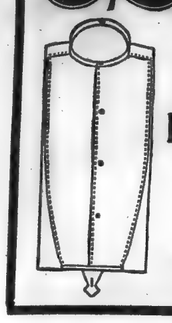
☞ A SAVING of fully $50 can be made by examining our immense stock and securing our low prices.

SMITH & NIXON,

622 and 624 FOURTH AVE.

N. Sid Platt Co.

MAKE TO ORDER THE "APOLLO YOKE" SHIRT



A FULL LINE OF MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

LATEST AND BEST.

FOURTH AND MAIN.

THE

Hegan Wall Paper Co.

Have a large selection of the newest and most artistic designs in

—: WALL PAPER. :—

We invite you to call and examine these whether you contemplate purchasing or not. We are sole agents for M. H. Birge & Sons, and Thos. Strahan & Co.'s SPECIAL DESIGNS.

Pictures and Picture Frames.

JAS. H. BASSETT, JR.
GEO. E. SNYDER.
D. W. LANE.

HON. W. B. HOKE Prest. GEO. W. GRIFFITHS, M.D., Medical Supt. W. H. MCKINLEY, Sec'y. W. T. MCCARLEY, Supt.

The Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company,

436 W. JEFFERSON STREET, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

This Company offers Life and Accident Insurance at One-Half the Rates Charged by stock companies. Policies Non-Forfeitable, and Have a Cash Surrender or Paid-Up Insurance Value after Five Years' Membership.

COST PER $1,000 FOR LIFE INSURANCE,

WITHOUT ACCIDENT BENEFITS.

Yearly Cost at age 25	$13 98	Yearly Cost at age 45	$19 86
Yearly Cost at age 30	14 82	Yearly Cost at age 50	24 84
Yearly Cost at age 35	15 96	Yearly Cost at age 55	32 46
Yearly Cost at age 40	17 40	Yearly Cost at age 60	44 00

Other Ages at Proportionate Rates. The above Amounts are Divided into Bi-Monthly Payments.

Accident Policies, $1,000 to $5,000. Preferred Occupations cost $12 per annum. Nor Hazardous occupations cost from $12 to $16 per annum. General and Local Agents wanted everywhere to represent the company, with whom liberal contracts will be made. Address

W. T. McCARLEY, Supt.

Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co.

MANUFACTURERS

WORKS AT SOUTH LOUISVILLE.

CAPACITY 35,000 WAGONS ANNUALLY.

"Old Hickory" and "Tennessee"

FARM AND FREIGHT WAGONS.

LOUISVILLE, - KENTUCKY.

...13, 1891.

...Programme at the Symphony Concert.

...evening's Symphony concert pro... was confined exclusively to selec... from Wagner's compositions, the solo... being Mme. Antonia Mielke, soprano, ... Andreas Dippel, tenor, both from ... season's New York Metropolitan ... House company.

...numbers chosen for the evening were as follows:

... "The Flying Dutchman."
...grin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
...duction to act 3, dance of apprentices, procession of master-singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
...Duet, "In Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
...fried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
...neral march, from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
...ing scene, "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Bruennhilde, Mme. Mielke.

The orchestra was increased in its membership to meet all the demands of these selections, and Mr. Nikisch had evidently given his programme a thorough preparation, despite the demands it made upon his recently restored health and strength. The results obtained were such as to warrant all the efforts made in their attainment, and the selections held the undivided attention of the audience largely by reason of the masterly interpretation given them.

The "Dutchman" overture was grandly played, and its beauties have never been more effectively brought out than on this occasion, the vivid contrasts of the composition being marvelously heightened and made immensely interesting by the reading given them.

The "Legend" from "Lohengrin" was delivered with admirable taste by Mr. Dippel, who proved to be a tenor singer well suited to the demands of the Wagnerian roles, and in these this artist showed himself a master of the vocal methods which find favor with the lovers of the German school of to-day. He has a commanding stage presence, and gained a pronounced favor of his audience by his delivery of the selection.

In the duet from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel sustained their somewhat unequal contest against the mass of instrumental players with successful results, and the triumph they won was loudly applauded by the audience, despite the unintelligible characteristics of the scene when stripped of its stage surroundings. Mme. Mielke proved to be a vocal artist of the best abilities, and her great value as a Wagnerian singer was again made apparent in the closing number of the programme, in which the music of the Bruennhilde role was sung with stirring effect by this artist.

The audience was most demonstrative in its approval of the performance of the other instrumental excerpts, and the programme, as a whole, appeared to meet the hearty approval of the Symphony patrons.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concert Saturday evening in Music Hall was devoted entirely to selections from the works of Wagner, and served to introduce to a Boston audience two of the artists of this last season's company at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York—Mme. Antonia Mielke and Andreas Dippel. This was the programme:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
Introduction to act 3, dance of apprentices, procession of master-singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet, "In Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral march, from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Closing scene, "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Bruennhilde, Mme. Mielke.

One of the greatest audiences of the season was present to listen to a performance of this programme, and a larger share than usual of the people remained until the close. The enthusiasm which prevailed throughout the evening must have been encouraging to Conductor Nikisch, who had arranged and carefully rehearsed this Wagner programme. We do not recall an instance this season where the applause has been so hearty and long continued as at the rendition of "Siegfried's passage, the Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey." Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments so many times that he finally turned and waved his hand toward the members of the band, signifying that the plaudits of the audience were due to them as much as to himself. It was a generous recognition on his part of the most excellent work of the orchestra. The selections, as will be seen, were not what are known as the popular Wagner numbers, and the fact that they were so enthusiastically received shows that the people, after all that has been said, are fond of his music, and every hearing of it confirms and strengthens the loyalty of the Music Hall audiences to the works of Wagner.

The soloists, who have been singing Wagner's music largely the past season, gave efficient aid in the selections where vocal assistance was needed. Both were pleasantly received, and the duo from "Goetterdaemmerung" created great enthusiasm, both singers being recalled many times in succession. Frau Mielke's voice is resonant, true and powerful on the high notes. She made her first appearance in New York as Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," and her singing there increased as the season advanced. In dramatic power and coloring she showed amply competent for the difficult parts she essayed Saturday evening. In the tenor and soprano duo Dippel was a substantial aid. His voice seems fresh and true, it is not forced in high and his delivery of the "Legend" was marked of purity and sweetness. The reading of the "Funeral March" by Mr. Nikisch was a fine performance, but in such a concert there is no room to criticise, for our conductor is a masterfully able interpreter of Wagner. There are only two more concerts. Next Saturday evening Miss Marie Jahn, another of the artists from the Metropolitan Opera House, is to be the soloist, and Schumann's symphony in D minor is among the pieces to be played.

Notes.

Mr. Heinrich, who was present at the Friday afternoon rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra for the first time since Mr. Nikisch has been conductor, was very enthusiastic. He says the playing is perfection. There is no such ...

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1891.

The Symphony Concert—A Wagner Evening—Mielke and Dippel the Soloists.

Wagner is still a name to conjure with in Boston, and because of the many lectures, essays and reviews devoted to the subject, is becoming more than a mere fashion, being in some degree intelligently understood and appreciated. A "Wagner night" in the symphony course was sufficient to fill Music Hall to overflowing, and very few, even of the many who were obliged to stand, left the hall before the last note of the long programme was reached. The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" began the concert; the fact that Wagner renounced this overture as not representing his theories does not make it the less brilliant or inspiring. It is the perfection of sea music, and its gloom and foreboding contrast well with the freedom and cheeriness of its sailor themes. It received a brilliant reading and was applauded most heartily. Now followed Mr. Dippel with "Lohengrin's Legend," given in splendid style, although the violins were somewhat insecure in the extremely high passages which Wagner has used to portray celestial effects.

Such a concert as that of Saturday may not present the composer as effectively as could be done on the operatic stage, but certainly it gives the best possible idea of his versatility. The graphic sea picture followed by an equally expressive portrayal of celestial ecstacy, and this in turn succeeded by the roughness and hearty humor, the pomp and circumstance of mediæval times as depicted in the prelude to the third act of the "Mastersingers," and as culmination to these differing moods the funeral march from "Die Götterdammerung" and the heroic final to that work, these prove a mind as many sided, as all-embracing as that of a Shakespeare, and no single opera by Wagner could impress this so forcibly upon the auditor. The "Mastersinger" prelude was broadly and heartily played, and the swing of that wonderful seven-barred period which forms the dance of the apprentices was as full of animal spirits as a mediæval merry-making ought to be. The next number of the rich list was the duet picturing the hero Siegfried starting upon the journey which led to his death. The music here is too intense for concert accessories, and a Siegfried in a dress coat and white tie parting from a Brunnhilde in a long trained evening costume is just a trifle anomalous. Yet the singing was powerful and earnest, and if Mme. Mielke was more explosive and less sustained than a Lilli Lehmann would have been, the power of the deep notes of her register was remarkable, and the broad ending was grandly enough given to win for both the artists (Mr. Dippel being the Siegfried) the most enthusiastic recalls.

The rest of the programme was especially well arranged, for it led consecutively through the Rhine journey to the Siegfried Funeral March, and culminated in the finale of the trilogy. The arrangement by Richter of the chief events in the last act of "Siegfried" and the first part of "Die Götterdammerung" has been heard here before; it tells a wonderful story in a wonderful manner, and its interweaving of figures, each having some special import, some meaning of its own, makes it a great example of combined intellectuality and emotion. There are those who believe that the leit-motif as used by Wagner will pass out of modern music, yet such a tale as that above mentioned, told by orchestra alone, would be impossible without it, and the life history narrated by the same instrumental forces in Siegfried's Funeral March may forever stand as a raison d'etre for this part of Wagner's theories. There is, however, a danger that those who study Wagner's works superficially may imagine the employment of the guiding figures to be the chief feature of his theories of operatic construction, and indeed too many of the recent lecturers have elevated the definition of these into disproportionate prominence. It may not be amiss, in view of the forthcoming performance of "Parsifal," to warn the over zealous ones that, while a thorough recognition of the figures is desirable, they must not be sought for at the expense of the ethical significance of the work, and must not be followed guide book in hand, as a Cook's tourist might pass through a foreign land, losing all the beauty of scenery in the acquisition of catalogic information.

The Siegfried funeral march is the most notable example of the definiteness of these figures, and here they come legitimately into the foreground, while in the great finale which succeeds they fulfil but the functions of the old Greek chorus as employed by Aeschylus, or Sophocles. No funeral march can exceed this one in graphic power. The one in the Heroic symphony has been called "a funeral procession in purple" and it has pathos and dignity, the one for piano (the best of its class) by Chopin has gloom enough and a noble contrast in that trio which seems like a song at the grave, but this march has these qualities with its story superadded, and is therefore still more powerful. While all the concert deserved praise for its careful execution and its musicianly readings, a slight exception may be made as to this selection, which was too blatant and bombastic in many parts. It gave braggadocio in place of heroism. Special mention may be made here, however, of the excellent work of the bass tuba as well as of the trumpets. The end, too, with its melancholy reference to Siegfried's horn call, was finely played by all.

The concert ended with that great monologue of Brunnhilde, the most impressive of operatic finales, and splendidly sung too by Mme. Mielke, who was recalled at its close by an audience which lingered to pay this deserved compliment spite of the lateness of the hour. Here, too, the orchestra did excellent work and the wealth of significant figures never seemed blurred or incomprehensible, but rather a natural outpouring of memories quite in place at such a supreme moment. After such a finale there is no fear of our composers returning to the old plan of having the chorus stand in a line and explode a series of exclamations of "O Cielo!" "Oh Dio!" "Qual Orrore!" and other shocked expressions scarcely in consonance with the vacuity of their looks and the rigidity of their postures, while the curtain falls.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

...Post.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Mr. Nikisch appeared upon the stage last Saturday evening to direct the Symphony Orchestra, at the twenty-second concert of this season, he was greeted with loud and prolonged applause. The programme was made up of selections from operas of Wagner, and the selections were as follows:

Overture.....“The Flying Dutchman”
Lohengrin’s Legend, from “Lohengrin.”...Mr. Dippel
Introduction to Act III. Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Master-singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs from “Die Meistersinger.”
Duet. “In Neuen Thaten,” from “Die Götterdämerung.....Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Dippel
“Siegfried’s Passage to Brünnhilde’s Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey,” from “Siegfried” and Die Götterdämmerung.” Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral March, from “Die Götterdämmerung.”
Closing Scene, “Die Götterdämmerung.”..Mrs. Mielke

Many devout and sincere worshippers of Wagner protest against arrangements of “music-drama” scenes for concert use. They claim that the text and the music, the action and the scenery, the costumes, and even the habits of the Bayreuth Theatre are so inseparably bound together that only in the dull Bavarian town can the greatness of Wagner’s works be fully or partially comprehended. How, they say, can one judge of the beauty of the “Feuerzauber” or the power of the “Walkürenritt,” if either of these numbers enters irrelevantly into a programme, and is sandwiched betwtee, say, the “Lohengrin” prelude and the march from “Tannhäuser?” Who can consider fully the grandeur and beauty of his later works, if they are heard only in fragments in a concert-hall, with orchestra upon the stage and in the glare of artificial light? They claim that many of these concert arrangements are in direct conflict with the wish of “the Master” (as they are pleased to call him), and are a profanation of his life work and of his memory.

On the other hand, certain admirers of Wagner, men who in propagandism of Wagnerian tenets indorse the motto of Loyola’s order, insist that this gospel shall be preached in all parts of the world, and that even disjointed texts, stripped of sense by the loss of that which precedes and follows, may be of saving health to all nations. Some of them are shrewd enough to see that the cause may in this way win converts, who, hearing only excerpts gorgeous in instrumentation, will judge the whole by the part and will cry aloud “Would that we could hear these music-dramas in their completeness;” for they do not know that the passages that so excite their nerves are only short and brilliant chapters of an otherwise sleep-inducing volume.

After all, these questions interest chiefly the camp-followers of the army under Wagner; such men as the German writers of pamphlets in which symbolical meanings of unimportant measures are discussed at length, and with a profundity that is ludicrous. The audience cares not for such problems. The habitual concert goer listens to the music and thinks of it as music. If he is pleased, he applauds; if he is secretly bored, he is too well-bred to express his feelings, and he assumes an outward appearance of intelligent interest.

Now, Saturday evening the audience was very enthusiastic. The different numbers of the programme were wildly applauded, and Mr. Nikisch was obliged again and again to bow his acknowledgments. There is no question about the genuineness of this enthusiasm, nor was it, so far as the playing of the orchestra was concerned, without excuse. Mr. Nikisch stood upon his proper ground. The peculiar qualities of his musical outfit were apparent and they were here displayed legitimately.

These selections from Wagner’s music-dramas gave pleasure to the audience and put the conductor upon a pedestal. To speak at length concerning the music itself would at this time serve no useful purpose. Nor would it be profitable to enter into a discussion as to whether such music should be played at concerts to which the word “symphony” is prefixed. The glowing colors, the orchestral crash and roar pleased the hearers. Their appetites grew with each number more imperious in demand, as is the case in dram-drinking.

We are too near Wagner to judge of his real position in the world of music. No thoughtful man denies the great personality of Wagner. Whether a hundred years from now he will be known chiefly as an influence and not as the composer of this or that music-drama, is a question of little moment to the hearer of today, who cares more for the gratification of his tastes than for theories concerning opera-writing or for charts showing the growth of music. If he really prefers extracts from Wagner’s works to the G minor symphony of Mozart or the “Unfinished” of Schubert, and if he applauds with delirious delight the former and treats the latter with conventional respect, he will not change his opinions in consequence of arguments. A hundred may admire Hans Makart’s gaudy canvases and only one may hold Puvis de Chavannes in reverence. These questions, however, are not to be settled by comparative degrees of applause. Time, the avenger, will pronounce the verdict, when future generations will argue concerning the true or false genius of the most prominent musician of their time, and when Wagner may be ranked among the great musicians of the world—not the greatest, and not the only one.

The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor. Mr. Dippel declaimed “Lohengrin’s Legend” with stolidity and precision. Mrs. Mielke has a better and freer voice and a keener sense of intonation than many of her German sisters who have been of late years imported into this country. But the peculiar theories of Wagner in regard to the relations that should exist between orchestra and singers, as worked out in the music declaimed by her, prevent any extended criticism of her vocal powers or limitations.

The programme of the concert of April 18 will include Schumann’s “Genoveva” overture; the adagio and scherzo from Bruckner’s Seventh symphony; and Schumann’s symphony in D minor. Miss Marie Jahn will sing the well known aria from “Der Freischütz,” and songs with pianoforte accompaniment.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday ...

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1891.

WAGNER MUSIC.

Only Works by the German Master Played at Yesterday's Symphony.

The programme offered at the last but two of this season's symphony concerts proved a special treat to the admirers of Richard Wagner, for all the selections were from writings by that composer. It is not probable that such a programme proved welcome to all in the audience, but the Wagner devotees were most demonstrative in expressing their delight and the attendance was larger than for several weeks past. Exceedingly cordial was the greeting Conductor Nikisch received when he appeared to direct the orchestra. Aside from extreme paleness he showed no signs of his recent illness.

"The Flying Dutchman" overture was given as the first of seven numbers. The beautiful harmonic effects and striking tonal pictures of this superb work were magnificently set forth. Delightful also was the orchestral performance of the selection from "Die Meistersinger." The four pieces chosen were from the third act of that opera, and consisted of the introduction to the act, dance of the apprentices, procession of the masters and homage to Hans Sachs. Thoroughly impressive was the funeral march from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," as read by Mr. Nikisch. "Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," arranged by Hans Richter, was the fourth orchestral contribution.

The two soloists were Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel. They are artists of recognized merit and have won high honors in New York productions of German opera. Mme. Mielke sang Bruennhilde's solo in the closing scene of "Die Goetterdaemmerung," with splendid power and admirable expression. She is a singer of uncommon resources and is particularly well equipped for interpreting music of the exacting Wagner school. Mr. Dippel made a very favorable impression by his singing of the legend from "Lohengrin." The selection itself was welcome as being in pleasing contrast with the heavier music of the trilogy so prominent on the programme. The duet "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" called forth the most cordial plaudits of the evening.

Miss Marie Jahn is announced as soloist at the next Symphony concert. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; aria from Freischuetz, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," Weber; Adagio and Scherzo from the symphony No. 7, Bruckner; songs with piano; symphony in D minor, Schumann.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12.

"En Passant."

[FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.]

NO. LI.

BOSTON, April 9th, 1891.

The illness of Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave Mr. Kneisel a chance to show his metal in a new direction, and nobly did he rise to the occasion. Many musical men and women unite in saying that the orchestra has not played so well for some months as it did under Kneisel's baton. There was a little stiffness and awkwardness in Mr. Kneisel's movements, but more familiarity with the position would give him ease, if not grace. It has been suggested that it would have been an interesting experiment to have allowed the orchestra to have played without a leader, and there is little doubt but that our local organization would have come off from such a test with flying colors. It would surely have been an entertaining exhibition, and the well drilled corps would probably, when left to their own resources, have played better than they do when entrusted to some of our local conductors' care. It must be a relief to Col. Higginson to find that he has such an admirable conductor in reserve as Mr. Kneisel proved to be, ready at any moment, as understudy, to step into the breech.

* * * * * * * * *

[125]

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, APRIL 12, 1891.

A Wagner Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Last evening's Symphony concert programme was confined exclusively to selections from Wagner's compositions, the soloists being Mme. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor, both from the last season's New York Metropolitan Opera House company.

The numbers chosen for the evening were as follows:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
Introduction to act 3, dance of apprentices, procession of master-singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet, "In Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral march, from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Closing scene, "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Bruennhilde, Mme. Mielke.

The orchestra was increased in its membership to meet all the demands of these selections, and Mr. Nikisch had evidently given the programme a thorough preparation, despite the demands it made upon his recently recovered health and strength. The results attained were such as to warrant all the efforts made in their attainment, and the selections held the undivided attention of the audience largely by reason of the masterly interpretation given them.

The "Dutchman" overture was grandly played, and its beauties have never been more effectively brought out than on this occasion, the vivid contrasts of the composition being judiciously heightened and made immensely interesting by the reading given them.

The "Legend" from "Lohengrin" was declaimed with admirable taste by Mr. Dippel, who proved to be a tenor singer well suited to the demands of the Wagnerian roles, and in its use this artist showed himself a master of the vocal methods which find favor with the lovers of the German school of today. He has a commanding stage presence, and gained the pronounced favor of his audience by his delivery of the selection.

In the duet from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel sustained their somewhat unequal contest against the mass of instrumental players with successful results, and the triumph they won was loudly applauded by the audience, despite the unintelligible characteristics of the scene when stripped of its stage surroundings. Mme. Mielke proved to be a vocal artist of the best abilities, and her great value as a Wagnerian singer was again made apparent in the closing number of the programme, in which the music of the Bruennhilde role was sung with stirring effect by this artist.

The audience was most demonstrative in its approval of the performance of the other instrumental excerpts, and the programme, as a whole, appeared to meet the hearty approval of the Symphony patrons.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1891.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concert Saturday evening in Music Hall was devoted entirely to selections from the works of Wagner, and served to introduce to a Boston audience two of the artists of this last season's company at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York—Mme. Antonia Mielke and Andreas Dippel. This was the programme:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
Introduction to act 3, dance of apprentices, procession of master singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet, "In Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral march, from "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Closing scene, "Die Goetterdaemmerung."
Bruennhilde, Mme. Mielke.

One of the greatest audiences of the season was present to listen to a performance of this programme, and a larger share than usual of the people remained until the close. The enthusiasm which prevailed throughout the evening must have been encouraging to Conductor Nikisch, who had arranged and carefully rehearsed this Wagner programme. We do not recall an instance this season where the applause has been so hearty and long continued as after the rendition of "Siegfried's passage, the Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey." Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments so many times that he finally turned and waved his hand toward the members of the band, signifying that the plaudits of the audience were due to them as much as to himself. It was a generous recognition on his part of the most excellent work of the orchestra. The selections, as will be seen, were not what are known as the popular Wagner numbers, and the fact that they were so enthusiastically received shows that the people, after all that has been said, are fond of his music, and every hearing of it confirms and strengthens the loyalty of the Music Hall audiences to the works of Wagner.

The soloists, who have been singing Wagner's music largely the past season, gave efficient aid in the selections where vocal assistance was needed. Both were pleasantly received, and the duo from "Goetterdaemmerung" created great enthusiasm, both singers being recalled many times in succession. Frau Mielke's voice is resonant, true and powerful on the high notes. She made her first appearance in New York as Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," and her popularity there increased as the season advanced. In dramatic power and coloring she appeared amply competent for the difficult numbers she essayed Saturday evening, and in the tenor and soprano duo Mr. Dippel was a substantial aid. His voice seems fresh and true, it is not forced or harsh and his delivery of the "Legend" was a marvel of purity and sweetness. The reading of the "Funeral March" by Mr. Nikisch was a grand performance, but in such a concert there is little to criticise, for our conductor is a specially able interpreter of Wagner. There are but two more concerts. Next Saturday evening Miss Marie Jahn, another of the artists from the Metropolitan Opera House, is to be the soloist, and Schumann's symphony in D minor is among the numbers to be played.

Notes.

Max Heinrich, who was present at the Friday afternoon rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra for the first time since Mr. Nikisch has been the conductor, was very enthusiastic. He says "the playing is perfection. There is no such orchestra in all Europe."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 13, 1891.

The Symphony Concert—A Wagner Evening—Mielke and Dippel the Soloists.

Wagner is still a name to conjure with in Boston, and because of the many lectures, essays and reviews devoted to the subject, is becoming more than a mere fashion, being in some degree intelligently understood and appreciated. A "Wagner night" in the symphony course was sufficient to fill Music Hall to overflowing, and very few, even of the many who were obliged to stand, left the hall before the last note of the long programme was reached. The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" began the concert; the fact that Wagner renounced this overture as not representing his theories does not make it the less brilliant or inspiring. It is the perfection of sea music, and its gloom and foreboding contrast well with the freedom and cheeriness of its sailor themes. It received a brilliant reading and was applauded most heartily. Now followed Mr. Dippel with "Lohengrin's Legend," given in splendid style, although the violins were somewhat insecure in the extremely high passages which Wagner has used to portray celestial effects.

Such a concert as that of Saturday may not present the composer as effectively as could be done on the operatic stage, but certainly it gives the best possible idea of his versatility. The graphic sea picture followed by an equally expressive portrayal of celestial ecstacy, and this in turn succeeded by the roughness and hearty humor, the pomp and circumstance of mediæval times as depicted in the prelude to the third act of the "Mastersingers," and as culmination to these differing moods the funeral march from "Die Götterdammerung" and the heroic final to that work, these prove a mind as many sided, as all-embracing as that of a Shakespeare, and no single opera by Wagner could impress this so forcibly upon the auditor. The "Mastersinger" prelude was broadly and heartily played, and the swing of that wonderful seven-barred period which forms the dance of the apprentices was as full of animal spirits as a mediæval merry-making ought to be. The next number of the rich list was the duet picturing the hero Siegfried starting upon the journey which led to his death. The music here is too intense for concert accessories, and a Siegfried in a dress coat and white tie parting from a Brunnhilde in a long trained evening costume is just a trifle anomalous. Yet the singing was powerful and earnest, and if Mme. Mielke was more explosive and less sustained than a Lilli Lehmann would have been, the power of the deep notes of her register was remarkable, and the broad ending was grandly enough given to win for both the artists (Mr. Dippel being the Siegfried) the most enthusiastic recalls.

The rest of the programme was especially well arranged, for it led consecutively through the Rhine journey to the Siegfried Funeral March, and culminated in the finale of the trilogy. The arrangement by Richter of the chief events in the last act of "Siegfried" and the first part of "Die Götterdammerung" has been heard here before; it tells a wonderful story in a wonderful manner, and its interweaving of figures, each having some special import, some meaning of its own, makes it a great example of combined intellectuality and emotion. There are those who believe that the leit-motif as used by Wagner will pass out of modern music, yet such a tale as that above mentioned, told by orchestra alone, would be impossible without it, and the life history narrated by the same instrumental forces in Siegfried's Funeral March may forever stand as a raison d'etre for this part of Wagner's theories. There is, however, a danger that those who study Wagner's works superficially may imagine the employment of the guiding figures to be the chief feature of his theories of operatic construction, and indeed too many of the recent lecturers have elevated the definition of these into disproportionate prominence. It may not be amiss, in view of the forthcoming performance of "Parsifal," to warn the over zealous ones that, while a thorough recognition of the figures is desirable, they must not be sought for at the expense of the ethical significance of the work, and must not be followed guide book in hand, as a Cook's tourist might pass through a foreign land, losing all the beauty of scenery in the acquisition of catalogic information.

The Siegfried funeral march is the most notable example of the definiteness of these figures, and here they come legitimately into the foreground, while in the great finale which succeeds they fulfil but the functions of the old Greek chorus as employed by Aeschylus, or Sophocles. No funeral march can exceed this one in graphic power. The one in the Heroic symphony has been called "a funeral procession in purple" and it has pathos and dignity, the one for piano (the best of its class) by Chopin has gloom enough and a noble contrast in that trio which seems like a song at the grave, but this march has these qualities with its story superadded, and is therefore still more powerful. While all the concert deserved praise for its careful execution and its musicianly readings, a slight exception may be made as to this selection, which was too blatant and bombastic in many parts. It gave braggadocio in place of heroism. Special mention may be made here, however, of the excellent work of the bass tuba as well as of the trumpets. The end, too, with its melancholy reference to Siegfried's horn call, was finely played by all.

The concert ended with that great monologue of Brunnhilde, the most impressive of operatic finales, and splendidly sung too by Mme. Mielke, who was recalled at its close by an audience which lingered to pay this deserved compliment spite of the lateness of the hour. Here, too, the orchestra did excellent work and the wealth of significant figures never seemed blurred or incomprehensible, but rather a natural outpouring of memories quite in place at such a supreme moment. After such a finale there is no fear of our composers returning to the old plan of having the chorus stand in a line and explode a series of exclamations of "O Cielo!" "Oh Dio!" "Qual Orrore!" and other shocked expressions scarcely in consonance with the vacuity of their looks and the rigidity of their postures, while the curtain falls.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Mr. Nikisch appeared upon the stage last Saturday evening to direct the Symphony Orchestra, at the twenty-second concert of this season, he was greeted with loud and prolonged applause. The programme was made up of selections from operas of Wagner, and the selections were as follows:

Overture......"The Flying Dutchman"
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."...Mr. Dippel
Introduction to Act III. Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Master-singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet. "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Götterdämerung.....Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Dippel
"Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Götterdämmerung." Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral March, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Closing Scene, "Die Götterdämmerung."..Mrs. Mielke

Many devout and sincere worshippers of Wagner protest against arrangements of "music-drama" scenes for concert use. They claim that the text and the music, the action and the scenery, the costumes, and even the habits of the Bayreuth Theatre are so inseparably bound together that only in the dull Bavarian town can the greatness of Wagner's works be fully or partially comprehended. How, they say, can one judge of the beauty of the "Feuerzauber" or the power of the "Walkürenritt," if either of these numbers enters irrelevantly into a programme, and is sandwiched betwten, say, the "Lohengrin" prelude and the march from "Tannhäuser?" Who can consider fully the grandeur and beauty of his later works, if they are heard only in fragments in a concert-hall, with orchestra upon the stage and in the glare of artificial light? They claim that many of these concert arrangements are in direct conflict with the wish of "the Master" (as they are pleased to call him), and are a profanation of his life work and of his memory.

On the other hand, certain admirers of Wagner, men who in propagandism of Wagnerian tenets, indorse the motto of Loyola's order, insist that this gospel shall be preached in all parts of the world, and that even disjointed texts, stripped of sense by the loss of that which precedes and follows, may be of saving health to all nations. Some of them are shrewd enough to see that the cause may in this way win converts, who, hearing only excerpts gorgeous in instrumentation, will judge the whole by the part and will cry aloud "Would that we could hear these music-dramas in their completeness;" for they do not know that the passages that so excite their nerves are only short and brilliant chapters of an otherwise sleep-inducing volume.

After all, these questions interest chiefly the camp-followers of the army under Wagner; such men as the German writers of pamphlets in which symbolical meanings of unimportant measures are discussed at length, and with a profundity that is ludicrous. The audience cares not for such problems. The habitual concert goer listens to the music and thinks of it as music. If he is pleased, he applauds; if he is secretly bored, he is too well-bred to express his feelings, and he assumes an outward appearance of intelligent interest.

Now, Saturday evening the audience was very enthusiastic. The different numbers of the programme were wildly applauded, and Mr. Nikisch was obliged again and again to bow his acknowledgments. There is no question about the genuineness of this enthusiasm, nor was it, so far as the playing of the orchestra was concerned, without excuse. Mr. Nikisch stood upon his proper ground. The peculiar qualities of his musical outfit were apparent and they were here displayed legitimately. These selections from Wagner's music-dramas gave pleasure to the audience and put the conductor upon a pedestal. To speak at length concerning the music itself would at this time serve no useful purpose. Nor would it be profitable to enter into a discussion as to whether such music should be played at concerts to which the word "symphony" is prefixed. The glowing colors, the orchestral crash and roar pleased the hearers. Their appetites grew with each number more imperious in demand, as is the case in dram-drinking.

We are too near Wagner to judge of his real position in the world of music. No thoughtful man denies the great personality of Wagner. Whether a hundred years from now he will be known chiefly as an influence and not as the composer of this or that music-drama, is a question of little moment to the hearer of today, who cares more for the gratification of his tastes than for theories concerning opera-writing or for charts showing the growth of music. If he really prefers extracts from Wagner's works to the G minor symphony of Mozart or the "Unfinished" of Schubert, and if he applauds with delirious delight the former and treats the latter with conventional respect, he will not change his opinions in consequence of arguments. A hundred may admire Hans Makart's gaudy canvases and only one may hold Purvis de Chavannes in reverence. These questions, however, are not to be settled by comparative degrees of applause. Time, the avenger, will pronounce the verdict, when future generations will argue concerning the true or false genius of the most prominent musician of their time, and when Wagner may be ranked among the great musicians of the world—not the greatest, and not the only one.

The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor. Mr. Dippel declaimed "Lohengrin's Legend" with stolidity and precision. Mrs. Mielke has a better and freer voice and a keener sense of intonation than many of her German sisters who have been of late years imported into this country. But the peculiar theories of Wagner in regard to the relations that should exist between orchestra and singers, as worked out in the music declaimed by her, prevent any extended criticism of her vocal powers or limitations.

The programme of the concert of April 18 will include Schumann's "Genoveva" overture; the adagio and scherzo from Bruckner's Seventh symphony; and Schumann's symphony in D minor. Miss Marie Jahn will sing the well known aria from "Der Freischütz," and songs with pianoforte accompaniment.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.
SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1891.

WAGNER MUSIC.

Only Works by the German Master Played at Yesterday's Symphony.

The programme offered at the last but two of this season's symphony concerts proved a special treat to the admirers of Richard Wagner, for all the selections were from writings by that composer. It is not probable that such a programme proved welcome to all in the audience, but the Wagner devotees were most demonstrative in expressing their delight and the attendance was larger than for several weeks past. Exceedingly cordial was the greeting Conductor Nikisch received when he appeared to direct the orchestra. Aside from extreme paleness he showed no signs of his recent illness.

"The Flying Dutchman" overture was given as the first of seven numbers. The beautiful harmonic effects and striking tonal pictures of this superb work were magnificently set forth. Delightful also was the orchestral performance of the selection from "Die Meistersinger." The four pieces chosen were from the third act of that opera, and consisted of the introduction to the act, dance of the apprentices, procession of the masters and homage to Hans Sachs. Thoroughly impressive was the funeral march from "Die Gœtterdæmmerung," as read by Mr. Nikisch. "Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gœtterdæmmerung," arranged by Hans Richter, was the fourth orchestral contribution.

The two soloists were Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Andreas Dippel. They are artists of recognized merit and have won high honors in New York productions of German opera. Mme. Mielke sang Bruennhilde's solo in the closing scene of "Die Gœtterdæmmerung," with splendid power and admirable expression. She is a singer of uncommon resources and is particularly well equipped for interpreting music of the exacting Wagner school. Mr. Dippel made a very favorable impression by his singing of the legend from "Lohengrin." The selection itself was welcome as being in pleasing contrast with the heavier music of the triology so prominent on the programme. The duet "In Neuen Thaters," from "Die Gœtterdæmmerung" called forth the most cordial plaudits of the evening.

Miss Marie Jahn is announced as soloist at the next Symphony concert. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; aria from Freischuetz, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," Weber; Adagio and Scherzo from the symphony No. 7, Bruckner; songs with piano; symphony in D minor, Schumann.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12.

"En Passant."

[FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.]

NO LI.

BOSTON, April 9th, 1891.

The illness of Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave Mr. Kneisel a chance to show his metal in a new direction, and nobly did he rise to the occasion. Many musical men and women unite in saying that the orchestra has not played so well for some months as it did under Kneisel's baton. There was a little stiffness and awkwardness in Mr. Kneisel's movements, but more familiarity with the position would give him ease, if not grace. It has been suggested that it would have been an interesting experiment to have allowed the orchestra to have played without a leader, and there is little doubt but that our local organization would have come off from such a test with flying colors. It would surely have been an entertaining exhibition, and the well drilled corps would probably, when left to their own resources, have played better than they do when entrusted to some of our local conductors' care. It must be a relief to Col. Higginson to find that he has such an admirable conductor in reserve as Mr. Kneisel proved to be, ready at any moment, as understudy, to step into the breech.

* * * * * * * *

[125]

...ton Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1891.

Twenty-Second Symphony Concert (without Symphony.)

The concert of Saturday evening, catching the fever of the week, was quite exceptional. Wagner engrossed the whole programme. This in advance of Mr. Lang's "private performance" of all the music of "Parsifal" with no Graal Burg, nor Dome, nor reverend warder knights nor magic gardens, flower girls, sacred spear caught in the air by the "pure fool" of destiny, no wooded mountain scenery, nor gorgeous costumes; but only chorus, orchestra and solo singers or declaimers, with a swarm of eager Wagner lecturers in advance. Here is the programme made up and conducted con amore by Mr. Nikisch, novel in comparison with the usual Wagner concert programmes:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
From "Die Meistersinger": Introduction to Act III.; Dance of Apprentices; Procession of Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs.
Duet: "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried," and "Die Götterdämmerung." (Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Funeral March, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Closing Scene, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Brünnhilde—Mme. Antonia Mielke.
Lohengrin... } Mr. Andreas Dippel.
Siegfried... }

There was a great audience, great expectation; the orchestra was in its best estate; the excellent conductor loved the music, and was prepared to throw his whole soul into it and into every instrument. It was a most careful, true, superb performance, seemingly spontaneous. The "Dutchman" overture, with the mysterious hollow-sounding fifths in its sea-trumpet, was as wild and weird, as brilliant and exciting, as we ever heard it. Mr. Dippel has a good manly tenor, and a manly bearing; he seems very young. He delivered Lohengrin's recital about the Knights of the Holy Grail at Monsalvat, his father Percival (or Parsifal), etc., in a composed and dignified manner, in keeping with the music, which is one of the few Wagner passages in which we find the sovereign virtue of repose, an element, a quality, which lies near the soul and centre of true art in all kinds. (Thus "Macbeth," while tragical and stormy, has repose; Beethoven, so full of fire and strength and struggle, always leaves a sense of peace and reconciliation in the mind).

The next selection, from the "Meistersinger," was a happy one. The introduction was very slow and serious and quiet and somewhat monotonous, as if it needed the picturesque procession before the eye to keep the impression vivid for such length of time. When the boys (apprentices) rush in with fun and frolic, dancing to the saucy, piquant staccato of clarinet, etc., the effect is very pretty, very lifesome. We welcome our good wise friend Hans Sachs, in the homage paid to him, but here again the strain grows wearisome. This number was all admirably played. And throughout this and all the rest there was an eloquence in the spontaneous gesture of Arthur Nikisch, which enhanced the value of his beat.

The Duet, at parting, of the lovers at the beginning of the "Götterdämmerung," when Siegfried gallops Rhineward from Brünnhilde's rock in search of "new adventures," has poetry and passion in it; but it does seem as if Wagner were on principle (if not through wilfulness) afraid of melody in it, for nothing could be dryer, colder and more artificial than the—strains we cannot call them—phrases, "endless melody" perhaps, which each one sings, or rather say delivers. They were well delivered, for Mme. Mielke also has a noble voice and knows well how to use it, besides a noble figure, a fine bearing, and calm self-possession. The orchestral environment is rich, with far more melody woven into it than we get in the voice parts. But here again we meet our old disturbing enemy in the Wagnerian instrumentation, that restless, feverish, uneasy, swarming, squirming and bewildering movement—what some call Wagner's "polyphony,"—which robs the nerves and feelings of all repose such as one naturally expects in art, in all that is ideal.

The excerpts arranged by Richter from "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung" made up the richest number of the programme. There was in it more of contrast, more of depth, appealing to deep feelings, more that held the general sympathy, more of mingled beauties both of melodic phrase, of harmony and of tone-color, impassioned accent, wealth of reminiscence and anticipation, than perhaps in any other piece. And it was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. People were carried away by it; there was pathos in the half conscious murmuring applause. Yet suffer a heretic and sceptic to put in one more negation, to confess one more drawback which he does not find it easy to get over. So many Leitmotiven lift their heads so often in the seething instrumental whirlpool, that it would really be fun to shoot some of them as they pop up; for, musically, what are they but interlippers? In the marvellous execution of these pieces, Mr. Nikisch seemed to transfuse his own feeling and conception into every member of the orchestra, giving a signal instance of the process of "thought transference," which is so much talked about. Go on, play everything so well, and almost thou persuadest us to be a Wagnerite!

We have never found the "Funeral March" of Siegfried (which is really no march at all—it hardly moves) so superlatively great above all strains of funeral music, as it is the fashion of the day to call this imposing piece of Wagner. It is solemn and profound, more through the agglomeration of deep and sombre instruments, than through the intrinsically imaginative quality and novelty of its musical ideas. It does suggest a people weighed to earth by a great grief. It is intensely mournful; but does it compare in musical originality, in beauty and sublimity of thought, in depth of feeling, in wealth of imagination, or in the sense of edification and uplifting after you have heard it, with Beethoven's Marcia Funebre in the Heroic Symphony? Yet we willingly confess that we never had before heard it when it sounded quite so impressive as it did this time.

The closing scene from the "Ring of the Nibelung" tetralogy was mainly solo for Mme. Mielke. It was the scene in which Mme. Lili Lehmann-Kalisch, in the German opera last year, gave us that astounding feat of what may be called Wagnerian musical shouting; singing it cannot be. Lehmann had the superb voice which could compete against the whole weight of the orchestra; she had the art of producing [illegible] her grand tones in the [illegible]

A word more on the Wagner orchestration generally. We hope we do not harp too much upon a feeling which it gives us and which the best performance does not overcome. We have felt constrained to call his harmony, his instrumentation, overfull and bloated, swollen out of beautiful and healthy symmetry and shape. Look at a youthful face in the temperate estate of innocence and health. See the same after years of excessive indulgence, the veins too full of blood, the vesicles crowded with bad humors, the features sunken and distorted. Mark the contrast of the two. The instrumentation of Beethoven, of Mozart, Mendelssohn, all the greatest masters, is like that fresh, pure, lovely face; that of Wagner, overcrowded in harmony, overloaded with huge instruments (a contra-bass for every family), and all this superfluity aggravated by the struggling, squirming, restless knots of little phrases and melodic figures, may astonish, but does it yield increase of beauty? Would it not be truer if it were simpler and less crowded? Has it the lifesome and uplifting virtue that inspires you in a symphony of Beethoven? Think of the first sound in his cheerful No. 8! You may tell us that we are behind the age. It may be, and so be it! This modern tendency in music is perhaps part and parcel of the whole fast tendency of our time. Perhaps it is a corresponding manifestation of what appears in the craze of "rapid transit," the impatient meddling with electricity, the building skyward where ground area is limited, and a thousand more ambitious schemes (especially among political adventurers) to "hurry God!" Yet we cannot help believing that the soul of man enjoys a sweeter consciousness in leading a more simple, quiet, temperate, abstemious, intellectual, self-respecting, mutually helpful life.

Next Saturday's concert invites us to a hearing of Schumann's beautiful "Genoveva" overture; Weber's "Freyschütz" scena: "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," to be sung by Miss Marie Jahn; the Adagio and Scherzo from Bruckner's seventh symphony; songs with piano; and Schumann's D minor symphony. J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1891.

A Wagner Programme at the Symphony.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was devoted to Wagner. This programme was performed, the sololists being Mme. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andréas Dippel, tenor, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
Introduction to Act Three, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Master-Singers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet, "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"Siegfreid's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral march, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Closing scene, "Die Götterdämmerung."
Brünnhilde, Mme. Mielke.

In this programme is revealed Wagner's development as a dramatic writer. The span which measures the distance between "The Flying Dutchman" and the "Götterdämmerung" is the arch of triumph of a conquering force in art. To the student hearing this programme is the equivalent of a course of lessons, so truthfully does it record the stages of progress of Wagner's system.

The "Dutchman" is the admitted turning point with Wagner from the inanities of the Italian model upon which "Rienzi" was modelled. "Lohegrin" marks the end of his second period in which under the guise of accepted opera form the trend of the man towards a worthier union of music and the drama is apparent. "Die Meistersinger," a comedy, shows Wagner freed from conventionalities, at the dawn of the final, glorious period of which the dramas of the "Nibelungen" are the loftiest result.

Mr. Nikisch's selections from these typical works made a truly noble programme, in the performance of which the orchestra touched the highest point of emotional expressivenesss. The finish, force and virility of the playing was beyond anything ever heard in Boston concert rooms. Who are those who sit unmoved by the wonderful music of the closing dramas of the tetralogy; have they hearts that feel? Fine as Mr. Gericke's reading of the Death March was, there was an impressiveness in the performance of Saturday night beyond anything we have felt before, and the closing scene of the "Götterdämmerung," in which Mme. Mielke proved herself a great artist, left nothing to be desired. We mean this literally, for it is almost impossible to stage the scene so that a proper seriousness will remain with the spectator. To point out the achievements of the orchestra at their concert would demand columns; a spell was upon it and the result was magnificent. We note a single instance of perfect work, that of the brass wind in the serene prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

Both of the soloists were new in Boston, and both will be welcomed again. The appearance of an artist of such parts as Mme. Mielke is an event, particularly at this time, when it is asserted in some quarters that good Wagner artists are not exponents of a pure school of singing. Mme. Mielke, even more than Mme. Lehmann, overthrows this false assumption; she is an almost faultless vocalist, and a very fine dramatic singer. The voice itself is not quite as fine as Lehmann's, but it is in its prime now, a noble, vibrant, splendid organ. It is a great pleasure to note the perfect repose of Mme. Mielke's manner while singing, and her normal facial movements. In the duet the beauty of her phrasing the significance of the qualities of tone used, indicated how fine she must be in the theatre where alone is the true Wagner to be heard. Mr. Dippel has not yet attained growth, but there is great promise in him; his "Asrael," a more lyric part that "Siegfried," was an example of good singing praised in this column. He has a good voice and a fervent style. The duet was admirably sung. Great applause met the singers at its close, even four recalls scarce satisfied the delighted audience. There was an enormous audience and unbounded enthusiasm. Mr. Nikisch, though weak from sickness, conducted with consummate skill. So fine a concert is seldom heard.

There remain but two concerts this season. Next Saturday the programme will be: Schumann, overture, "Genoveva"; Weber, aria from Freischuetz; Bruckner, adagio and scherzo from the Symphony No. 7; songs with the piano; Schumann, Symphony in D minor. At the final concert, instead of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as announced, part one of Beethoven's "Fidelio" will be performed, with Mme. Mielke, Mr. Dippel, Mr. Fischer and others as soloists. The chorus will be chosen from the Boston Singers' Society; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will probably be performed.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

If potential and vehement volumes of sound upon the stage and excitedly resounding applause from the audience seats mean gratification and success, then last Saturday night's Wagner concert must have been near the acme of both. Except at the amazingly vociferous evenings of the Marine Band, we do not remember to have been deluged in Music Hall by such oceans of sound, and such eager and energetic responses have rarely been given there to anything but the most noisy of "popular" performances. There is no fault to find with this; if the majority of Symphony-concert patrons like clash, bang, rattle, roar, shriek and turmoil, well and good; it has long been patent that they most approve the worst singing of the season, and so their exuberant applause may go for what it is worth as an indication of their own taste or the merit of a selection or a programme. Yet the programme for this concert had exceptional qualities, and should have presented Wagner, from whose works only its numbers were taken, in the most favorable light. The picturesque and imaginative overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the sombre and impressive funeral march from the "Götterdämmerung," and skilful arrangements of scenes from the "Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung"—the disposition of the last two being Richter's superbly artful one— are as good as any pages of the great man's writing for illustrating his peculiar system of musical mosaic and his manner of gradually upbuilding his climaxes by the slow addition to each other of the orchestral elements one by one. The voice of singers was admitted in Lohengrin's account of himself, and in the love duet and final scene from the "Götterdämmerung." These things were all put through, as one might say, with tremendous and unrelaxing energy; melodrama was rampant, and orchestra and singers were driven at time into very ranting. Wagner was extravagant, unreasonable and often impossible; but he knew the spirit of poetry and believed in it. If he could have come back from his grave, he would surely have had severe words to say to the conductor who—like most directors of his music—made him appear as little else than theatrical and turgid. The quaintness, the humor, the light swaying figures, the bits of real melody, the insinuated memories of long past motives, the long and almost insensible accumulation of force, the emphasis which should be splendid and not clamorous, the delicate suggestions of the musical atmosphere which environs his people, inspires their fancies and colors their deeds to sight—these and other essentials which the true and intelligent student of Wagner recognizes and desires, were only too often lost in a storm of sound, evolved and hurried onward by the heated energy of the conductor, and which was now dominated by shrill, sharp violins, now by piercing flutes, now by blatant tubas or snorting bassoons, and now by the immitigable cannonading of that dreadful drummer. It was not commendable, nor always was it tolerable, this kind of thing, nor was it Wagner as he ought to be; and we would have wagered that if a stranger to the composer had entered the hall at any one of a dozen periods in the evening, and had been asked what he was hearing, he would have replied, "An attempt to imitate pandemonium." There were some moderate and delightful episodes, it is true, yet the general effect of the evening was wearisome and calculated to depress rather than to exalt the master by making him appear narrow, mechanical and a plagiarist of himself in his use of the orchestra and unvocal in his dealing with the human throat. Mr. Dippel, who has a nice, clear voice, declaimed Lohengrin's romantic story stolidly and solidly, and Mrs. Mielke shouted and screamed as well as she could against the overwhelming tone of the enlarged orchestra which Mr. Nikisch—who when at the piano shows such an exquisite sense of accompaniment—apparently took no pains to repress or adapt. The extracts from the "Götterdämmerung" are empty and tiresome as concert-pieces, and there is scarcely an iota of musical vocality in them, although there are shouting and jouncing over rough corduroys of ungainly phrases ad infinitum. Mrs. Mielke, who has a pure, full voice, and is generous with it, kept as near to the key and the form of the periods as was humanly possible, and could often be seen making heroically desperate efforts when the orchestra forbade her to be heard. Tonight Schumann will begin the programme with his "Genoveva" overture and end it with his D minor symphony; the adagio and scherzo from Bruckner's seventh symphony will fill the middle place, and there will be two vocal numbers by Miss Marie Jahn, one of the principal sopranos of the late Metropolitan season.

ston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1891.

Twenty-Second Symphony Concert (without Symphony.)

The concert of Saturday evening, catching the fever of the week, was quite exceptional. Wagner engrossed the whole programme. This in advance of Mr. Lang's "private performance" of all the music of "Parsifal" with no Graal Burg, nor Dome, nor reverend warder knights nor magic gardens, flower girls, sacred spear caught in the air by the "pure fool" of destiny, no wooded mountain scenery, nor gorgeous costumes; but only chorus, orchestra and solo singers or declaimers, with a swarm of eager Wagner lecturers in advance. Here is the programme made up and conducted con amore by Mr. Nikisch, novel in comparison with the usual Wagner concert programmes:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
From "Die Meistersinger": Introduction to Act III.; Dance of Apprentices; Procession of Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs.
Duet: "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Siegfried's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey, from "Siegfried," and "Die Götterdämmerung." (Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Funeral March, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Closing Scene, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Brünnhilde—Mme. Antonia Mielke.
Lohengrin... } Mr. Andreas Dippel.
Siegfried.... }

There was a great audience, great expectation; the orchestra was in its best estate; the excellent conductor loved the music, and was prepared to throw his whole soul into it and into every instrument. It was a most careful, true, superb performance, seemingly spontaneous. The "Dutchman" overture, with the mysterious hollow-sounding fifths in its sea-trumpet, was as wild and weird, as brilliant and exciting, as we ever heard it. Mr. Dippel has a good manly tenor, and a manly bearing; he seems very young. He delivered Lohengrin's recital about the Knights of the Holy Grail at Monsalvat, his father Percival (or Parsifal), etc., in a composed and dignified manner, in keeping with the music, which is one of the few Wagner passages in which we find the sovereign virtue of repose, an element, a quality, which lies near the soul and centre of true art in all kinds. (Thus "Macbeth," while tragical and stormy, has repose; Beethoven, so full of fire and strength and struggle, always leaves a sense of peace and reconciliation in the mind).

The next selection, from the "Meistersinger," was a happy one. The introduction was very slow and serious and quiet and somewhat monotonous, as if it needed the picturesque procession before the eye to keep the impression vivid for such length of time. When the boys (apprentices) rush in with fun and frolic, dancing to the saucy, piquant staccato of clarinet, etc., the effect is very pretty, very lifesome. We welcome our good wise friend Hans Sachs, in the homage paid to him, but here again the strain grows wearisome. This number was all admirably played. And throughout this and all the rest there was an eloquence in the spontaneous gesture of Arthur Nikisch, which enhanced the value of his beat.

The Duet, at parting, of the lovers at the beginning of the "Götterdämmerung," when Siegfried gallops Rhineward from Brünnhilde's rock in search of "new adventures," has poetry and passion in it; but it does seem as if Wagner were on principle (if not through wilfulness) afraid of melody in it, for nothing could be dryer, colder and more artificial than the—strains we cannot call them—phrases, "endless melody" perhaps, which each one sings, or rather say delivers. They were well delivered, for Mme. Mielke also has a noble voice and knows well how to use it, besides a noble figure, a fine bearing, and calm self-possession. The orchestral environment is rich, with far more melody woven into it than we get in the voice parts. But here again we meet our old disturbing enemy in the Wagnerian instrumentation, that restless, feverish, uneasy, swarming, squirming and bewildering movement—what some call Wagner's "polyphony,"—which robs the nerves and feelings of all repose such as one naturally expects in art, in all that is ideal.

The excerpts arranged by Richter from "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung" made up the richest number of the programme. There was in it more of contrast, more of depth, appealing to deep feelings, more that held the general sympathy, more of mingled beauties both of melodic phrase, of harmony and of tone-color, impassioned accent, wealth of reminiscence and anticipation, than perhaps in any other piece. And it was a triumph of orchestral virtuosity. People were carried away by it; there was pathos in the half conscious murmuring applause. Yet suffer a heretic and sceptic to put in one more negation, to confess one more drawback which he does not find it easy to get over. So many Leitmotiven lift their heads so often in the seething instrumental whirlpool, that it would really be fun to shoot some of them as they pop up; for, musically, what are they but interlopers? In the marvellous execution of these pieces, Mr. Nikisch seemed to transfuse his own feeling and conception into every member of the orchestra, giving a signal instance of the process of "thought transference," which is so much talked about. Go on, play everything so well, and almost thou persuadest us to be a Wagnerite!

We have never found the "Funeral March" of Siegfried (which is really no march at all—it hardly moves) so superlatively great above all strains of funeral music, as it is the fashion of the day to call this imposing piece of Wagner. It is solemn and profound, more through the agglomeration of deep and sombre instruments, than through the intrinsically imaginative quality and novelty of its musical ideas. It does suggest a people weighed to earth by a great grief. It is intensely mournful; but does it compare in musical originality, in beauty and sublimity of thought, in depth of feeling, in wealth of imagination, or in the sense of edification and uplifting after you have heard it, with Beethoven's Marcia Funebre in the Heroic Symphony? Yet we willingly confess that we never had before heard it when it sounded quite so impressive as it did this time.

The closing scene from the "Ring of the Nibelung" tetralogy was mainly solo for Mme. Mielke. It was the scene in which Mme. Lili Lehmann-Kalisch, in the German opera last year, gave us that astounding feat of what may be called Wagnerian musical shouting; singing it cannot be. Lehmann had the superb voice which could compete against the whole weight of the orchestra; she had the art of producing and sustaining her great tones in their full [illegible] was a Shakespeare and Beethoven artist; she had the form and action, the inspiration and expressive beauty of a queen of lyric drama. Mme. Mielke is not her equal; yet she gave a nobly impassioned and pathetic declamation of Brünnhilde's swan song. Unfortunately, after she sinks into a seat—exhausted, we may well imagine, after such an effort—the orchestra keeps on to a length which must to many have seemed rather tiresome.

A word more on the Wagner orchestration generally. We hope we do not harp too much upon a feeling which it gives us and which the best performance does not overcome. We have felt constrained to call his harmony, his instrumentation, overfull and bloated, swollen out of beautiful and healthy symmetry and shape. Look at a youthful face in the temperate estate of innocence and health. See the same after years of excessive indulgence, the veins too full of blood, the vesicles crowded with bad humors, the features sunken and distorted. Mark the contrast of the two. The instrumentation of Beethoven, of Mozart, Mendelssohn, all the greatest masters, is like that fresh, pure, lovely face; that of Wagner, overcrowded in harmony, overloaded with huge instruments (a contra-bass for every family), and all this superfluity aggravated by the struggling, squirming, restless knots of little phrases and melodic figures, may astonish, but does it yield increase of beauty? Would it not be truer if it were simpler and less crowded? Has it the lifesome and uplifting virtue that inspires you in a symphony of Beethoven? Think of the first sound in his cheerful No. 8! You may tell us that we are behind the age. It may be, and so be it! This modern tendency in music is perhaps part and parcel of the whole fast tendency of our time. Perhaps it is a corresponding manifestation of what appears in the craze of "rapid transit," the impatient meddling with electricity, the building skyward where ground area is limited, and a thousand more ambitious schemes (especially among political adventurers) to "hurry God!" Yet we cannot help believing that the soul of man enjoys a sweeter consciousness in leading a more simple, quiet, temperate, abstemious, intellectual, self-respecting, mutually helpful life.

Next Saturday's concert invites us to a hearing of Schumann's beautiful "Genoveva" overture; Weber's "Freyschütz" scena: "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," to be sung by Miss Marie Jahn; the Adagio and Scherzo from Bruckner's seventh symphony; songs with piano; and Schumann's D minor symphony. J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1891.

A Wagner Programme at the Symphony.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was devoted to Wagner. This programme was performed, the sololists being Mme. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor, from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."
Lohengrin's Legend, from "Lohengrin."
Mr. Dippel.
Introduction to Act Three. Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Master-Singers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger."
Duet, "In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Mme. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"Siegfreid's Passage to Brünnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdammerung."
Arranged by Hans Richter.
Funeral march, from "Die Götterdämmerung."
Closing scene, "Die Götterdämmerung."
Brünnhilde, Mme. Mielke.

In this programme is revealed Wagner's development as a dramatic writer. The span which measures the distance between "The Flying Dutchman" and the "Götterdämmerung" is the arch of triumph of a conquering force in art. To the student hearing this programme is the equivalent of a course of lessons, so truthfully does it record the stages of progress of Wagner's system. The "Dutchman" is the admitted turning point with Wagner from the inanities of the Italian model upon which "Rienzi" was modelled. "Lohegrin" marks the end of his second period in which under the guise of accepted opera form the trend of the man towards a worthier union of music and the drama is apparent. "Die Meistersinger," a comedy, shows Wagner freed from conventionalities, at the dawn of the final, glorious period of which the dramas of the "Nibelungen" are the loftiest result.

Mr. Nikisch's selections from these typical works made a truly noble programme, in the performance of which the orchestra touched the highest point of emotional expressivenesss. The finish, force and virility of the playing was beyond anything ever heard in Boston concert rooms. Who are those who sit unmoved by the wonderful music of the closing dramas of the tetralogy; have they hearts that feel? Fine as Mr. Gericke's reading of the Death March was, there was an impressiveness in the performance of Saturday night beyond anything we have felt before, and the closing scene of the "Götterdämmerung," in which Mme. Mielke proved herself a great artist, left nothing to be desired. We mean this literally, for it is almost impossible to stage the scene so that a proper seriousness will remain with the spectator. To point out the achievements of the orchestra at their concert would demand columns; a spell was upon it and the result was magnificent. We note a single instance of perfect work, that of the brass wind in the serene prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

Both of the soloists were new in Boston, and both will be welcomed again. The appearance of an artist of such parts as Mme. Mielke is an event, particularly at this time, when it is asserted in some quarters that good Wagner artists are not exponents of a pure school of singing. Mme. Mielke, even more than Mme. Lehmann, overthrows this false assumption; she is an almost faultless vocalist, and a very fine dramatic singer. The voice itself is not quite as fine as Lehmann's, but it is in its prime now, a noble, vibrant, splendid organ. It is a great pleasure to note the perfect repose of Mme. Mielke's manner while singing, and her normal facial movements. In the duet the beauty of her phrasing the significance of the qualities of tone used, indicated how fine she must be in the theatre where alone is the true Wagner to be heard. Mr. Dippel has not yet attained growth, but there is great promise in him; his "Asrael," a more lyric part that "Siegfried," was an example of good singing praised in this column. He has a good voice and a fervent style. The duet was admirably sung. Great applause met the singers at its close, even four recalls scarce satisfied the delighted audience. There was an enormous audience and unbounded enthusiasm. Mr. Nikisch, though weak from sickness, conducted with consummate skill. So fine a concert is seldom heard.

There remain but two concerts this season. Next Saturday the programme will be: Schumann, overture, "Genoveva"; Weber, aria from Freischuetz; Bruckner, adagio and scherzo from the Symphony No. 7; songs with the piano; Schumann, Symphony in D minor. At the final concert, instead of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as announced, part one of Beethoven's "Fidelio" will be performed, with Mme. Mielke, Mr. Dippel, Mr. Fischer and others as soloists. The chorus will be chosen from the Boston Singers' Society; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will probably be performed.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

If potential and vehement volumes of sound upon the stage and excitedly resounding applause from the audience seats mean gratification and success, then last Saturday night's Wagner concert must have been near the acme of both. Except at the amazingly vociferous evenings of the Marine Band, we do not remember to have been deluged in Music Hall by such oceans of sound, and such eager and energetic responses have rarely been given there to anything but the most noisy of "popular" performances. There is no fault to find with this; if the majority of Symphony-concert patrons like clash, bang, rattle, roar, shriek and turmoil, well and good; it has long been patent that they most approve the worst singing of the season, and so their exuberant applause may go for what it is worth as an indication of their own taste or the merit of a selection or a programme. Yet the programme for this concert had exceptional qualities, and should have presented Wagner, from whose works only its numbers were taken, in the most favorable light. The picturesque and imaginative overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the sombre and impressive funeral march from the "Götterdämmerung," and skilful arrangements of scenes from the "Meistersinger," "Siegfried" and the "Götterdämmerung"—the disposition of the last two being Richter's superbly artful one— are as good as any pages of the great man's writing for illustrating his peculiar system of musical mosaic and his manner of gradually upbuilding his climaxes by the slow addition to each other of the orchestral elements one by one. The voice of singers was admitted in Lohengrin's account of himself, and in the love duet and final scene from the "Götterdämmerung." These things were all put through, as one might say, with tremendous and unrelaxing energy; melodrama was rampant, and orchestra and singers were driven at time into very ranting. Wagner was extravagant, unreasonable and often impossible; but he knew the spirit of poetry and believed in it. If he could have come back from his grave, he would surely have had severe words to say to the conductor who—like most directors of his music—made him appear as little else than theatrical and turgid. The quaintness, the humor, the light swaying figures, the bits of real melody, the insinuated memories of long past motives, the long and almost insensible accumulation of force, the emphasis which should be splendid and not clamorous, the delicate suggestions of the musical atmosphere which environs his people, inspires their fancies and colors their deeds to sight—these and other essentials which the true and intelligent student of Wagner recognizes and desires, were only too often lost in a storm of sound, evolved and hurried onward by the heated energy of the conductor, and which was now dominated by shrill, sharp violins, now by piercing flutes, now by blatant tubas or snorting bassoons, and now by the immitigable cannonading of that dreadful drummer. It was not commendable, nor always was it tolerable, this kind of thing, nor was it Wagner as he ought to be; and we would have wagered that if a stranger to the composer had entered the hall at any one of a dozen periods in the evening, and had been asked what he was hearing, he would have replied, "An attempt to imitate pandemonium." There were some moderate and delightful episodes, it is true, yet the general effect of the evening was wearisome and calculated to depress rather than to exalt the master by making him appear narrow, mechanical and a plagiarist of himself in his use of the orchestra and unvocal in his dealing with the human throat. Mr. Dippel, who has a nice, clear voice, declaimed Lohengrin's romantic story stolidly and solidly, and Mrs. Mielke shouted and screamed as well as she could against the overwhelming tone of the enlarged orchestra which Mr. Nikisch—who when at the piano shows such an exquisite sense of accompaniment—apparently took no pains to repress or adapt. The extracts from the "Götterdämmerung" are empty and tiresome as concert-pieces, and there is scarcely an iota of musical vocality in them, although there are shouting and jouncing over rough corduroys of ungainly phrases ad infinitum. Mrs. Mielke, who has a pure, full voice, and is generous with it, kept as near to the key and the form of the periods as was humanly possible, and could often be seen making heroically desperate efforts when the orchestra forbade her to be heard. Tonight Schumann will begin the programme with his "Genoveva" overture and end it with his D minor symphony; the adagio and scherzo from Bruckner's seventh symphony will fill the middle place, and there will be two vocal numbers by Miss Marie Jahn, one of the principal sopranos of the late Metropolitan season.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SERIES.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 16TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. Lenore, No. 3.
LISZT.	SONG WITH ORCHESTRA. "Mignon."
BENJ. GODARD.	a) NIKIA'S DREAM, b) IN THE HAMMOCK,	From "Symphonie Orientale," op. 84.
	SONGS with PIANO.
a) ————	CHARMANTE MARGUERITE. (Old French,)
b) TSCHAIKOWSKY.	"NUR WER DIE SEHNSUCHT KENNT."
c) BRAHMS.	"MEINE LIEBE IST GRUN."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in E flat, (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55. Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai).—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.

SOLOIST:

MISS LENA LITTLE.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1891

The twenty-second Symphony concert was more like a "grand operatic festival" than a staid performance of music selected and played for the education and instruction of the inhabitants of Boston and the adjoining towns. The numbers of the program were taken at random from the operas and "music dramas" of Richard Wagner, and the orchestra, led by Mr. Nickisch, was assisted by Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor. The concert opened with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," an opera disowned by Wagner in his later years, as unworthy of his genius and as too similar to the operas of melody-inventors. Then came "Lohengrin's Legend" from another opera disowned by the Wagner of the Triology. It was sung or rather declaimed by Mr. Andreas Dippel, a tenor of the late Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Dippel has a strong, clear, firm voice, and he sang the legend with painstaking accuracy, dividing the notes from each other as well as the German syllables. So far as expression or emotion is concerned, the legend might have been delivered by means of a speaking-trumpet. A pot-pourri, made up of the introduction to the third act, the "Dance of Apprentices," the "Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs"—all from "Die Meistersinger"—followed. Mrs. Mielke, of the late Metropolitan Opera Company, and Mr. Dippel were heard—that is, partly heard—in the duet "In neuen Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Mrs. Mielke has an agreeable voice, of good compass, and in the sureness of her intonation and in the use of her voice she is a marked contrast to many of her sisters who have been heard in this country in German opera. If at times she screamed, it was because she was forced to it by the orchestra. It would be a pleasure to hear her in music written for the voice and not for an orchestral instrument. The pot-pourri that followed was made up of selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," and it included "Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn," and "Rhine Journey." The funeral march from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" came next, and the final number was the closing scene of "Die Goetterdaemmerung," with the soprano voice of Mrs. Mielke added to the instruments of the orchestra.

* * * * * *

Mr. Nikisch directed with skill and with enthusiasm. Such music is sympathetic to him; it appeals to his imagination; it calls upon his dramatic instincts and his theatrical education. And in the direction of these works of the ultra-modern school he appears as a leader of the first order. Perhaps the funeral march was taken at a slower pace than is customary in German opera houses and concert halls; but this is a matter of trifling importance. The orchestra played with such spirit, with such a swing, that it is not surprising that the audience was excited and that the applause was most hearty.

* * * * * *

It would be, perhaps, impertinent to inquire into the reasons for this applause or to discuss the nature of the music itself, or to raise the question whether such programs should have a place in a series of symphony concerts. For the Symphony Orchestra is supported by the people that buy subscription tickets, and the director should not be blamed if he consults the wishes of his hearers. If they prefer extracts from Wagner's music-dramas to music that is perhaps more suited to symphony concerts; if they delight in these excerpts, although many of them are devoid of sense when taken from their proper place (that is, if the theories of Wagner are of any weight), why should the director quarrel with their taste?

* * * * * *

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony rehearsal and concert underwent an important change in the substitution of three Bach "arrangements" for the adagio and scherzo of Bruckner's seventh symphony. It had been expected that this work would be given in its entirety sometime during the season; and the final omission even of its two middle movements caused disappointment. Still, it is debatable whether it is an act of justice to the composer to play extracts of a symphony which is practically unknown in its completeness. Two movements of Tschaikowskiys symphony in F minor were performed early in the season and the absence of their natural surroundings apparently diminished their effectiveness materially. Bruckner's symphony was given once under Mr. Gericke's lead, but that is too long ago to establish any claim of acquaintance with it.

The programme was essentially devoted to Schumann. The overture to "Genoveva" was the first number; and his fourth symphony in D minor, opus 120, the last. If one must, perforce, listen to the works of the older masters more frequently than his inclinations would lead him to do, these two, with their wealth of dissonances, and their brief moments of exquisite melody, are well-designed to afford considerable relief to his wounded feelings. Those who have attended the Boston Symphony concerts regularly, or irregularly, for that matter, have had many opportunities to become familiarly acquainted with both works. Mr. Nikisch, in particular, of the three conductors, has been strongly suspected of harboring an intense partiality for Schumann's orchestral compositions in general. At his first appearance in Boston, he administered a severe shock to the conservative music lovers, who sat behind him awaiting his movements with well-bred interest, by his splendid, dramatic, if exceedingly unconventional reading of this same symphony; and since that memorable occasion the name of its composer has appeared not wisely but too often in the symphony programmes.

That all musical persons love Schumann there can be no doubt. But variety is the spice of life, and it does seem that if his name had been rendered a trifle more conspicuous by its absence (not to mention a few others), and the names of several eminent composers of the day had been suffered to appear instead, more entertaining results would have been secured.

The overture was vigorously given, and so was the symphony. There was also some creditable horn-playing, and the strings and wood-wind were fairly up to their mark in delicacy and expressiveness in the "Romanza," and in the trio of the scherzo. As a whole, however, there seemed to be a considerable falling-off in finish, throughout both overture and symphony.

The Bach selections consisted of the prelude to the twenty-ninth cantata, an adagio, and a gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich. The first and last were played with much energy, and the beautiful adagio, sympathetically; all being well received.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. Her first number was the aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," which she interpreted so earnestly, expressively and artistically, that the tremulent quality in her voice and her occasional uncertain intonation were made less objectionable than they otherwise would have been. She afterwards sang to Mr. Zach's piano accompaniment, Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau," a "Wiegenlied," by Wagner, and "Vogelein wohin so Schnell," by Lassen, in all of which she displayed much taste and genuine feeling. She was cordially received, as were the efforts of the conductor and orchestra.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES—23D CONCERT.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist at the Symphony concert last night, and she sang an aria by Weber and some songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen in a very amateurish and uninteresting manner.

The overture by Schumann, "Genovera," and the Fourth Symphony by the same composer, were well played, and the Gavotte of a Suite by Bach was heartily encored and repeated.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will go to Paris this summer to study vocalization.

Clipping from Beacon
Rochester Times
Date 4-18

—Last week's symphony concert was a Wagner [redacted] phony, and a delight from beginning to end—not to the handful, but to the vast throng that filled Music Hall. Such enthusiasm has not prevailed at any previous concert in the course this season. To-nights programme is as follows: Schumann, Overture, "Genoveva;" Weber, Aria from Freischuetz;" Bruckner, Adagio and Scherzo from the Symphony No. 7; Schumann, Symphony in D minor; soloist, Miss Marie Jahn.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

Musical Notes.

The Symphony concert of the 11th inst., the twenty-second in this season's series, was devoted wholly to Wagner, Mad. Mielke and Mr. Dippel assisting as soloists. It illustrated all that there is to illustrate of the power and the weakness of Wagner. Certain it is that there was too much of this music heard at a single sitting. Whatever may be said by the advocates of Wagner in worship of their idol, it is undeniable that he is monotonous to a degree unknown among truly great composers. He has, unquestionably, a style wholly his own, but it is a style of unusual limitations, confined to a few effects that are repeated over and over again until they become oppressively wearisome. This is not felt when one or two selections appear on a concert programme, but when it contains nothing else but Wagner and one must listen to him for close upon two hours, the sameness of the music is overwhelmingly convincing. One almost groans for something resembling a natural melody, even a tune, if you will; for simplicity; for a relief from the constantly-moving harmonies leading to nowhere in particular except in the direction of confusion; for something less of the incessant richness of tone color. By the end of the first half hour of listening to it, what follows seems exactly like what has gone before; the composer then seems to be laboring under an attack of violent musical hysterics; he shrieks, he moans, he whines, he shouts; he passes into calm for a few moments, overcome by fatigue; but he is no sooner rested than off he starts again into a fresh attack and the distressing hysteria goes on until another climax of exhaustion is reached. No wonder that such music needs apostles to wander forth over the earth in order to explain the gospel of Wagner to heathens who worship the pure and simple in art, and who have been in reprehensible ignorance of the fact that music which is enclyopædic in its reach and quality is the true music. In the course of time we may become accustomed to anything; it only requires perseverance to acquire a taste for things which at first nauseate the palate. Thus, girls achieve an appetite for eating slate pencils, men for the blackest and strongest of chewing tobacco, tipplers for the vilest of whiskey and gin. Taste has even been cultivated down to the point of eating dirt and enjoying it. It is true that these are abnormal developments of appetite, but they show to what extent the palate may be trained in an unhealthful direction. The Greeks, after all, appear to have reached the highest art in the simplicity that characterized the art of their best period; and wherever we find the greatest triumphs of art we find its inspiration to be founded deep and solidly in this simplicity. There is more of true art in Mozart's E-minor Symphony than can be found in the whole series of Wagner's music dramas. The much-lauded polyphony of Wagner is mud compared with the clear and limpid polyphony that may be found in the working out in any first movement of a fine Haydn symphony. It may be said that Wagner could not or did not care to write such polyphony as Haydn wrote, but his work in this kind is none the less potent as a comparasion between a true artist who says what he has to say in a convincing manner and a sensationalist artist who shouts, blusters and bullies, and mistakes noise for argument. The music played at this concert afforded evident delight to the audience that heard it. That the taste evinced was healthy we doubt; it suggested the acquirement of the slate-pencil, the strong tobacco or the throat-burning whiskey appetite. The work of the orchestra was fine, and merited all the applause that was bestowed upon it, and Mr. Nikisch was here seen in a phase of his art with which he seems to sympathize thoroughly, more thoroughly, in fact, than with any other. He was applauded with immense heartiness, and was obliged to come forward again and again to bow his acknowledgements. Mme. Mielke sang with splendid fire and freedom, her powerful voice rising easily above the din of the orchestra that accompanied it. As an artist she is immensely superior to the German singers who have preceded her in these symphony concerts, for her voice is pure, well trained, tuneful and beautiful in its smooth sonority. Mr. Dippel sings with vigor and precision, but we fancy that his voice and method are better adapted to the operatic than to the concert stage. There was a vast audience, and the Wagner cult in Boston was in the

---

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 20, 1891.

MORNING EDITION.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann had the place of honor on the programme at the Symphony concert last Saturday evening. His overture, "Genoveva," opened the concert and his Symphony No. 4 in D minor closed it. Mr. Nikisch gave an excellent reading of both, and the orchestra was in good form. It was a well arranged programme. The symphony is one of the most delightful of Schumann's—it is never tiresome, and scarcely a person left the hall until its close. As an intermezzo Mr. Nikisch gave a prelude adagio gavotte by Bach, arranged for the strings. It captivated the audience, and the applause was so enthusiastic that Mr. Nikisch consented to repeat the gavotte.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist, and gave the familiar aria from "Der Freischutz" and a brace of songs. This artist is another of the company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and has a pure and not unpleasant voice. Her delivery of the songs, especially one by Lassen, was artistically done, and appeared to be more suited to her singing than the aria. This latter would not bear comparison with its rendition by many artists who could be named. Comparisons are not pleasant, but in the selection of such a standard aria it is impossible to avoid them. The artists of the Metropolitan Opera House are through with their work in New York, and it is of course very pleasant for Boston to be afforded an opportunity of hearing some of them. But other artists can sing acceptably besides the German singers who were brought over here to give German opera. There are several singers here in Boston who have not had an opportunity to be heard with the Symphony Orchestra this year, who could have given a better rendition of the "Der Freischutz" aria, and whom the people would have been pleased to hear. Mr. Zach played the accompaniments on the piano with excellent taste. For the last concert the programme will be entirely Beethoven, and will include an act from Fidelio, with Mme. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1891.

Symphonies Soon to Close—

Conductor Nikisch is a great admirer of Schumann, and naturally enough delights in giving him frequent place upon the Symphony programmes. He is certainly remarkably successful in setting forth the works of this great composer. Yesterday the symphony No. 4 in D minor was played, besides the overture to "Genoveva," the only opera Schumann ever wrote. Both of these compositions have been so frequently given here that it is unnecessary to further comment upon their performance at this time than to state that the interpretations were creditable to Mr. Nikisch, and that the audience was cordially appreciative. Thoroughly delightful also was the orchestra's performance of the Bachrich arrangement for strings of Bach's præludium, adagio and gavotte. The adagio was given with particularly charming effect.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. Like the singers at the previous symphony, she is a prominent member of the Metropolitan Opera House company. She was received very kindly and twice recalled after singing her first selection. The aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Die Freischutz," and three songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, were her offerings. Her voice is rather sweet in tone, and she sings with much expression.

An attractive programme is promised for this week's concert, the last of the season. The selections will be all from Beethoven's works, and will comprise the "Lenore, No. 2," overture, the No. 5 symphony and the first act of "Fidelio." The soloists will be Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Emil Fischer, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. A male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society will assist.

[127]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SERIES.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 16TH, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. Lenore, No. 2.
LISZT.	SONG WITH ORCHESTRA. "Mignon."
BENJ. GODARD.	a) NIKIA'S DREAM,	From "Symphonie
	b) IN THE HAMMOCK,	Orientale," op. 84.
	SONGS with PIANO.
a) ————	CHARMANTE MARGUERITE. (Old French,)
b) TSCHAIKOWSKY.	"NUR WER DIE SEHNSUCHT KENNT."
c) BRAHMS.	"MEINE LIEBE IST GRUN."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY in E flat, (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55. Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai).—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.

SOLOIST:

MISS LENA LITTLE.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1891.

THE SYMPHONIES—23D CONCERT.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist at the Symphony concert last night, and she sang an Aria by Weber and some songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen in a very amateurish and uninteresting manner.

The overture by Schumann, "Genovera," and the Fourth Symphony by the same composer, were well played, and the Gavotte of a Suite by Bach was heartily encored and repeated.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will go to Paris this summer to study vocalization.

Clipping from Beacon
Rochester Mass
Date 4-18

—Last week's symphony concert was a Wagner concert sans a symphony, and a delight from beginning to end—not to the handful, but to the vast throng that filled Music Hall. Such enthusiasm has not prevailed at any previous concert in the course this season. To-nights programme is as follows: Schumann, Overture, "Genoveva;" Weber, Aria from Freischuetz;" Bruckner, Adagio and Scherzo from the Symphony No. 7; Schumann, Symphony in D minor; soloist, Miss Marie Jahn.

[127]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

Musical Notes.

The Symphony concert of the 11th inst., the twenty-second in this season's series, was devoted wholly to Wagner, Mad. Mielke and Mr. Dippel assisting as soloists. It illustrated all that there is to illustrate of the power and the weakness of Wagner. Certain it is that there was too much of this music heard at a single sitting. Whatever may be said by the advocates of Wagner in worship of their idol, it is undeniable that he is monotonous to a degree unknown among truly great composers. He has, unquestionably, a style wholly his own, but it is a style of unusual limitations, confined to a few effects that are repeated over and over again until they become oppressively wearisome. This is not felt when one or two selections appear on a concert programme, but when it contains nothing else but Wagner and one must listen to him for close upon two hours, the sameness of the music is overwhelmingly convincing. One almost groans for something resembling a natural melody, even a tune, if you will; for simplicity; for a relief from the constantly-moving harmonies leading to nowhere in particular except in the direction of confusion; for something less of the incessant richness of tone color. By the end of the first half hour of listening to it, what follows seems exactly like what has gone before; the composer then seems to be laboring under an attack of violent musical hysterics; he shrieks, he moans, he whines, he shouts; he passes into calm for a few moments, overcome by fatigue; but he is no sooner rested than off he starts again into a fresh attack and the distressing hysteria goes on until another climax of exhaustion is reached. No wonder that such music needs apostles to wander forth over the earth in order to explain the gospel of Wagner to heathens who worship the pure and simple in art, and who have been in reprehensible ignorance of the fact that music which is encyclopædic in its reach and quality is the true music. In the course of time we may become accustomed to anything; it only requires perseverance to acquire a taste for things which at first nauseate the palate. Thus, girls achieve an appetite for eating slate pencils, men for the blackest and strongest of chewing tobacco, tipplers for the vilest of whiskey and gin. Taste has even been cultivated down to the point of eating dirt and enjoying it. It is true that these are abnormal developments of appetite, but they show to what extent the palate may be trained in an unhealthful direction. The Greeks, after all, appear to have reached the highest art in the simplicity that characterized the art of their best period; and wherever we find the greatest triumphs of art we find its inspiration to be founded deep and solidly in this simplicity. There is more of true art in Mozart's E-minor Symphony than can be found in the whole series of Wagner's music dramas. The much-lauded polyphony of Wagner is mud compared with the clear and limpid polyphony that may be found in the working out in any first movement of a fine Haydn symphony. It may be said that Wagner could not or did not care to write such polyphony as Haydn wrote, but his work in this kind is none the less potent as a comparasion between a true artist who says what he has to say in a convincing manner and a sensationalist artist who shouts, blusters and bullies, and mistakes noise for argument. The music played at this concert afforded evident delight to the audience that heard it. That the taste evinced was healthy we doubt; it suggested the acquirement of the slate-pencil, the strong tobacco or the throat-burning whiskey appetite. The work of the orchestra was fine, and merited all the applause that was bestowed upon it, and Mr. Nikisch was here seen in a phase of his art with which he seems to sympathize thoroughly, more thoroughly, in fact, than with any other. He was applauded with immense heartiness, and was obliged to come forward again and again to bow his acknowledgements. Mme. Mielke sang with splendid fire and freedom, her powerful voice rising easily above the din of the orchestra that accompanied it. As an artist she is immensely superior to the German singers who have preceded her in these symphony concerts, for her voice is pure, well trained, tuneful and beautiful in its smooth sonority. Mr. Dippel sings with vigor and precision, but we fancy that his voice and method are better adapted to the operatic than to the concert stage. There was a vast audience, and the Wagner cult in Boston was in the ascendant.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 20, 1891.

MORNING EDITION.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann had the place of honor on the programme at the Symphony concert last Saturday evening. His overture, "Genoveva," opened the concert and his Symphony No. 4 in D minor closed it. Mr. Nikisch gave an excellent reading of both, and the orchestra was in good form. It was a well arranged programme. The symphony is one of the most delightful of Schumann's—it is never tiresome, and scarcely a person left the hall until its close. As an intermezzo Mr. Nikisch gave a prelude adagia gavotte by Bach, arranged for the strings. It captivated the audience, and the applause was so enthusiastic that Mr. Nikisch consented to repeat the gavotte.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist, and gave the familiar aria from "Der Freischutz" and a brace of songs. This artist is another of the company of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and has a pure and not unpleasant voice. Her delivery of the songs, especially one by Lassen, was artistically done, and appeared to be more suited to her singing than the aria. This latter would not bear comparison with its rendition by many artists who could be named. Comparisons are not pleasant, but in the selection of such a standard aria it is impossible to avoid them. The artists of the Metropolitan Opera House are through with their work in New York, and it is of course very pleasant for Boston to be afforded an opportunity of hearing some of them. But other artists can sing acceptably besides the German singers who were brought over here to give German opera. There are several singers here in Boston who have not had an opportunity to be heard with the Symphony Orchestra this year, who could have given a better rendition of the "Der Freischutz" aria, and whom the people would have been pleased to hear. Mr. Zach played the accompaniments on the piano with excellent taste. For the last concert the programme will be entirely Beethoven, and will include an act from Fidelio, with Mme. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn.

N HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1891

The twenty-second Symphony concert was more like a "grand operatic festival" than a staid performance of music selected and played for the education and instruction of the inhabitants of Boston and the adjoining towns. The numbers of the program were taken at random from the operas and "music dramas" of Richard Wagner, and the orchestra, led by Mr. Nickisch, was assisted by Mrs. Antonia Mielke, soprano, and Mr. Andreas Dippel, tenor. The concert opened with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," an opera disowned by Wagner in his later years, as unworthy of his genius and as too similar to the operas of melody-inventors. Then came "Lohengrin's Legend" from another opera disowned by the Wagner of the Triology. It was sung or rather declaimed by Mr. Andreas Dippel, a tenor of the late Metropolitan Opera Company. Mr. Dippel has a strong, clear, firm voice, and he sang the legend with painstaking accuracy, dividing the notes from each other as well as the German syllables. So far as expression or emotion is concerned, the legend might have been delivered by means of a speaking-trumpet. A pot-pourri, made up of the introduction to the third act, the "Dance of Apprentices," the "Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs"—all from "Die Meistersinger"—followed. Mrs. Mielke, of the late Metropolitan Opera Company, and Mr. Dippel were heard—that is, partly heard—in the duet "In neuen Thaten," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Mrs. Mielke has an agreeable voice, of good compass, and in the sureness of her intonation and in the use of her voice she is a marked contrast to many of her sisters who have been heard in this country in German opera. If at times she screamed, it was because she was forced to it by the orchestra. It would be a pleasure to hear her in music written for the voice and not for an orchestral instrument. The pot-pourri that followed was made up of selections from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung," and it included "Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn," and "Rhine Journey." The funeral march from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" came next, and the final number was the closing scene of "Die Goetterdaemmerung," with the soprano voice of Mrs. Mielke added to the instruments of the orchestra.

* * * * *

Mr. Nikisch directed with skill and with enthusiasm. Such music is sympathetic to him; it appeals to his imagination; it calls upon his dramatic instincts and his theatrical education. And in the direction of these works of the ultra-modern school he appears as a leader of the first order. Perhaps the funeral march was taken at a slower pace than is customary in German opera houses and concert halls; but this is a matter of trifling importance. The orchestra played with such spirit, with such a swing, that it is not surprising that the audience was excited and that the applause was most hearty.

* * * * *

It would be, perhaps, impertinent to inquire into the reasons for this applause or to discuss the nature of the music itself, or to raise the question whether such programs should have a place in a series of symphony concerts. For the Symphony Orchestra is supported by the people that buy subscription tickets, and the director should not be blamed if he consults the wishes of his hearers. If they prefer extracts from Wagner's music-dramas to music that is perhaps more suited to symphony concerts; if they delight in these excerpts, although many of them are devoid of sense when taken from their proper place (that is, if the theories of Wagner are of any weight), why should the director quarrel with their taste?

* * * * *

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony rehearsal and concert underwent an important change in the substitution of three Bach "arrangements" for the adagio and scherzo of Bruckner's seventh symphony. It had been expected that this work would be given in its entirety sometime during the season; and the final omission even of its two middle movements caused disappointment. Still, it is debatable whether it is an act of justice to the composer to play extracts of a symphony which is practically unknown in its completeness. Two movements of Tschaikowskiys symphony in F minor were performed early in the season and the absence of their natural surroundings apparently diminished their effectiveness materially. Bruckner's symphony was given once under Mr. Gericke's lead, but that is too long ago to establish any claim of acquaintance with it.

The programme was essentially devoted to Schumann. The overture to "Genoveva" was the first number; and his fourth symphony in D minor, opus 120, the last. If one must, perforce, listen to the works of the older masters more frequently than his inclinations would lead him to do, these two, with their wealth of dissonances, and their brief moments of exquisite melody, are well-designed to afford considerable relief to his wounded feelings. Those who have attended the Boston Symphony concerts regularly, or irregularly, for that matter, have had many opportunities to become familiarly acquainted with both works. Mr. Nikisch, in particular, of the three conductors, has been strongly suspected of harboring an intense partiality for Schumann's orchestral compositions in general. At his first appearance in Boston, he administered a severe shock to the conservative music lovers, who sat behind him awaiting his movements with well-bred interest, by his splendid, dramatic, if exceedingly unconventional reading of this same symphony; and since that memorable occasion the name of its composer has appeared not wisely but too often in the symphony programmes.

That all musical persons love Schumann there can be no doubt. But variety is the spice of life, and it does seem that if his name had been rendered a trifle more conspicuous by its absence (not to mention a few others), and the names of several eminent composers of the day had been suffered to appear instead, more entertaining results would have been secured.

The overture was vigorously given, and so was the symphony. There was also some creditable horn-playing, and the strings and wood-wind were fairly up to their mark in delicacy and expressiveness in the "Romanza," and in the trio of the scherzo. As a whole, however, there seemed to be a considerable falling-off in finish, throughout both overture and symphony.

The Bach selections consisted of the prelude to the twenty-ninth cantata, an adagio, and a gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich. The first and last were played with much energy, and the beautiful adagio, sympathetically; all being well received.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. Her first number was the aria from "Der Freischutz," "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," which she interpreted so earnestly, expressively and artistically, that the tremulent quality in her voice and her occasional uncertain intonation were made less objectionable than they otherwise would have been. She afterwards sang to Mr. Zach's piano accompaniment, Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau," a "Wiegenlied," by Wagner, and "Vogelein wohin so Schnell," by Lassen, in all of which she displayed much taste and genuine feeling. She was cordially received, as were the efforts of the conductor and orchestra.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1891.

Symphonies Soon to Close—

Conductor Nikisch is a great admirer of Schumann, and naturally enough delights in giving him frequent place upon the Symphony programmes. He is certainly remarkably successful in setting forth the works of this great composer. Yesterday the symphony No. 4 in D minor was played, besides the overture to "Genoveva," the only opera Schumann ever wrote. Both of these compositions have been so frequently given here that it is unnecessary to further comment upon their performance at this time than to state that the interpretations were creditable to Mr. Nikisch, and that the audience was cordially appreciative. Thoroughly delightful also was the orchestra's performance of the Bachrich arrangement for strings of Bach's præludium, adagio and gavotte. The adagio was given with particularly charming effect.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. Like the singers at the previous symphony, she is a prominent member of the Metropolitan Opera House company. She was received very kindly and twice recalled after singing her first selection. The aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Die Freischutz," and three songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, were her offerings. Her voice is rather sweet in tone, and she sings with much expression.

An attractive programme is promised for this week's concert, the last of the season. The selections will be all from Beethoven's works, and will comprise the "Lenore, No. 2," overture, the No. 5 symphony and the first act of "Fidelio." The soloists will be Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Emil Fischer, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. A male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society will assist.

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891:::

Tuesday Evening, April 21, at 8.

THIRD CONCERT.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Assisting Artists:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE,

MR. D. KUNTZ.

Programme.

PIANO QUARTET, C major. . . . . ARTHUR FOOTE

Allegro comodo.—Adagio ma non troppo —
Scherzo; vivace.—Allegro non troppo.
DEDICATED TO PROF. J. K. PAINE.

SONGS with Piano.

a) "Stille Sicherheit." . . . . FRANZ
b) "Provencalisches Lied." . . . . SCHUMANN
c) "Auftraege." . . . . SCHUMANN

ANDANTE from Quartet, C major. . . . SVENDSEN

SONGS with Piano.

a) "Auf Waldbekraenzter Hoh'." . . . BRAHMS
b) "Waldwanderung." . . . . GRIEG
c) "Bon Jour, Suzanne." . . . . DELIBES

QUINTET, C major, op. 29. . . . BEETHOVEN

Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo.—Scherzo.—Presto.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 19, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Miss Marie Jahn.

At last evenings symphony concert, the last but one of the season, the orchestra, under Conductor Arthur Nikisch, was heard in Schumann's overture "Genoveva" and the fourth of this composer's symphonies, as well as in Bach's "Praeludium, Adagio and Gavotte" (arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich).

The symphony was the one chosen by Mr. Nikisch for his first appearance before an American audience, and the reading given the work was, on this account, doubly interesting. The gain made in the avoidance of sensational effects was shown in a marked degree, and the performance of the symphony won the heartiest approval of the audience. The Bach selections displayed the string department of the orchestra with the happiest results, and the admirable fashion in which the gavotte was interpreted quite charmed all who heard it, the ovation given Mr. Nikisch at its conclusion being so pronounced that he waived the restrictions concerning encores, and graciously repeated the gavotte movement.

The somewhat familiar overture again had an excellent and, as a whole, although lacking the element of contrast, the instrumental numbers of the evening gave great satisfaction.

Miss Jahn, the soloist, is another of the many singers from the New York Metropolitan Opera House who have met with such favor from the symphony concert management since their season's engagement in the metropolis has ended. She chose for her selection with orchestra the aria from "Freischeutz." "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and for her songs with piano Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau," Wagner's "Wiegenlied," and Lassen's "Fogleid wohin so schnell."

The singer proved unequal to the demands of the "Freischuetz" aria, and her interpretation of the opening movements was little beyond that of an amateur. She gained somewhat more freedom and confidence in the final movement but as a whole her delivery of the grand aria was far below the standard sustained by many competent local artists. She sung the songs with intelligence and taste, but failed to exhibit evidence of sufficient ability as a vocalist to warrant the prominence given her by her selection as soloist. The audience showed a kindly interest in the singer, and recalled her after each of her appearances by their complimentary applause.

The final programme of the season for next Saturday will include Beethoven's overture, "Lenore No. 2"; Beethoven's "Fidelio," first act, the roles being sung as follows: Fidelio, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marzellina, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. [illegible], Male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1891.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert, Miss Marie Jahn, Soloist.

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert was:

Schuman, Overture, "Genoveva."
Weber. Aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischuetz."
Bach. Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte. (Arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.)
Songs with Piano,
a. Rubinstein.....Es blinkt der Thau.
b. Wagner.....Wiegenlied.
c. Lassen .....Voglein wohin so schnell.
Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist.

This programme was originally wholly a romantic one, but for some reason the scherzo and adagio from Bruckner's "Wagner" symphony, the E major, was put aside for the pedantic arrangement by Mr. Bachrich, so that the instrumental list as given consisted of music often tested by our symphony audiences and most of it, under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. The predelection our conductor has for Schumann has brought that composer into unusual prominence during two years; the woes of "Genoveva" were pictured only last season, nor has a year passed since the dramatic coherence of the D-minor symphony was made manifest.

Miss Jahn has the true musical temperament, and she has a good mezzo-soprano voice, but she is not a ripe artist. Before she had become thoroughly schooled in the matter of voice production, it would appear, she took the next step, or what a bruaque friend of ours would say, "piled on the æsthetics." This is dangerous, particularly if the singer be at all emotional, as is the case with Miss Jahn. Miss Jahn was cordially received. The season will close next Saturday with the following most interesting programme:

Beethoven—Overture, "Leonore No. 2."
Beethoven—First act of "Fidelio"; soloists—Fidelio, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marzellina, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizarro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn. Male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.
Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 20, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Miss Jahn as Soloist.

Boston is certainly catholic in its musical tastes, for the frenzy of enthusiasm which greeted Wagner's "Parsifal" last Wednesday was about equalled by the furious applause which greeted a set of Bach pieces at Saturday's concert. The concert began prosily enough with the overture to "Genoveva" by Schumann, which seemed rather blatant and inconsequential, yet this may have been the result of the jaded musical state consequent upon a busy musical season in its last stages. Certainly this overture is one of the most important modern ones, and the diminished sevenths and the pretty violin figures of its beginning are well suited to a tale of chivalry and witchcraft, and the triumph of the close, picturing the victory of good over evil, is an appropriate climax, but personal mood was against the full appreciation of the work, and for the nonce it seemed but a musical New York Ledger story, in which virtue always receives its proper recompense in the last chapter.

The unfavorable impression of the programme was only heightened by the appearance of an amateurish singer, Miss Marie Jahn, who struggled with the great aria of "Der Freischuetz" and was overthrown by it. Certainly this number, prayer and all, has become threadbare to the connoisseur of vocal music, and only the most dramatic of sopranos can make its familiar phrases acceptable, and the singer was not the greatest of sopranos. The heroine of "Der Freischuetz" is a highly emotional young lady, with a capacity for weeping as boundless as that displayed by any of Thackeray's female characters, and her alternation of tender melancholia and hysterical joy does not appeal very strongly to the auditors at this end of the century, accustomed as they are to the more delicate subtleties of emotional expression. The singer did better with a group of three songs of which Mr. Zach played the piano accompaniments in a musicianly manner. In Wagner's "Wiegenlied" especially, Miss Jahn displayed much feeling and good taste. It is unnecessary to state that she was recalled after each of her appearances,—all the artists are; this has become so much a matter of custom that the soloist at these concerts might as well come out twice after his number and save the wear and tear of the hands of the audience, or possibly the orchestra might be given power of attorney in this matter, and do the applauding for the audience altogether.

The rest of the concert was a triumph. The performance of Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, was a very fine one; it may have had more élan, more dash and impetuosity than Bach himself would have given it, but such a modernization is as permissible as to add the stage accessories to a Shakesperian play, and Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for just this brilliancy of reading. The result was amazing. Applause, hearty and long-continued, led to a repetition of the last movement. Even those who do not approve of the readiness with which encores are being accepted at these concerts, will enjoy the fact that it was the king of classical composers who was thus honored. The concert ended with Schumann's symphony in D minor, a work which the composer prized equally with his B flat symphony, as Milton thought his "Paradise Regained" the equal of "Paradise Lost." The reading of the work was more conservative than at its last performance, and the constant treatment of the chief theme in the first movement became a model of clear development. The movements were rather more separated from each other than is customary or desirable, particularly as Schumann desired to give the impression of continuity, but this was a minor fault. The whole work has the restlessness of haphiness, but scarcely expressed in so lofty a manner as in the B flat symphony. Both of these works, however, emphasize the fact that Schumann wrote best in his most contented years, which cannot be said of all composers. Next Saturday, as culmination of the season, there is to be a Beethoven night of great proportions, but alas, without the ninth symphony.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Aria from Freischütz, "Wie nahte der Schlummer".....Weber
Praeludium, adagio and gavotte. (Arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich).....Bach
Songs with piano—
{ Es Blinkt der Thau.....Rubinstein
{ Wiegenlied.....Wagner
{ Voglein Wohin so Schnell.....Lassen
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann

Miss Marie Jahn sang the well known aria from "Der Freischütz," and three songs to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Zach. Her voice is neither disagreeable nor sympathetic. It is without color, but it is not thin or shrill. It is of sufficient compass, and it is flexible enough. It is not an uncommon voice in any respect, and there is no need of discussing it at length.

She sang badly: and here questions of fact are concerned, not questions of taste. Her attack was slovenly in the extreme. She continually struck under the desired tone and then secured it by pulling her voice up to it. As soon as she had achieved this feat, she exploded the tone, and passed on to the next one. A full sustained tone, forte or piano, was rarely heard. Without speaking further of her tone-production and without going into technicalities, it may be said that her spasmodic delivery, added to a frequent and incorrect accentuation of the first beat of the measure, produced the affect known vulgarly as "pumping," and this word is unfortunately regarded by some people as synonomous with "expression." In short, Miss Jahn's performance was an exhibition of the errors, technical and musical, that are so commonly found in the singing of Germans. If Miss Jahn had displayed fine and delicate taste in phrasing, or if she had revealed a marked individuality of temperament, certain of her failings—such as an occasional wandering from the pitch—might have been overlooked; but her performance from the musical-dramatic point of view was conventional and that of an amateur.

To sing at a Symphony concert should be a coveted honor. On the other hand there should be great care exercised in the selection of the singer. The imperfectly prepared, the crude, the bad should be debarred from the privilege of appearing with the orchestra, even if they happen to be of German birth and of German name. It may be said that Miss Jahn was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company; but this fact is not of itself a guarantee of vocal ability. Mielkes and Fischers are exceptions.

It was the intention of the founder of the Symphony concerts that they should be for the amusement and instruction of the people of Boston. They were not intended for the propagandism of any particular musical creed or for the exclusive benefit of German singers. When a singer appears at one of these concerts, the fact that she has been engaged gives—or has given in the past—a certain authority to her performance. Now young singers buy tickets that they may hear her and that they may learn by hearing. When bad singing is not only allowed but even applauded, what inducement have they to work that they may perfect themselves? For they see that which is good and that which is bad rewarded equally by the good natured and thoughtless audience. It is not surprising that they are discouraged; and feeling that the better they sing the less they will be appreciated, they too often seek to gain applause by imitating the vicious tricks of unworthy favorites. And so the standard of the concerts is lowered, the taste of the audience is vitiated, and the students of the art of singing are inclined to doubt the instruction of teachers and their own natural instincts.

The orchestral numbers of the programme do not call for extended remarks. If the performance of the overture and the symphony was marred by occasional listlessness, if at times a coarse vigor was more noticeable than an attempt at nuancirung, if sound degenerated into noise, it must be remembered that the conditions of the temperature and of the air of the hall were most unfavorable, and that the players as well as the director are at the end of an exhausting season.

The Bachrich-Bach arrangement was an interesting number, though such arrangements are of questionable musical worth. The gavotte so pleased the audience that it was played a second time. If this Bachrich is Sigismund Bachrich, the viola player of Vienna, he has had a varied career. For he has been journalist and apothecary; and at one time—naturally, some years ago—he was actively engaged in promoting the crinoline industry.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday, April 25, the last performance of this season, will include Beethoven's "Lenore" overture No. 2; Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; and the first act of "Fidelio." The orchestra will be assisted by Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn, and a male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.

PHILIP HALE.

[128]

BRATTLE HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

:::1891.:::

Tuesday Evening, April 21, at 8.

THIRD CONCERT.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Assisting Artists

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE,

MR. D. KUNTZ.

Programme.

PIANO QUARTET, C minor . . . . . ARTHUR FOOTE

Allegro comodo. Adagio ma non troppo
Scherzo: vivace. Allegro non troppo

DEDICATED TO PROF. J. K. PAINE.

SONGS with Piano.

a) "Stille Sicherheit." . . . . . FRANZ
b) "Provençalisches Lied." . . . . . SCHUMANN
c) "Auftrage." . . . . . SCHUMANN

ANDANTE from Quartet, C major. . . . . . SVENDSEN

SONGS with Piano.

a) "Auf Waldbekränzter Höhe." . . . . . BRAHM.
b) "Waldwanderung." . . . . . GRIEG
c) "Bon Jour, Suzanne." . . . . . DELIBES

QUINTET, C major, op. 29. . . . . . BEETHOVEN

Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo. Scherzo. Presto.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, APRIL 19, 1891.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Miss Marie Jahn.

At last evenings symphony concert, the last but one of the season, the orchestra, under Conductor Arthur Nikisch, was heard in Schumann's overture "Genoveva" and the fourth of this composer's symphonies, as well as in Bach's "Praeludium, Adagio and Gavotte" (arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich).

The symphony was the one chosen by Mr. Nikisch for his first appearance before an American audience, and the reading given the work was, on this account, doubly interesting. The gain made in the avoidance of sensational effects was shown in a marked degree, and the performance of the symphony won the heartiest approval of the audience. The Bach selections displayed the string department of the orchestra with the happiest results, and the admirable fashion in which the gavotte was interpreted quite charmed all who heard it, the ovation given Mr. Nikisch at its conclusion being so pronounced that he waived the restrictions concerning encores, and graciously repeated the gavotte movement.

The somewhat familiar overture again had an excellent and, as a whole, although lacking the element of contrast, the instrumental numbers of the evening gave great satisfaction.

Miss Jahn, the soloist, is another of the many singers from the New York Metropolitan Opera House who have met with such favor from the symphony concert management since their season's engagement in the metropolis has ended. She chose for her selection with orchestra the aria from "Freischeutz." "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and for her songs with piano Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau," Wagner's "Wiegenlied," and Lassen's "Fogleid wohin so schnell."

The singer proved unequal to the demands of the "Freischeutz" aria, and her interpretation of the opening movements was little beyond that of an amateur. She gained somewhat more freedom and confidence in the final movement but as a whole her delivery of the grand aria was far below the standard sustained by many competent local artists. She sung the songs with intelligence and taste, but failed to exhibit evidence of sufficient ability as a vocalist to warrant the prominence given her by her selection as soloist. The audience showed a kindly interest in the singer, and recalled her after each of her appearances by their complimentary applause.

The final programme of the season for next Saturday will include Beethoven's overture, "Leonore No. 2"; Beethoven's "Fidelio," first act, the roles being sung as follows: Fidelio, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marzellina, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn. Male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1891.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert, Miss Marie Jahn, Soloist.

The programme of the twenty-third symphony concert was:

Schuman. Overture, "Genoveva."
Weber. Aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischuetz."
Bach. Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte. (Arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.)

Songs with Piano.

a. Rubinstein.....Es blinkt der Thau.
b. Wagner.....Wiegenlied.
c. Lassen.....Voglein wohin so schnell.

Schumann. Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.

Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist.

This programme was originally wholly a romantic one, but for some reason the scherzo and adagio from Bruckner's "Wagner" symphony, the E major, was put aside for the pedantic arrangement by Mr. Bachrich, so that the instrumental list as given consisted of music often tested by our symphony audiences and most of it, under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. The predelection our conductor has for Schumann has brought that composer into unusual prominence during two years; the woes of "Genoveva" were pictured only last season, nor has a year passed since the dramatic coherence of the D-minor symphony was made manifest.

Miss Jahn has the true musical temperament, and she has a good mezzo-soprano voice, but she is not a ripe artist. Before she had become thoroughly schooled in the matter of voice production, it would appear, she took the next step, or what a brusque friend of ours would say, "piled on the æsthetics." This is dangerous, particularly if the singer be at all emotional, as is the case with Miss Jahn. Miss Jahn was cordially received. The season will close next Saturday with the following most interesting programme:

Beethoven—Overture, "Leonore No. 2."

Beethoven—First act of "Fidelio"; soloists—Fidelio, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marzellina, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizarro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn. Male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.

Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 20, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday—Miss Jahn as Soloist.

Boston is certainly catholic in its musical tastes, for the frenzy of enthusiasm which greeted Wagner's "Parsifal" last Wednesday was about equalled by the furious applause which greeted a set of Bach pieces at Saturday's concert. The concert began prosily enough with the overture to "Genoveva" by Schumann, which seemed rather blatant and inconsequential, yet this may have been the result of the jaded musical state consequent upon a busy musical season in its last stages. Certainly this overture is one of the most important modern ones, and the diminished sevenths and the pretty violin figures of its beginning are well suited to a tale of chivalry and witchcraft, and the triumph of the close, picturing the victory of good over evil, is an appropriate climax, but personal mood was against the full appreciation of the work, and for the nonce it seemed but a musical New York Ledger story, in which virtue always receives its proper recompense in the last chapter.

The unfavorable impression of the programme was only heightened by the appearance of an amateurish singer, Miss Marie Jahn, who struggled with the great aria of "Der Freischuetz" and was overthrown by it. Certainly this number, prayer and all, has become threadbare to the connoisseur of vocal music, and only the most dramatic of sopranos can make its familiar phrases acceptable, and the singer was not the greatest of sopranos. The heroine of "Der Freischuetz" is a highly emotional young lady, with a capacity for weeping as boundless as that displayed by any of Thackeray's female characters, and her alternation of tender melancholia and hysterical joy does not appeal very strongly to the auditors at this end of the century, accustomed as they are to the more delicate subtleties of emotional expression. The singer did better with a group of three songs of which Mr. Zach played the piano accompaniments in a musicianly manner. In Wagner's "Wiegenlied" especially, Miss Jahn displayed much feeling and good taste. It is unnecessary to state that she was recalled after each of her appearances,—all the artists are; this has become so much a matter of custom that the soloist at these concerts might as well come out twice after his number and save the wear and tear of the hands of the audience, or possibly the orchestra might be given power of attorney in this matter, and do the applauding for the audience altogether.

The rest of the concert was a triumph. The performance of Bach's prelude, adagio and gavotte, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, was a very fine one; it may have had more elan, more dash and impetuosity than Bach himself would have given it, but such a modernization is as permissible as to add the stage accessories to a Shakesperian play, and Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for just this brilliancy of reading. The result was amazing. Applause, hearty and long-continued, led to a repetition of the last movement. Even those who do not approve of the readiness with which encores are being accepted at these concerts, will enjoy the fact that it was the king of classical composers who was thus honored. The concert ended with Schumann's symphony in D minor, a work which the composer prized equally with his B flat symphony, as Milton thought his "Paradise Regained" the equal of "Paradise Lost." The reading of the work was more conservative than at its last performance, and the constant treatment of the chief theme in the first movement became a model of clear development. The movements were rather more separated from each other than is customary or desirable, particularly as Schumann desired to give the impression of continuity, but this was a minor fault. The whole work has the restlessness of haphiness, but scarcely expressed in so lofty a manner as in the B flat symphony. Both of these works, however, emphasize the fact that Schumann wrote best in his most contented years, which cannot be said of all composers. Next Saturday, as culmination of the season, there is to be a Beethoven night of great proportions, but alas, without the ninth symphony.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 20.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Aria from Freischütz, "Wie nahte der Schlummer".....Weber
Praeludium, adagio and gavotte. (Arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich).....Bach
Songs with piano—
{ Es Blinkt der Thau.....Rubinstein
{ Wiegenlied.....Wagner
{ Voglein Wohin so Schnell.....Lassen
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann

Miss Marie Jahn sang the well known aria from "Der Freischütz," and three songs to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Zach. Her voice is neither disagreeable nor sympathetic. It is without color, but it is not thin or shrill. It is of sufficient compass, and it is flexible enough. It is not an uncommon voice in any respect, and there is no need of discussing it at length.

She sang badly; and here questions of fact are concerned, not questions of taste. Her attack was slovenly in the extreme. She continually struck under the desired tone and then secured it by pulling her voice up to it. As soon as she had achieved this feat, she exploded the tone, and passed on to the next one. A full sustained tone, forte or piano, was rarely heard. Without speaking further of her tone-production and without going into technicalities, it may be said that her spasmodic delivery, added to a frequent and incorrect accentuation of the first beat of the measure, produced the affect known vulgarly as "pumping," and this word is unfortunately regarded by some people as synonomous with "expression." In short, Miss Jahn's performance was an exhibition of the errors, technical and musical, that are so commonly found in the singing of Germans. If Miss Jahn had displayed fine and delicate taste in phrasing, or if she had revealed a marked individuality of temperament, certain of her failings—such as an occasional wandering from the pitch—might have been overlooked; but her performance from the musical-dramatic point of view was conventional and that of an amateur.

To sing at a Symphony concert should be a coveted honor. On the other hand there should be great care exercised in the selection of the singer. The imperfectly prepared, the crude, the bad should be debarred from the privilege of appearing with the orchestra, even if they happen to be of German birth and of German name. It may be said that Miss Jahn was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company; but this fact is not of itself a guarantee of vocal ability. Mielkes and Fischers are exceptions.

It was the intention of the founder of the Symphony concerts that they should be for the amusement and instruction of the people of Boston. They were not intended for the propagandism of any particular musical creed or for the exclusive benefit of German singers. When a singer appears at one of these concerts, the fact that she has been engaged gives—or has given in the past—a certain authority to her performance. Now young singers buy tickets that they may hear her and that they may learn by hearing. When bad singing is not only allowed but even applauded, what inducement have they to work that they may perfect themselves? For they see that which is good and that which is bad rewarded equally by the good natured and thoughtless audience. It is not surprising that they are discouraged; and feeling that the better they sing the less they will be appreciated, they too often seek to gain applause by imitating the vicious tricks of unworthy favorites. And so the standard of the concerts is lowered, the taste of the audience is vitiated, and the students of the art of singing are inclined to doubt the instruction of teachers and their own natural instincts.

The orchestral numbers of the programme do not call for extended remarks. If the performance of the overture and the symphony was marred by occasional listlessness, if at times a coarse vigor was more noticeable than an attempt at nuancirung, if sound degenerated into noise, it must be remembered that the conditions of the temperature and of the air of the hall were most unfavorable, and that the players as well as the director are at the end of an exhausting season.

The Bachrich-Bach arrangement was an interesting number, though such arrangements are of questionable musical worth. The gavotte so pleased the audience that it was played a second time. If this Bachrich is Sigismund Bachrich, the viola player of Vienna, he has had a varied career. For he has been journalist and apothecary; and at one time—naturally, some years ago—he was actively engaged in promoting the crinoline industry.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday, April 25, the last performance of this season, will include Beethoven's "Lenore" overture No. 2; Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; and the first act of "Fidelio." The orchestra will be assisted by Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn, and a male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[128]

[illegible] Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The [illegible]-third (penultimate) concert, on Friday evening, April 18, was a Symphony night. And the Symphony was a good one. It is more important than to have a new [illegible]. All the rest of the selections, with the exception of one or two songs, were of the true quality which time cannot stale. So was the programme:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva."
Wagner: Aria from Freischütz, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer."
Bach: Præludium, Adagio and Gavotte, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.
Rubinstein: Piano: "Es blinkt der Thau."
Wagner: Wiegenlied.
Lassen: "Vöglein, wohin so schnell?"
Schumann: Op. 120. Fourth Symphony in D minor.
Soloist—Miss Marie Jahn.

Schumann's overture to his only opera, based on a romantic legendary subject, an overture full of passion, terror, tenderness and hope, not borrowing its musical motives from the opera, but foreshadowing its story, suggesting the persecuted pure wife driven out a wanderer in the wilderness, but cheered by approaching sounds of huntsmen, in whom she hopes deliverance, is one of the finest, most original and most exciting of all overtures since Beethoven. It is brilliant in instrumentation, closely woven, never for a moment dull or vague. The fourth horn passage, thrice occurring, sets the blood tingling, and it was clearly, beautifully played.

That, for a beginning, and the D-minor Symphony for the conclusion were assurance of a satisfactory concert. All the well-known movements—leading into one another without pause, so that the symphony is all one piece—were admirably played. First, the moderately slow (ziemlich langsam) Introduction, in which the uniform subdued three-four legato melody is led off by second violins and violas, with bassoons, gradually swelled by the whole orchestra except the brass; then the impatient little snatches in the first violins, which run together and become the leading theme of the lively passionate Allegro; then the lovely Romanza (again ziemlich langsam); the Scherzo and Trio, full of exquisite fancies, subsiding into slow and thoughtful reminiscence of the first Allegro, working up its theme again into the spirited and splendid Finale in D major. It will hurt no one to hear such a symphony, so superbly played, even more than once every season; whereas if you importune for novelties there is no guessing what you will get. Better be sure of something good—good enough to wear for years. The applause which put the stamp on the magnificent performance of the symphony was of the heartiest kind.

The three short arrangements from Bach were (to most of the music-loving audience) an agreeable disappointment after the earlier announcement of two movements from that symphony by Bruckner, which few, once having heard, had any serious longing for again. The Prelude was from the twenty-ninth of Bach's innumerable Church Cantatas, "Wir danken dir, Gott," composed in 1731 for a service held in connection with the inauguration of the town council of Leipzig. Bach wrote it for violins and oboes in unison, viola, three trumpets, timpani, organ obbligato and basso continuo. As now adapted for all the strings alone of the orchestra, it is full of life and seemingly of color, and sounded splendidly; for the musicians seemed inspired with it. It told with quickening and enlivening magic on the audience. The Adagio, rich, deep, full of fervor, followed with fine effect. The more familiar Gavotte delighted everybody; there was no resisting its quick, nervous accent, its marked rhythm, its natural, spontaneous tunefulness, for they played it to a charm. Mr. Nikisch was powerless against so imperative an encore. The people would be satisfied, and the second time the rendering was even more perfect. Surely there is some old music which is still new, to which only new fashions carried to fanaticism can affect indifference.

Miss Marie Jahn is a soprano singer of whom we have not heard before. Her voice has sweetness, volume and a sympathetic quality. There were symptoms of timidity in her delivery of the Freischütz scena, though she seemed to feel the spirit of the music. But the power of her voice seemed to concentrate itself in an explosive way on single emphatic tones, while the intervening melodic figures or phrases were cast too much in the shade, so that the ear could not make out many of the tones. In the songs, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Zach, the case was very much the same. Both in the song by Rubinstein and in that by Wagner, little melodic ideas which seem to haunt one and the other composer, turn up as if by force of habit.

One concert more remains, but one! For that we are to have not the Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which was looked forward to, but what to many will be almost or quite as good: the old Fifth Symphony, preceded by the second "Leonore" overture, and the first act of "Fidelio" by orchestra and singers, namely, Mme. Antonia Mielke, as Fidelio; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, as Marcellina; Mr. Emil Fischer, as Rocco; Mr W. H. Rieger, as Jaquino; Mr. Heinrich Meyn, as Pizarro; and a male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society. We shall have the music and the soul of it, if without action, scenery and costume.

J. S. D.

The Kneisel Quartet will close its series of concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, tomorrow night. The programme includes Beethoven's quintet, op. 29, Andante from Svendsen's quartet in C major, Arthur Foote's quartet for pianoforte and strings (the composer at the pianoforte), and songs which Mrs. Nikisch will sing.

A concert will be given in Pierce Hall, tomorrow night, for the benefit of the Tyler Street [illegible] by Miss Harriet Shaw, harper, Miss

[129]

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEASON OF 1890-91.

* * * * * Hotel List. * * * * *

A. Nikisch. / Mrs. A. Nikisch.	Zach. / Schuecker.	Metzger. / Hackebarth.
F. R. Comee.	Campanari. / Fiumara.	E. Loeffler.
F. Kneisel.	Sauerquell. / Golde.	Berger.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Kluge. / Michael.
Hekking.	Lafricain. / Field.	F. Muller. / Hannemann.
Mole.	Krafft. / J. Edward Eichler.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mahn. / Kuntz.	Keller. / Boehm.	E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.	A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.	Schumann. / Ludwig.
Roth.	Goldschmidt. / Strube.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Simpson.	Knecht. / Sauer.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Schultz. / Hofmann.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Stewart. / Marble.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
Akeroyd. / Greene.		Meyer. / Strasser.

Sautet. Schneider. Hampe, P. Muller. J. Kneisel. Gunzel. Schormann. Barth. McKenzie. Evans.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEASON OF 1890-91.

* * * * * Hotel List. * * * * *

A. Nikisch. / Mrs. A. Nikisch.	Zach. / Schuecker.	Metzger. / Hackebarth.
F. R. Comee.	Campanari. / Fiumara.	E. Loeffler.
F. Kneisel.	Sauerquell. / Golde.	Berger.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Kluge. / Michael.
Hekking.	Lafricain. / Field.	F. Muller. / Hannemann.
Mole.	Krafft. / J. Edward Eichler.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mahn. / Kuntz.	Keller. / Boehm.	E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.	A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.	Schumann. / Ludwig.
Roth.	Goldschmidt. / Strube.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Simpson.	Knecht. / Sauer.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Schultz. / Hofmann.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Stewart. / Marble.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
Akeroyd. / Greene.		Meyer. / Strasser.

Sautet. Schneider. Hampe, P. Muller. J. Kneisel. Gunzel. Schormann. Barth. McKenzie. Evans.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The penultimate programme of the Symphony season began and ended with Schumann—the "Genoveva" overture and the fourth symphony. Midway between these was put Bachrich's excellent arrangement for strings of the prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach, which has often been heard from the Music Hall stage. The orchestra played with the best unanimity of feeling and rhythm; but equal praise could not be given to their work in other respects. They seemed too bent upon taking advantage of every opportunity to play as loud as possible, and so vulgarized and cheapened much of the music. In the Bach the strings often were rough, rasping and irritant, and the blatancy of the brass in the symphony was at times more than discreditable; discreditable it would have been in a common orchestra—in this band it was hardly less than disgraceful. The absolute equality of tone produced by the Seidl orchestra in the "Parsifal," so smooth and clear in the strings, so mellow and suave in the brass—especially the horns and trumpets, from which never came a broken or convulsive note—set many people thinking, and comparisons have been openly and widely made which it would be well for Mr. Higginson to heed and to impress upon Mr. Nikisch ere yet it be too late to preserve the prestige of the organization of which Boston has had in former seasons every reason to be proud. As if this rough and rude treatment of the music were not a sufficient deviation from the good principles and standards of the Symphony concerts, Mr. Nikisch must needs yield to a little unusual clamor, started by a few persistent people, and repeat the Bach gavotte. It may shock the admirers côute qui côute of the orchestra and all its works, but there can be little doubt but that, if Mr. Nikisch keeps on in the downward path along which he has been moving this year, these once unsurpassed concerts will gravitate to the plane of a Neuendorff series for melodramatic excitement, fierce volume, imperious clangor, strident sound and unbridled haste, while they will not have the redeeming elements which are always to be found when that eager and ardent conductor leads—beautifully balanced programmes, choice new compositions and delicacy and fancy when they are really requisite. Some very bad singing was contributed to the programme by Miss Marie Jahn, who has been a light at the Metropolitan during the season, but to whom the audience—using for once its better judgment—gave only mild and purely complimentary recalls. She went through with orchestra the great "Der Freischütz" scene, "Leise, leise," and with songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, which Mr. Nikisch did not apparently think worth while to accompany and so put Mr. Zach at the piano. Miss Jahn is a prepossessing young lady, with a full, agreeable and extended soprano voice; but insufficient training and the ruinous practice of Wagner declamation have virtually wrecked it. It is fluctuant in intonation, so shaken with the tremolo that the question was raised whether she were trying trills or not, fiercely explosive in high notes and as indefinite as a mere streak of sound in intervening bars; her breath is not under control, and her phrasing does not show either keen intelligence or sensible instruction. It was a sad and painful exhibition of how fine natural means may be ruined in the attempt to do something which is not worth the trouble of doing. The season will end tonight with a programme nobly chosen and, we hope, to be correspondingly performed. It is all from Beethoven, and stands thus: The "Lenore, No. 2," overture; the first act of "Fidelio," with Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, and Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn, with the male choir of the Singers; the fifth Symphony.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-third (penultimate) concert, on Saturday evening, April 18, was a Symphony Concert. And the Symphony was a good one, which is more important than to have a new one. All the rest of the selections, with the exception of one or two songs, were of the true stamp, the quality which time cannot stale. So read the programme:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva."
Weber: Aria from Freischütz, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer."
J. S. Bach: Preludium, Adagio and Gavotte, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.
Songs with Piano:
a. Rubinstein: "Es blinkt der Thau."
b. Wagner: Wiezenlied.
c. Lassen: "Vöglein, wohin so schnell?"
Schumann: Op. 120, Fourth Symphony in D minor.
Soloist—Miss Marie Jahn.

Schumann's overture to his only opera, based on a romantic legendary subject, an overture full of passion, terror, tenderness and hope, not borrowing its musical motives from the opera, yet foreshadowing its story, suggesting the persecuted pure wife driven out a wanderer in the wilderness, but cheered by approaching sounds of huntsmen, in whom she hopes deliverance, is one of the finest, most original and most exciting of all overtures since Beethoven. It is brilliant in instrumentation, closely woven, never for a moment dull or vague. The four-horn passage, thrice occurring, sets the blood tingling, and it was clearly, beautifully played.

That, for a beginning, and the D-minor Symphony for the conclusion were assurance of a satisfactory concert. All the well-known movements—leading into one another without pause, so that the symphony is all one piece—were admirably played. First, the moderately slow (ziemlich langsam) introduction, in which the uniform subdued three-four legato melody is led off by second violins and violas, with bassoons, gradually swelled by the whole orchestra except the brass; then the impatient little snatches in the first violins, which run together and become the leading theme of the lively passionate Allegro; then the lovely Romanza (again ziemlich langsam); the Scherzo and Trio, full of exquisite fancies, subsiding into slow and thoughtful reminiscence of the first Allegro, working up its theme again into the spirited and splendid Finale in D major. It will hurt no one to hear such a symphony, so superbly played, even more than once every season; whereas if you importune for novelties there is no guessing what you will get. Better be sure of something good—good enough to wear for years. The applause which put the stamp on the magnificent performance of the symphony was of the heartiest kind.

The three short arrangements from Bach were (to most of the music-loving audience) an agreeable disappointment after the earlier announcement of two movements from that symphony by Bruckner, which few, once having heard, had any serious longing for again. The Prelude was from the twenty-ninth of Bach's innumerable Church Cantatas, "Wir danken dir, Gott," composed in 1731 for a service held in connection with the inauguration of the town council of Leipzig. Bach wrote it for violins and oboes in unison, viola, three trumpets, timpani, organ obbligato and basso continuo. As now adapted for all the strings alone of the orchestra, it is full of life and seemingly of color, and sounded splendidly; for the musicians seemed inspired with it. It told with quickening and enlivening magic on the audience. The Adagio, rich, deep, full of fervor, followed with fine effect. The more familiar Gavotte delighted everybody; there was no resisting its quick, nervous accent, its marked rhythm, its natural, spontaneous tunefulness, for they played it to a charm. Mr. Nikisch was powerless against so imperative an encore. The people would be satisfied, and the second time the rendering was even more perfect. Surely there is some old music which is still new, to which only new fashions carried to fanaticism can affect indifference.

Miss Marie Jahn is a soprano singer of whom we have not heard before. Her voice has sweetness, volume and a sympathetic quality. There were symptoms of timidity in her delivery of the Freischütz scena, though she seemed to feel the spirit of the music. But the power of her voice seemed to concentrate itself in an explosive way on single emphatic tones, while the intervening melodic figures or phrases were cast too much in the shade, so that the ear could not make out many of the tones. In the songs, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Zach, the case was very much the same. Both in the song by Rubinstein and in that by Wagner, little melodic ideas which seem to haunt one and the other composer, turn up as if by force of habit.

One concert more remains, but one! For that we are to have not the Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which was looked forward to, but what to many will be almost or quite as good: the old Fifth Symphony, preceded by the second "Leonore" overture, and the first act of "Fidelio" by orchestra and singers, namely, Mme. Antonia Mielke, as Fidelio; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, as Marcellina; Mr. Emil Fischer, as Rocco; Mr W. H. Rieger, as Jaquino; Mr. Heinrich Meyn, as Pizarro; and a male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society. We shall have the music and the soul of it, if without action, scenery and costume.

J. S. D.

The Kneisel Quartet will close its series of concerts in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, tomorrow night. The programme includes Beethoven's quintet, op. 29, Andante from Svendsen's quartet in C major, Arthur Foote's quartet for pianoforte and strings (the composer at the pianoforte), and songs which Mrs. Nikisch will sing.

A concert will be given in Pierce Hall, tomorrow night, for the benefit of the Tyler Street New Nursery by Miss Harriet Shaw, harper, Miss

[129]

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEASON OF 1890–91.

* * * * * Hotel List. * * * * *

A. Nikisch. / Mrs. A. Nikisch.	Zach. / Schuecker.	Metzger. / Hackebarth.
F. R. Comee.	Campanari. / Fiumara.	E. Loeffler.
F. Kneisel.	Sauerquell. / Golde.	Berger.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Kluge. / Michael.
Hekking.	Lafricain. / Field.	F. Muller. / Hannemann.
Mole.	Krafft. / J. Edward Eichler.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mahn. / Kuntz.	Keller. / Boehm.	E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.	A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.	Schumann. / Ludwig.
Roth.	Goldschmidt. / Strube.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Simpson.	Knecht. / Sauer.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Schultz. / Hofmann.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Stewart. / Marble.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
Akeroyd. / Greene.		Meyer. / Strasser.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEASON OF 1890–91.

* * * * * Hotel List. * * * * *

A. Nikisch. / Mrs. A. Nikisch.	Zach. / Schuecker.	Metzger. / Hackebarth.
F. R. Comee.	Campanari. / Fiumara.	E. Loeffler.
F. Kneisel.	Sauerquell. / Golde.	Berger.
T. Adamowski. / J. Adamowski.	Fiedler. / Moldauer.	Kluge. / Michael.
Hekking.	Lafricain. / Field.	F. Muller. / Hannemann.
Mole.	Krafft. / J. Edward Eichler.	H. Heindl. / Rietzel.
Mahn. / Kuntz.	Keller. / Boehm.	E. M. Heindl. / J. E. Eichler.
Svecenski. / Grunberg.	A. Goldstein. / S. Goldstein.	Schumann. / Ludwig.
Roth.	Goldschmidt. / Strube.	Bareither. / Jennewein.
Simpson.	Knecht. / Sauer.	Fox. / Dietsch.
Swornsbourne. / Schuchmann.	Schultz. / Hofmann.	Demuth. / Reibl.
Stewart. / Marble.	Kolster. / Kuehn.	Gerhardt. / Hoyer.
Akeroyd. / Greene.		Meyer. / Strasser.

Sautet.	J. Kneisel.	Barth.
Schneider.	Gunzel.	McKenzie.
Hampe,	Schormann.	Evans.
P. Muller.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The penultimate programme of the Symphony season began and ended with Schumann—the "Genoveva" overture and the fourth symphony. Midway between these was put Bachrich's excellent arrangement for strings of the prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach, which has often been heard from the Music Hall stage. The orchestra played with the best unanimity of feeling and rhythm; but equal praise could not be given to their work in other respects. They seemed too bent upon taking advantage of every opportunity to play as loud as possible, and so vulgarized and cheapened much of the music. In the Bach the strings often were rough, rasping and irritant, and the blatancy of the brass in the symphony was at times more than discreditable; discreditable it would have been in a common orchestra—in this band it was hardly less than disgraceful. The absolute equality of tone produced by the Seidl orchestra in the "Parsifal," so smooth and clear in the strings, so mellow and suave in the brass—especially the horns and trumpets, from which never came a broken or convulsive note—set many people thinking, and comparisons have been openly and widely made which it would be well for Mr. Higginson to heed and to impress upon Mr. Nikisch ere yet it be too late to preserve the prestige of the organization of which Boston has had in former seasons every reason to be proud. As if this rough and rude treatment of the music were not a sufficient deviation from the good principles and standards of the Symphony concerts, Mr. Nikisch must needs yield to a little unusual clamor, started by a few persistent people, and repeat the Bach gavotte. It may shock the admirers côute qui côute of the orchestra and all its works, but there can be little doubt but that, if Mr. Nikisch keeps on in the downward path along which he has been moving this year, these once unsurpassed concerts will gravitate to the plane of a Neuendorff series for melodramatic excitement, fierce volume, imperious clangor, strident sound and unbridled haste, while they will not have the redeeming elements which are always to be found when that eager and ardent conductor leads—beautifully balanced programmes, choice new compositions and delicacy and fancy when they are really requisite. Some very bad singing was contributed to the programme by Miss Marie Jahn, who has been a light at the Metropolitan during the season, but to whom the audience—using for once its better judgment—gave only mild and purely complimentary recalls. She went through with orchestra the great "Der Freischütz" scene, "Leise, leise," and with songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, which Mr. Nikisch did not apparently think worth while to accompany and so put Mr. Zach at the piano. Miss Jahn is a prepossessing young lady, with a full, agreeable and extended soprano voice; but insufficient training and the ruinous practice of Wagner declamation have virtually wrecked it. It is fluctuant in intonation, so shaken with the tremolo that the question was raised whether she were trying trills or not, fiercely explosive in high notes and as indefinite as a mere streak of sound in intervening bars; her breath is not under control, and her phrasing does not show either keen intelligence or sensible instruction. It was a sad and painful exhibition of how fine natural means may be ruined in the attempt to do something which is not worth the trouble of doing. The season will end tonight with a programme nobly chosen and, we hope, to be correspondingly performed. It is all from Beethoven, and stands thus: The "Lenore, No. 2," overture; the first act of "Fidelio," with Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, and Messrs. Fischer, Rieger and Meyn, with the male choir of the Singers; the fifth Symphony.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

* * 1891. * *

* * * * * ITINERARY. * * * * *

Leave Boston Sunday, April 26, at 7 P.M., via Fall River Line, Providence Depot. Breakfast on boat.

Leave New York Monday, April 27, at 9 A.M., Central Railroad of New Jersey. Annex boat to Jersey City.

Arrive at Philadelphia at 12 M., 24th and Chestnut Sts. Continental Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, April 28, at 10 A.M. Depot 24th and Chestnut Streets.

Arrive Baltimore 12.35 P.M. Carrolton Hotel. Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore (Camden Station B.& O.R.R.) Wednesday, April 29, at 10 A.M.

Arrive Washington 11 A.M. Riggs House. Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P.M

Leave Washington Wednesday, April 29, directly after Concert. B. & O. R.R. Breakfast at Cumberland.

Arrive Pittsburgh Thursday, April 30, at noon. Seventh Avenue Hotel. Concert at Old City Hall, 8.15 P.M. Rehearsal Friday, May 1, at 9.30 A.M. Concert 8.15 P.M.

Leave Pittsburgh via Pennsylvania R. R., Saturday, May 2, at 7 A.M.

Arrive Cleveland at noon Hotel Hollenden. Concert at Music Hall, 8 P.M.

Leave Cleveland, via Detroit and Cleveland Steamship Line, 23 River Street, directly after the Concert.

Arrive Detroit Sunday, May 3, at 7 A.M. Russell House. Concert at Lyceum Theatre, Monday, May 4, at 8 P.M.

Leave Detroit Tuesday, May 5, at 4 P.M. Michigan Central Railroad.

Arrive at Ann Arbor at 5 P.M. Supper at Cook House. Concert at University Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Ann Arbor directly after Concert. Arrive Detroit 11.30 P.M.

Wednesday, May 6, Concert at Lyceum Theatre 8 P.M. Leave Detroit directly after Concert, via Michigan Central Railroad.

Arrive Chicago Thursday, May 7, at 7 A.M. Tremont House. Concert at Central Music Hall, 8 P.M. Friday, May 8, Concert at 8 P.M. Saturday, May 9, Concert at 2 P.M.

Leave Chicago Saturday, May 9, at 8 P.M. via Monon route. Dearborn St.depot.

Arrive Cincinnati Sunday, May 10, at 7 A.M. Grand Hotel. Monday, May 11, Concert at Odeon at 8 P.M.

Leave Cincinnati Tuesday, May 12, at 8 A.M. O. & M. R.R.

Arrive Louisville Tuesday, May 12, at 12 o'clock noon. Galt House. Concert at Amphitheatre Auditorium at 8 P.M. Wednesday, May 13, Concert at 2 P.M. Rehearsal at 8 P.M. Thursday, May 14, Concert at 8 P.M. Friday, May 15, Rehearsal at 10 A.M. Concert at 8 P.M. Saturday, May 16, Concert at 8 P.M.

Leave Louisville, Saturday, May 16, directly after Concert. O. & M. R.R. Breakfast at Kent. Dinner at Meadville.

Arrive Buffalo Sunday, May 17, at 6 P.M. Genesee House.

Monday, May 18, and Tuesday, May 19, Rehearsals. Wednesday, May 20, Concert at 8 P.M. Thursday, May 21, Concert at 2 P.M. Concert at 8 P.M. Friday, May 22, Concert at 8 P.M. Saturday, May 23, Concert at 2 P.M. Concert at 8 P.M.

Leave Buffalo directly after Concert. Exchange street depot. West Shore Line.

Arrive at North Adams, Sunday, May 24, at 9.30 A.M. Breakfast at Wilson House.

Arrive Boston, Sunday, May 24, at 3 P. M.

As all baggage must go on an early train, the members of the Orchestra must have their baggage at Music Hall by 2 P. M., on Sunday, April 26, without fail.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEASON 1890-91.

PRESS COMMENTS.

It goes without saying that in its ten years of existence in Boston the Boston Symphony Orchestra has grown to be one of the established institutions of the city, and how firm a hold this now famous organization has upon the music-lovers of the Hub is attested by the fact that for the past three seasons every seat in Music Hall, with a capacity of 2,400, was sold for the season for each series of twenty-four Friday afternoon Public Rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening Concerts at the annual auction sale in September. At the auction sale last September, the highest premium realized on the sale of season tickets having a face value of $12 was $150 apiece on two seats, or $162 each for the twenty-four concerts, an average of nearly $7 a concert.

But it is not in Boston alone that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has established its high reputation, as the following excerpts from the leading dailies of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Baltimore will amply attest. It will be of interest to know that the scheme for the season includes a series of concerts, given monthly in each of the above cities.

FIRST CONCERT.

New York, Nov. 11, 1890.

World. "The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been regarded among the important musical events of the past few seasons. Those who arrived at Chickering Hall towards the hour for the concert to commence, and had not secured places in advance, found it impossible to get a seat. When Mr. Nikisch made the first rap on his desk, he called to order as fine a band of players as is ever grouped on any concert stage."

Philadelphia, Nov. 12, 1890.

Inquirer. "The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season was given at the Academy of Music* last evening before an audience that crowded every part of the house, and which was enthusiastic to the highest degree. It may be fairly said that the Orchestra never was so strong as at present, never were its interpretations more intelligent, nor its work more delightful."

* Seating capacity 3,000.

Washington, Nov. 13, 1890.

Post. "The Orchestra comes to us this season peerless as ever in all the details which combine to make perfect the interpretation of orchestral music. It is pleasant to add that the house was crowded."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1891.

The whole recital was a treat. The Boston Symphony will be greeted by one of the finest audiences ever gathered together in Cincinnati, as the subscription lists in Church's and Kanner's windows form a rondo ad infinitum of distinguished names. Please, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, give us a grand program—a Brahms or Tschaikowsky symphony or at least the best Schumann and something like a "Faust" overture, Wagner, maybe the new Sgambati symphony or a Dvorak suite or symphony, but please do not give us one of the old "Mother Hubbard" programs. Why not the newest symphonic poem of somebody or other? Mancinelli's "Cleopatra" ("Cleopatra" is now all the rage), or why not the Schumann "Genoveva" overture, or "Don Giovanni" at a pinch (we rarely hear it), or some Massenet, or Benoit, or Draeseke? Some critics here have hinted that we will be put off with one of the old cut and dried programs. Let it not be thus, O Nikisch!

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

* * 1891. * *

* * * * * ITINERARY. * * * * *

Leave Boston Sunday, April 26, at 7 P.M., via Fall River Line, Providence Depot. Breakfast on boat.

Leave New York Monday, April 27, at 9 A.M., Central Railroad of New Jersey. Annex boat to Jersey City.

Arrive at Philadelphia at 12 M., 24th and Chestnut Sts. Continental Hotel. Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.

Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, April 28, at 10 A.M. Depot 24th and Chestnut Streets.

Arrive Baltimore 12.35 P.M. Carrolton Hotel. Concert at Concordia Hall, 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore (Camden Station B.& O.R.R.) Wednesday, April 29, at 10 A.M.

Arrive Washington 11 A.M. Riggs House. Concert at Lincoln Hall, 8 P.M

Leave Washington Wednesday, April 29, directly after Concert. B. & O. R.R. Breakfast at Cumberland.

Arrive Pittsburgh Thursday, April 30, at noon. Seventh Avenue Hotel. Concert at Old City Hall, 8.15 P.M. Rehearsal Friday, May 1, at 9.30 A.M. Concert 8.15 P.M.

Leave Pittsburgh via Pennsylvania R. R., Saturday, May 2, at 7 A.M.

Arrive Cleveland at noon Hotel Hollenden. Concert at Music Hall, 8 P.M.

Leave Cleveland, via Detroit and Cleveland Steamship Line, 23 River Street, directly after the Concert.

Arrive Detroit Sunday, May 3, at 7 A.M. Russell House. Concert at Lyceum Theatre, Monday, May 4, at 8 P.M.

Leave Detroit Tuesday, May 5, at 4 P.M. Michigan Central Railroad.

Arrive at Ann Arbor at 5 P.M. Supper at Cook House. Concert at University Hall, at 8 P.M.

Leave Ann Arbor directly after Concert. Arrive Detroit 11.30 P.M.

Wednesday, May 6, Concert at Lyceum Theatre 8 P.M. Leave Detroit directly after Concert, via Michigan Central Railroad.

Arrive Chicago Thursday, tral Music Hall, 8 P. 9, Concert at 2 P.M.

Leave Chicago Saturday, M

Arrive Cincinnati Sunday, Concert at Odeon at Leave Cincinnati Tuesday,

Arrive Louisville Tuesday, at Amphitheatre Au 2 P.M. Rehearsal a day, May 15, Rehears 16, Concert at 8 P.M.

Leave Louisville, Saturday Breakfast at Kent.

Arrive Buffalo Sunday, Ma

Monday, May 18, and Tues cert at 8 P.M. Thu Friday, May 22, Con Concert at 8 P.M.

Leave Buffalo directly af Line.

Arrive at North Adams, S House.

Arrive Boston, Sunday, M

As all baggage must g must have their baggage a fail.

SECOND CONCERT.

New York, Dec. 9, 1890.

Herald. "The second concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Chickering Hall last night in the presence of an enthusiastic audience that crowded the building. When the Boston Orchestra first played here under Mr. Gericke's direction three years ago, New York's music-lovers were surprised at the perfection shown, but rather averse to acknowledging that another American city possessed any musical organization of which the metropolis could be jealous. Such a feeling did not, however, present the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts from receiving generous and constantly increasing support, so that last season there was a substantial profit, and this year the subscribers practically take the whole house. In certain respects, the work of the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of our far-famed Philharmonic Society."

Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1890.

Ledger. "The Academy of Music was filled last night almost to its seating capacity by lovers of good music, and they were well rewarded for their attendance. It would be a needless consumption of space and the reader's time to multiply praiseful terms over the superb effectiveness of the band in any particular portion of the list. It need only be added that Mr. Nikisch, who again conducted the orchestral numbers without as much as glancing at a note, gave of each a reading that was comprehensive, animated, and highly satisfying throughout."

Washington, Dec. 11, 1890.

Post. "From its initial appearance in Washington the Symphony Orchestra has owned a devoted clientele in the capital city, very justly proportioned to the superlatively artistic merits of this matchless band. Through every change of personnel and leadership its high standard of excellence has been not merely maintained, but advanced; and it is safe to say it has never presented a programme of more absorbing interest than that of last night. Many musical enthusiasts tested the acoustic excellence of the hall in the outlying precincts sacred to 'standing room only.'"

Baltimore, Dec. 12, 1890.

American. "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the largest organization of the kind that ever travelled in America, arrived yesterday from Washington, where they gave a concert on Thursday. Certainly not since the days of Parepa has Concordia Hall contained such an elegant and fashionable audience. . . . The production of the 'Eroica' symphony of Beethoven by this splendid orchestra gave unbounded satisfaction to the large audience, and Mr. Nikisch was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again. . . . The first concert by the Boston Orchestra this season in Baltimore was an unqualified success."

THIRD CONCERT.

New York, Jan. 13, 1891.

Tribune. "Our friends who have been indulging in superlatives in their comments on the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be put to their trumps now if they try to convey an adequate idea of the excellences of the third concert which took place at Chickering Hall on Tuesday night. New Yorkers are less concerned about Mr. Nikisch's programmes and solo performers than about the playing of his orchestra. The New Yorkers have learned to expect delights which their own organizations cannot provide. The house was crowded."

H. E. KREHBIEL.

Philadelphia, Jan. 14, 1891.

North American. "The third in the current series of Boston Symphony concerts took place at the Academy of Music last evening, and was brilliantly successful in every way. A great audience, one that filled every seat in the house and made even standing room hard to get, was present, and a singularly well-chosen and attractive programme was rendered in a way that left nothing to be desired. Schubert's B minor symphony was played here two weeks ago by the Thomas Orchestra, but it is a composition of such extraordinary charm that it was a pleasure to hear it again, and the interpretation of it given by Mr. Nikisch was exquisitely beautiful. Not less delightful in a widely different way was the playing of the Mendelssohn music. It could not have been more delicate or brilliant. Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra, however, did not carry off all the honors of the evening. A good part of them fell to the share of Mrs. Nikisch, who was the soloist of the occasion. Her voice is a strong, agreeable mezzo-soprano of ample volume and excellent quality. In the songs with piano Mrs. Nikisch was accompanied by her husband, who showed himself to be as good an accompanist as Georg Henschel."

Baltimore, Jan. 16, 1891.

Sun. "The Baltimore people appreciate the splendid work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night every seat in the house was filled and many persons were compelled to stand. While the programme was not of such great interest as the last concert, it was a superb one, and almost spoiled the audience for less artistic performances. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's first appearance created general interest, and the singing was well received. Mrs. Nikisch has not a great voice, but a remarkably pleasing one. She was formerly a light opera singer, and has performed successfully in the Stadt Theatre, Leipsic, and the Hof Theatre, Cologne. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her on the piano, and no more exquisitely played accompaniments were ever heard in Baltimore."

FOURTH CONCERT.

New York, Feb. 24, 1891.

Herald. "The fourth and last of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra give here this season took place in Chickering Hall last evening in the presence of an audience that filled the house to the doors, and was marked by even more than the customary applause with which the work of Herr Nikisch and his men is always welcomed. It is pleasant to record that the financial as well as the artistic success of these concerts has been such as to warrant a series of six next winter. Last night's concert again demonstrated very plainly that in some respects the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations. Nothing more beautifully finished than the playing of the Brahms symphony or of the 'Waldweben' music from 'Siegfried' has been heard here."

Philadelphia, Feb. 25, 1891.

North American. "Despite the driving rain-storm, the Academy of Music was crowded last night as it rarely is, except on very great occasions, the attraction being the fourth in Mr. Nikisch's current season of symphony concerts. All the seats in the auditorium and most of the aisles were occupied with more or less damp but agreeably expectant people, and when the dapper little conductor, looking, as usual, like a work of art, stepped upon the stage he faced a larger audience than he had ever before confronted in Philadelphia. It is remarkable, or it would be remarkable if they were less meritorious, how popular these Boston Symphony concerts have become in this city. Each time the attendance is larger than the last. The secret of it, of course, is that the public has grown to appreciate the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra."

Washington, Feb. 26, 1891.

Post. "Another immense audience defied Gen. Greely the Weather Bureau and weather, and deified Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fourth concert of that extravagantly worshipped organization at Lincoln Hall last night. The weather, indeed, was not a factor in the case at all, as every seat in the house had been engaged before anyone could know what particular degree of vileness the weather would attain. The audience was of the usual distinction characteristic of the symphony concerts, and the Presidential and cabinet families, and a good working or rather listening majority of the people most prominent in capitoline society were present in the boxes, chairs, and circles. Every programme of the symphony players by some subtle sorcery seems a little better than the last."

Baltimore, Feb. 27, 1891.

American. "In every possible way this concert was an immense success. A fine program, a superb orchestra, a grand leader, an unrivalled soloist, and a large audience to inspire them all. Come again, and whenever you come, welcome!

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1891

The twenty-third Symphony concert took place last Saturday evening; and so far as the program or the playing of the orchestra is concerned, it does not demand special attention. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, the one chosen by Mr. Nickisch for his first appearance. When it was played at the opening concert of last season, the treatment of the brass caused astonishment, if not consternation. Since then we have become accustomed to such musical cyclones, and so, particularly after the preceding Symphony concert, the performance of Saturday evening occasioned no surprise.

* * * * * *

The other orchestral numbers were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and a prelude, adagio and gavotte of Bach, arranged for strings by Bachrich. The propriety of such arrangements has lately been discussed in the HOME JOURNAL, and perhaps there is no need at present of discussing the vexed question of whether Bach should be modernized or whether vague traditions should be still more vaguely followed. The gavotte was played with such energy and with such a swing that it was re-demanded, and Mr. Nikisch good-naturedly yielded to the imperative request.

* * * * * *

Miss Marie Jahn sang the aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" from "Der Freischuetz," and three songs: "Es blinkt der Thau" by Rubinstein; "Wiegenlied," by Wagner, and "Voglein wohin so schnell," by Lassen. The pianoforte accompaniments of these songs were played by Mr. Zach.

* * * * * *

The singing of Miss Jahn last Saturday can not be commended from any point of view. It was faulty from the pedagogue's standpoint; it was amateurish in conception and expression. Throughout the evening she seldom attacked a tone frankly and directly. She constantly "scooped," and this offense was so aggravated that her delivery of a phrase might be mathematically expressed by a series of semi-circles. When she had finally caught the desired tone she did not sustain it, but she shattered it. And so in a phrase there would be one explosion of great force, and the other notes of the phrase seemed merely the resultant debris. The voice itself, while it is not remarkable in any respect, is of good quality and sufficient compass. Nor were her occasional deviations from the pitch a proof that her ear is necessarily lacking in sensitiveness; for such deviations inevitably follow such a faulty method of singing.

* * * * * *

The grievous errors of tone-production and the imperfect technique noticed in her performance were not atoned for by any display of musical temperament or fine artistic feeling. On the contrary her reading of the aria—and by the way, it is a question whether such arias should have a place upon the concert stage—was that of a beginner. The recitatives were declaimed without dramatic meaning, the prayer was disfigured by an irreverent burst of would-be expression at the very beginning, and the allegro was a scramble and a jumble.

* * * * * *

The same faults and omissions were noticeable in the singing of the three songs; and it is not too much to say, that at no time in the evening did Miss Jahn give by her performance any sufficient explanation of her appearance at a symphony concert.

* * * * * *

And yet she was most heartily applauded by the audience, and she was recalled two or three times after the aria and once after the songs. Now if applause means anything, it signifies that in this case the great majority of the hearers approved of her singing and enjoyed it. However, the good nature of a symphony audience has become proverbial. Our audiences in general are long suffering, patient, and of an endurance that is akin to heroism. But if Mrs. Mielke and Miss Jahn are equally applauded by practically the same audience, and that within the space of two weeks, does it not seem as though the audience lacked discrimination? Good-nature is often to be censured rather than approved. Tolerance of that which is vicious in art is bad enough; but when the lame and halting performance of an inferior singer is enthusiastically received, perhaps the audience should be blamed as well as the singer.

* * * * * *

Or is singing fast becoming a lost art? In former years were audiences in Boston so careless concerning the quality of song? Instrumental music was not so common. Orchestras had not stunned and confused the ear. There were evenings in the winter free from pianoforte recitals. Wagner declaimers had not made their preposterous claims. Germany was not regarded as the only nursery for singers. And the singer's art was considered, not her birth place. But we have changed all that.

* * * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

In the closing concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra in Music hall last evening, the following Beethoven programme was given:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 2; the fifth symphony; the first act of "Fidelio," solos by Mmes. Mielke and Nikisch and Messrs. Fischer, Meyn, and Rieger; male chorus from the Singers' society.

There was an immense audience present and much enthusiasm. A summary of the season will be given next week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

BRILLIANT CLOSING OF A SUCCESSFUL SERIES OF CONCERTS.

The twenty-fourth rehearsal and concert, the closing performances of the tenth season, were made memorable, as has frequently been the case in past years, by being devoted to Beethoven. This time, however, the first act of "Fidelio," instead of the Ninth Symphony, was the notable feature of the programme. The soloists were: Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Mr. Emil Fischer, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Heinrich Meyn; and the Male Chorus was from the Boston Singers' Society.

The opening number was the "Leonore" overture, No. 2. which was played so finely as to demonstrate that both conductor and men were fully imbued with the spirit of the occasion. Then came the duet between Marcelina and Jacquino, "At last, dear, I find you alone," sung by Mrs. Hascall and Mr. Rieger smoothly, but with scarcely sufficient volume of tone. In the aria, "O day of joy," Mrs. Hascall was more satisfactory, and held her own against the orchestra fairly well. Her strongest effort of all was in the quartet, "He doth to me incline," where her excellent voice came out clearly and effectively, particularly in the first few measures. This number, in which Mme. Mielke, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Rieger joined, was expressively given, although the tempo seemed just enough too slow to make it somewhat heavy and lifeless.

Mr. Fischer's solo, "Life is nothing without money," was sung with spirit, recalling his capital impersonation of Rocco in the performance of the opera a year ago. The trio, "Well said my son," was also effective, Mrs. Hascall sustaining her part well, and Mme. Mielke's strong, sincere voice imparting to it life and character. Mr. Meyn in his vigorous and artistic rendering of Pizarro's aria, "Ha! what a day is this," gave further evidence of the dramatic ability that he evinced in "Parsifal," and if his voice were more powerful his success would have been complete. In the following duet he was equally successful, while Mr. Fischer displayed in his part not a little pathos.

The great number of the act, "Thou monstrous fiend," was now sung by Mme. Mielke in an entirely befitting manner. Her delivery of the recitative was broad and fraught with significance; and throughout both recitative and the aria "Oh hope, thou wilt not let the star," her singing was fervid and dramatic, the singing of a true artist. Her voice, too, was almost always agreeable in quality, excepting the high B of the adagio, and the lowest notes that followed it, were rather unmusical; an occasional false intonation was also noticeable. The tremendous applause that followed the conclusion of this number showed how fully her efforts were appreciated.

The beautiful "Prisoners chorus" was finely and sympathetically sung by the members of Mr. Osgood's society; and he is to be thanked for the thorough drilling they had evidently received. In the long finale, soloists and chorus did their best, which, of necessity, insured an artistic performance; and thus was the act brought to a successful termination. The orchestral playing was evenly good, although some of the accompaniments were too loud. One of Mr. Nikisch's weaknesses is that he frequently neglects to keep in mind the limitations of the voice.

The concert closed with a great performance of the fifth symphony. All its strong points were brought out with splendid emphasis, and the playing, as a whole, was finished to a degree that left little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch adhered in the main to his reading of last year except that he seemed to exact a less strenuous tone from the instruments; and his treatment of the entire work showed the influence of Wagner's views on conducting in general, and Beethoven in particular. Mr. Santet distinguished himself by his highly expressive phrasing of the noted cadenza in the first movement; the passage for wood-wind in the andante was played with purity of tone and accuracy; the double basses were up to their mark in the trio of the scherzo; and the famous "pedal point" leading to the finale was worked up with an effect that was thrilling. The finale itself was magnificently performed; and at the end conductor and players were greeted with tremendous applause.

So ends the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concerts of which have been the means of raising the musical standard of the city to its present altitude. The list of works performed clearly indicates the enormous amount of work that has been accomplished; and when this fact is considered, fault-finding seems ungraceous. Still, it would seem an easy matter to present more thoughtfully arranged programmes. Naturally, much extra time is consumed in rehearsing new, or unfamiliar works. But in many instances, the programmes have contained one number which might well have been spared, and which served only to neutralize the effect of the programme as a whole. If the time thus spent were devoted to rehearsing new works, or to a more thorough preparation of those that have become standard, better results would be obtained.

We have heard a rumor that some plan is to be adopted next autumn which will enable people of moderate means to secure their tickets at moderate prices. This is fully in accord with Mr. Higginson's original intentions, as expressed by himself; but how it is to be accomplished is a mystery. The auction system seems by far the best; still it affords the rich an opportunity to bid prices up. If the old plan of standing in line again prevails, nothing can prevent speculators from securing as many tickets as they wish.

There still remains one other plan, however, which, if adopted, would be a decided benefit to many musical persons, students especially. The upper gallery might be kept unreserved for the concerts as they already are for the rehearsals. It is true that much determination of mind and activity of body are required to endure the crush and to obtain a seat. But this is also true in European concerts and theatres; and after all it is a good test of one's earnestness of desire to listen to the music of the great masters.

When all is said and done, the enormous benefit of this great Boston institution must be admitted; and if it has at times during the past season shown symptoms of becoming a follower instead of a leader of musical opinion, there can be no doubt that this state of affairs will not long continue.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 27, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

END OF THE SEASON SATURDAY NIGHT.

It is not wholly improbable that there were well educated musicians in the audience in Music Hall Saturday evening who could consistently enjoy the concert on account of its being the last of an altogether too prolonged series. The works performed were all by Beethoven and included the overture, "Lenore No. 2," the first act of "Fidelio" and the fifth symphony. The singers for the "Fidelio" music were Mme. Antonia Mielke, Leonora; Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Marcellina; Mr. Emil Fischer, Rocco; Mr. W. H. Rieger, Jaquino; and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Pizzaro. The second overture to "Lenore" was uncommonly well played, and such portions of the "Fidelio" music as were assigned Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Emil Fischer were magnificently sung. Mr. Nikisch's revised reading of the fifth symphony was a much needed improvement upon that of last year; but while all this is true, yet the concert as a whole was by no means so praiseworthy as similar concerts have been in previous years. Neither can the entire series be rated as comparing favorably with that of last year. An unusual number of the soloists engaged, especially the singers, have been entitled to almost anything else than an artistic rating.

In his selection of vocalists Mr. Nikisch upon several occasions has most seriously erred. It is true that in this respect he has proven himself to be a very kind-hearted musician who has desired to please every body even at the hazardous expense of his artistic reputation; yet any well informed person who has attended the symphony concerts will enter an indignant protest against his so-called charity for amateurism and charlatanry and it has often hampered him in his selection of soloists. Either this or else Mr. Nikisch is a very poor judge of what good singing really is, which is not wholly improbable. For example, the very zealous and painstaking young lady who essayed the role of Marcellina, Saturday evening, seemed wholly out of place. While she doubtless is a society favorite of excellent reputation, she should refrain from appearing in public in the role of a soloist. She is wont to sing in an unknown tongue. While nature has been more than kind to her as regards voice, she knows not how to use this voice; and this is clearly shown by the very throaty and disagreeable quality of its tones above the mezzo range. True she was loudly applauded, but we all know from experience that audiences seldom know how, when or whom to applaud; and the symphony concert audiences, as a rule, are almost invariably governed by oracles whom they are incapable of understanding. Mr. Heinrich Meyn appeared in the role of Pizzaro. Mr. Meyn, aside from attempts to sing in Music Hall, is doubtless a very good musician, but his pantomimic performance of the great aria, "Ha! What a Day is This!" was well nigh humorous in its effect. His voice was almost inaudible at times, and this was not the fault of the orchestra, which played none too loud for the dramatic requirements of the aria. It was Mr. Meyn's own fault. The Jaquino of Mr. W. H. Rieger was somewhat quaintly, inoffensively sung, save in the great quartet "He Doth to Me Incline," in which he contributed a very generous share to the well nigh sacrilegious effect of the performance. As regards quality of tone, there was but little if any fault to be found with the chorus, yet that none of the chorus singing was satisfactory seemed almost wholly due to the apparent unconsciousness of Mr. Nikisch that any such element as a chorus was participating in the performance; and he conducted accordingly. And now a very hearty crescendo can be made from blame to praise. Mme. Mielke's Leonora can be warmly commended. Purity, earnestness, depth of feeling and artistic loveliness predominated in all that the artiste had to do, and a very high value must be placed upon her musical intelligence. The eloquence of her interpretation as she sang the great aria "Thou Monstrous Fiend" and the passion and power of her singing have seldom been equalled here. In brief, her singing was as near an approach to perfection in tone, taste, knowledge, sensibility and expression as it is scarcely possible to imagine.

The applause that Mme Mielke received was hearty, unequivocal and for once free from all suspicion of artificial zeal. As Rocco Mr. Emil Fischer added new lustre to his fame, and, as has been intimated, Mme. Mielke and Mr. Fischer were the only singers in the performance that can be honestly praised. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the fifth symphony was a decided improvement upon that of last year; yet the interpretation of the first movement, while heartfelt, warm and exuberant, was seldom true in spirit; neither was it in accordance with the noble nature of Beethoven's music. It cannot be said of Mr. Nikisch that the ruling bias of his mind is to loyalty in his treatment of the classics; yet he is not without many fine susceptibilities and a warm, keen sense of the poetic. Of affectation he can neither be vindicated nor very loudly pronounced guilty. It should be born in mind that a musician of his temperament has privileges of his own, but the wild and headstrong temper to which he almost invariably submits the music can not be too severely condemned. Regarding the recent series of concerts, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that the programmes, as a rule, have been exceptionally well-chosen. Only three works of Brahms have been played, and even for this praiseworthy self-denial on Mr. Nikisch's part let us be thankful. The order in which the composers or their works have been favored is about as follows, namely: Ten selections by Wagner have been performed, nine by Beethoven, five by Litz, Mendelssohn four and Schumann four. The list otherwise includes Bach, Berlioz, Burmeister, Chadwick, Cherubini, David, Dvorak, Foote, Gade, Gounod, Gluck, Godard, Goldmark, Grieg, Handel, Haydn, Henberger, Lulo, Mackenzie, Moszkowsky, Paderewski, Raff, Reinecke, Saint-Saens, Scharwenka, Schubert, Sgambati, Smetana, Spohr, Volkmann, Whiting and Wienawski.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last concert of this season, was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Lenore No 2" .....
Fidelio, Act I. ..... } Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 .....

Although the artistic fitness of presenting in concert form a fragment of an opera without the action, scenery and costumes may be questioned, such a question must give way to this greater one: Is it better for an audience to hear portions of an opera, mangled and imperfect, than for it to be debarred from becoming acquainted with even the dissecta membra of a great work. For here in Boston this problem is put to us.

The Operatic Festival of April 7, the late performance of "Parsifal" and the popular success of "Fidelio" last Saturday show conclusively that the music lovers of this town hunger after opera; and they are willing to pay out money and to endure necessarily imperfect representations that they may taste for a moment a forbidden pleasure. They will listen to good, bad and indifferent singers, and they will applaud alike the endeavor, the failure and the triumph. To be sure, this shows patience and zeal rather than discrimination, but if this patience and this zeal were eventually rewarded; if for even a few weeks in the year, there might be representations of opera, not on a too ambitious scale but respectable and complete, audiences would be more fastidious after the hunger-pangs were satisfied. But the operas should be sung in the English language.

There are, however, illustrious precedents for giving fragments of operas, oratorios, masses and cantatas in symphony concerts. Take, for example, the programmes of the world-renowned concerts of the Paris Conservatory, concerts that have been for over sixty years a glory to France. The programme of the first concert given the 9th of March, 1828, was made up of eight numbers, four of which were vocal. Two choruses by Cherubini were sung: one from "Blanche de Provence," the other from the three-voiced "Coronation Mass." And looking through the histories of these concerts by Elwart and Deldevez, it will be seen that at each concert choruses from forgotten or rarely heard operas, selections from masses and cantatas stand side by side with symphonies and other instrumental music.

The programme of the concert given the 5th of this month included Schumann's symphony in D minor, a concerto by Mozart for two pianos, the "Coriolanus" overture, Massenet's "Biblis," and the choruses "For Unto Us" and "Hallelujah" from the "Messiah."

The chorus of the Conservatory concerts is made up of about seventy-five picked voices, and the soloists are taken from the most celebrated singers of Paris. When the concerts started there were eighty-eight players to seventy-two singers, and Deldevez recommended for extraordinary occasions 126 singers and 121 players. For long ago they knew in Paris that perfect execution of music by a limited force is "far more delightful and far less fatiguing than the irregular roar and hum of multitudinous mediocrity."

Now I do not say that the constant employment in our Symphony concerts of a well selected chorus is practicable or desirable. And yet what genuine pleasure, what an opportunity for instruction would be given by the introduction of choral numbers or concerted pieces from works known to us now only by name, if they were chosen in a catholic spirit, if they truly represented the schools of all countries from the time when the Netherlanders ruled supreme in music.

Saturday's performance of the first act of "Fidelio" must of course be regarded only from the standpoint of the concert-room. The hall was crowded, and each number was loudly applauded. Indeed, the applause was more hearty than discriminating, for in each and every instance the verdict of the audience was favorable to the singer. But only Mrs. Mielke (Leonora) and Mr. Fischer (Rocco) were equal to the demands made upon them, and the singing of the former cannot be praised unreservedly. Mrs. Hascall (Marcellina), Mr. Rieger (Jaquino), and Mr. Meyn (Pizarro) were earnest and faithful in the endeavor, but the results of their endeavors were far from satisfactory. It must be said in Mr. Meyn's behalf that Beethoven wrote a cruel part for the voice of the cruel Governor. The solos of Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Fischer were sung with much dramatic spirit, and they were certainly the musical peaks of the performance. The favorite quartette was taken at an unusually slow pace; the voices did not blend; the walk of the parts was not clearly defined; there were deviations from the pitch. The chorus, taken from the Boston Singers' Society, was awkwardly placed, and probably for that reason the effect of the finale did not meet the expectation. The orchestral accompaniment was often boisterous.

While Mr. Nikisch in his reading of the Fifth Symphony still follows in many respects the ideas of Wagner and Richter, the performance of Saturday evening was more conservative than the famous one of last season. It was more sane, it was more musical. There was much to praise. There was too little to censure. Surely no thoughtful person could have objected to the declamation of the opening phrase with its fermata. There was a commendable absence of false and exaggerated sentiment in the reading of the opening phrases of the second and third movements. And throughout the symphony the brass was not so overblown as on that memorable night last season.

Maurice Kufferath has lately written an essay on Richter's direction of this symphony, in which he analyzes Richter's methods and gives their musical explanation. As Mr. Nikisch follows closely with Richter the principles laid down by Wagner, this phamplet "L'Art de diriger l'orchestre" will be of benefit to any one interested in the proper or improper performance of the symphony.

Although the concert was very long—too long, in fact—the enthusiasm of the audience was unabated, and at the end of the symphony Mr. Nikisch was vehemently applauded.

The next concert will be given Saturday evening, Oct. 10. PHILIP HALE.

[131]

HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1891

The twenty-third Symphony concert took place last Saturday evening; and so far as the program or the playing of the orchestra is concerned, it does not demand special attention. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D minor, the one chosen by Mr. Nickisch for his first appearance. When it was played at the opening concert of last season, the treatment of the brass caused astonishment, if not consternation. Since then we have become accustomed to such musical cyclones, and so, particularly after the preceding Symphony concert, the performance of Saturday evening occasioned no surprise.

* * * * *

The other orchestral numbers were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and a prelude, adagio and gavotte of Bach, arranged for strings by Bachrich. The propriety of such arrangements has lately been discussed in the HOME JOURNAL, and perhaps there is no need at present of discussing the vexed question of whether Bach should be modernized or whether vague traditions should be still more vaguely followed. The gavotte was played with such energy and with such a swing that it was re-demanded, and Mr. Nikisch goodnaturedly yielded to the imperative request.

* * * * *

Miss Marie Jahn sang the aria "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" from "Der Freischuetz," and three songs: "Es blinkt der Thau" by Rubinstein; "Wiegenlied," by Wagner, and "Voglein wohin so schnell," by Lassen. The pianoforte accompaniments of these songs were played by Mr. Zach.

* * * * *

The singing of Miss Jahn last Saturday can not be commended from any point of view. It was faulty from the pedagogue's standpoint; it was amateurish in conception and expression. Throughout the evening she seldom attacked a tone frankly and directly. She constantly "scooped," and this offense was so aggravated that her delivery of a phrase might be mathematically expressed by a series of semi-circles. When she had finally caught the desired tone she did not sustain it, but she shattered it. And so in a phrase there would be one explosion of great force, and the other notes of the phrase seemed merely the resultant debris. The voice itself, while it is not remarkable in any respect, is of good quality and sufficient compass. Nor were her occasional deviations from the pitch a proof that her ear is necessarily lacking in sensitiveness; for such deviations inevitably follow such a faulty method of singing.

* * * * *

The grievous errors of tone-production and the imperfect technique noticed in her performance were not atoned for by any display of musical temperament or fine artistic feeling. On the contrary her reading of the aria—and by the way, it is a question whether such arias should have a place upon the concert stage—was that of a beginner. The recitatives were declaimed without dramatic meaning, the prayer was disfigured by an irreverent burst of would-be expression at the very beginning, and the allegro was a scramble and a jumble.

* * * * *

The same faults and omissions were noticeable in the singing of the three songs; and it is not too much to say, that at no time in the evening did Miss Jahn give by her performance any suffcient explanation of her appearance at a symphony concert.

* * * * *

And yet she was most heartily applauded by the audience, and she was recalled two or three times after the aria and once after the songs. Now if applause means anything, it signifies that in this case the great majority of the hearers approved of her singing and enjoyed it. However, the good nature of a symphony audience has become proverbial. Our audiences in general are long suffering, patient, and of an endurance that is akin to heroism. But if Mrs. Mielke and Miss Jahn are equally applauded by practically the same audience, and that within the space of two weeks, does it not seem as though the audience lacked discrimination? Good-nature is often to be censured rather than approved. Tolerance of that which is vicious in art is bad enough; but when the lame and halting performance of an inferior singer is enthusiastically received, perhaps the audience should be blamed as well as the singer.

* * * * *

Or is singing fast becoming a lost art? In former years were audiences in Boston so careless concerning the quality of song? Instrumental music was not so common. Orchestras had not stunned and confused the ear. There were evenings in the winter free from pianoforte recitals. Wagner declaimers had not made their preposterous claims. Germany was not regarded as the only nursery for singers. And the singer's art was considered, not her birth place. But we have changed all that.

* * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

In the closing concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra in Music hall last evening, the following Beethoven programme was given:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 2; the fifth symphony; the first act of "Fidelio," solos by Mmes. Mielke and Nikisch and Messrs. Fischer, Meyn, and Rieger; male chorus from the Singers' society.

There was an immense audience present and ch enthusiasm. A summary of the season will be given next week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

BRILLIANT CLOSING OF A SUCCESSFUL SERIES OF CONCERTS.

The twenty-fourth rehearsal and concert, the closing performances of the tenth season, were made memorable, as has frequently been the case in past years, by being devoted to Beethoven. This time, however, the first act of "Fidelio," instead of the Ninth Symphony, was the notable feature of the programme. The soloists were: Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Mr. Emil Fischer, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Heinrich Meyn; and the Male Chorus was from the Boston Singers' Society.

The opening number was the "Leonore" overture, No. 2. which was played so finely as to demonstrate that both conductor and men were fully imbued with the spirit of the occasion. Then came the duet between Marcelina and Jacquino, "At last, dear, I find you alone," sung by Mrs. Hascall and Mr. Rieger smoothly, but with scarcely sufficient volume of tone. In the aria, "O day of joy," Mrs. Hascall was more satisfactory, and held her own against the orchestra fairly well. Her strongest effort of all was in the quartet, "He doth to me incline," where her excellent voice came out clearly and effectively, particularly in the first few measures. This number, in which Mme. Mielke, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Rieger joined, was expressively given, although the tempo seemed just enough too slow to make it somewhat heavy and lifeless.

Mr. Fischer's solo, "Life is nothing without money," was sung with spirit, recalling his capital impersonation of Rocco in the performance of the opera a year ago. The trio, "Well said my son," was also effective, Mrs. Hascall sustaining her part well, and Mme. Mielke's strong, sincere voice imparting to it life and character. Mr. Meyn in his vigorous and artistic rendering of Pizarro's aria, "Ha! what a day is this," gave further evidence of the dramatic ability that he evinced in "Parsifal," and if his voice were more powerful his success would have been complete. In the following duet he was equally successful, while Mr. Fischer displayed in his part not a little pathos.

The great number of the act, "Thou monstrous fiend," was now sung by Mme. Mielke in an entirely befitting manner. Her delivery of the recitative was broad and fraught with significance; and throughout both recitative and the aria "Oh hope, thou wilt not let the star," her singing was fervid and dramatic, the singing of a true artist. Her voice, too, was almost always agreeable in quality, excepting the high B of the adagio, and the lowest notes that followed it, were rather unmusical; an occasional false intonation was also noticeable. The tremendous applause that followed the conclusion of this number showed how fully her efforts were appreciated.

The beautiful "Prisoners chorus" was finely and sympathetically sung by the members of Mr. Osgood's society; and he is to be thanked for the thorough drilling they had evidently received. In the long finale, soloists and chorus did their best, which, of necessity, insured an artistic performance; and thus was the act brought to a successful termination. The orchestral playing was evenly good, although some of the accompaniments were too loud. One of Mr. Nikisch's weaknesses is that he frequently neglects to keep in mind the limitations of the voice.

The concert closed with a great performance of the fifth symphony. All its strong points were brought out with splendid emphasis, and the playing, as a whole, was finished to a degree that left little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch adhered in the main to his reading of last year except that he seemed to exact a less strenuous tone from the instruments: and his treatment of the entire work showed the influence of Wagner's views on conducting in general, and Beethoven in particular. Mr. Santet distinguished himself by his highly expressive phrasing of the noted cadenza in the first movement; the passage for wood-wind in the andante was played with purity of tone and accuracy; the double basses were up to their mark in the trio of the scherzo; and the famous "pedal point" leading to the finale was worked up with an effect that was thrilling. The finale itself was magnificently performed; and at the end conductor and players were greeted with tremendous applause.

So ends the tenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the concerts of which have been the means of raising the musical standard of the city to its present altitude. The list of works performed clearly indicates the enormous amount of work that has been accomplished; and when this fact is considered, fault-finding seems ungracious. Still, it would seem an easy matter to present more thoughtfully arranged programmes. Naturally, much extra time is consumed in rehearsing new, or unfamillar works. But in many instances, the programmes have contained one number which might well have been spared, and which served only to neutralize the effect of the programme as a whole. If the time thus spent were devoted to rehearsing new works, or to a more thorough preparation of those that have become standard, better results would be obtained.

We have heard a rumor that some plan is to be adopted next autumn which will enable people of moderate means to secure their tickets at moderate prices. This is fully in accord with Mr. Higginson's original intentions, as expressed by himself; but how it is to be accomplished is a mystery. The auction system seems by far the best; still it affords the rich an opportunity to bid prices up. If the old plan of standing in line again prevails, nothing can prevent speculators from securing as many tickets as they wish.

There still remains one other plan, however, which, if adopted, would be a decided benefit to many musical persons, students especially. The upper gallery might be kept unreserved for the concerts as they already are for the rehearsals. It is true that much determination of mind and activity of body are required to endure the crush and to obtain a seat. But this is also true in European concerts and theatres; and after all it is a good test of one's earnestness of desire to listen to the music of the great masters.

When all is said and done, the enormous benefit of this great Boston institution must be admitted; and if it has at times during the past season shown symptoms of becoming a follower instead of a leader of musical opinion, there can be no doubt that this state of affairs will not long continue.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 27, 1891.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

END OF THE SEASON SATURDAY NIGHT.

It is not wholly improbable that there were well educated musicians in the audience in Music Hall Saturday evening who could consistently enjoy the concert on account of its being the last of an altogether too prolonged series. The works performed were all by Beethoven and included the overture, "Lenore No. 2," the first act of "Fidelio" and the fifth symphony. The singers for the "Fidelio" music were Mme. Antonia Mielke, Leonora; Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Marcellina: Mr. Emil Fischer, Rocco; Mr. W. H. Rieger, Jaquino; and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Pizzaro. The second overture to "Lenore" was uncommonly well played, and such portions of the "Fidelio" music as were assigned Mme. Antonia Mielke and Mr. Emil Fischer were magnificently sung. Mr. Nikisch's revised reading of the fifth symphony was a much needed improvement upon that of last year; but while all this is true, yet the concert as a whole was by no means so praiseworthy as similar concerts have been in previous years. Neither can the entire series be rated as comparing favorably with that of last year. An unusual number of the soloists engaged, especially the singers, have been entitled to almost anything else than an artistic rating.

In his selection of vocalists Mr. Nikisch upon several occasions has most seriously erred. It is true that in this respect he has proven himself to be a very kind-hearted musician who has desired to please every body even at the hazardous expense of his artistic reputation; yet any well informed person who has attended the symphony concerts will enter an indignant protest against his so-called charity for amateurism and charlatanry and it has often hampered him in his selection of soloists. Either this or else Mr. Nikisch is a very poor judge of what good singing really is, which is not wholly improbable. For example, the very zealous and pains taking young lady who essayed the role of Marcellina, Saturday evening, seemed wholly out of place. While she doubtless is a society favorite of excellent reputation, she should refrain from appearing in public in the role of a soloist. She is wont to sing in an unknown tongue. While nature has been more than kind to her as regards voice, she knows not how to use this voice; and this is clearly shown by the very throaty and disagreeable quality of its tones above the mezzo range. True she was loudly applauded, but we all know from experience that audiences seldom know how, when or whom to applaud; and the symphony concert audiences, as a rule, are almost invariably governed by oracles whom they are incapable of understanding. Mr. Heinrich Meyn appeared in the role of Pizzaro. Mr. Meyn, aside from attempts to sing in Music Hall, is doubtless a very good musician, but his pantomimic performance of the great aria, "Ha! What a Day is This," was well nigh humorous in its effect. His voice was almost inaudible at times, and this was not the fault of the orchestra, which played none too loud for the dramatic requirements of the aria. It was Mr. Meyn's own fault. The Jaquino of Mr. W. H. Rieger was somewhat quaintly, inoffensively sung, save in the great quartet "He Doth to Me Incline," in which he contributed a very generous share to the well nigh sacriligious effect of the performance. As regards quality of tone, there was but little if any fault to be found with the chorus, yet that none of the chorus singing was satisfactory seemed almost wholly due to the apparent unconsciousness of Mr. Nikisch that any such element as a chorus was participating in the performance; and he conducted accordingly. And now a very hearty crescendo can be made from blame to praise. Mme. Mielke's Leonora can be warmly commended. Purity, earnestness, depth of feeling and artistic loveliness predominated in all that the artiste had to do, and a very high value must be placed upon her musical intelligence. The eloquence of her interpretation as she sang the great aria "Thou Monstrous Fiend" and the passion and power of her singing have seldom been equalled here. In brief, her singing was as near an approach to perfection in tone, taste, knowledge, sensibility and expression as it is scarcely possible to imagine.

The applause that Mme Mielke received was hearty, unequivocal and for once free from all suspicion of artificial zeal. As Rocco Mr. Emil Fischer added new lustre to his fame, and, as has been intimated, Mme. Mielke and Mr. Fischer were the only singers in the performance that can be honestly praised. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the fifth symphony was a decided improvement upon that of last year; yet the interpretation of the first movement, while heartfelt, warm and exuberant, was seldom true in spirit; neither was it in accordance with the noble nature of Beethoven's music. It cannot be said of Mr. Nikisch that the ruling bias of his mind is to loyalty in his treatment of the classics; yet he is not without many fine susceptibilities and a warm, keen sense of the poetic. Of affectation he can neither be vindicated nor very loudly pronounced guilty. It should be born in mind that a musician of his temperament has privileges of his own, but the wild and headstrong temper to which he almost invariably submits the music can not be too severely condemned. Regarding the recent series of concerts, it is a pleasure to acknowledge that the programmes, as a rule, have been exceptionally well chosen. Only three works of Brahms have been played, and even for this praiseworthy self-denial on Mr. Nikisch's part let us be thankful. The order in which the composers or their works have been favored is about as follows, namely: Ten selections by Wagner have been performed, nine by Beethoven, five by Litz, Mendelssohn four and Schumann four. The list otherwise includes Bach, Berlioz, Burmeister, Chadwick, Cherubini, David. Dvorak, Foote, Gade, Gounod, Gluck, Godard, Goldmark, Grieg, Handel, Haydn, Henberger, Lulo, Mackenzie, Moszkowsky, Paderewski, Raff, Reinecke, Saint-Saens, Scharwenka, Schubert, Sgambati, Smetana, Spohr, Volkmann, Whiting and Wienawski.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last concert of this season, was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Lenore No 2" ..... } Beethoven
Fidelio, Act I. ..... } Beethoven
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... } Beethoven

Although the artistic fitness of presenting in concert form a fragment of an opera without the action, scenery and costumes may be questioned, such a question must give way to this greater one: Is it better for an audience to hear portions of an opera, mangled and imperfect, than for it to be debarred from becoming acquainted with even the disiecta membra of a great work. For here in Boston this problem is put to us.

The Operatic Festival of April 7, the late performance of "Parsifal" and the popular success of "Fidelio" last Saturday show conclusively that the music lovers of this town hunger after opera; and they are willing to pay out money and to endure necessarily imperfect representations that they may taste for a moment a forbidden pleasure. They will listen to good, bad and indifferent singers, and they will applaud alike the endeavor, the failure and the triumph. To be sure, this shows patience and zeal rather than discrimination, but if this patience and this zeal were eventually rewarded; if for even a few weeks in the year, there might be representations of opera, not on a too ambitious scale but respectable and complete, audiences would be more fastidious after the hunger-pangs were satisfied. But the operas should be sung in the English language.

There are, however, illustrious precedents for giving fragments of operas, oratorios, masses and cantatas in symphony concerts. Take, for example, the programmes of the world-renowned concerts of the Paris Conservatory, concerts that have been for over sixty years a glory to France. The programme of the first concert given the 9th of March, 1828, was made up of eight numbers, four of which were vocal. Two choruses by Cherubini were sung: one from "Blanche de Provence," the other from the three-voiced "Coronation Mass." And looking through the histories of these concerts by Elwart and Deldevez, it will be seen that at each concert choruses from forgotten or rarely heard operas, selections from masses and cantatas stand side by side with symphonies and other instrumental music.

The programme of the concert given the 5th of this month included Schumann's symphony in D minor, a concerto by Mozart for two pianos, the "Coriolanus" overture, Massenet's "Biblis," and the choruses "For Unto Us" and "Hallelujah" from the "Messiah."

The chorus of the Conservatory concerts is made up of about seventy-five picked voices, and the soloists are taken from the most celebrated singers of Paris. When the concerts started there were eighty-eight players to seventy-two singers, and Deldevez recommended for extraordinary occasions 126 singers and 121 players. For long ago they knew in Paris that perfect execution of music by a limited force is "far more delightful and far less fatiguing than the irregular roar and hum of multitudinous mediocrity."

Now I do not say that the constant employment in our Symphony concerts of a well selected chorus is practicable or desirable. And yet what genuine pleasure, what an opportunity for instruction would be given by the introduction of choral numbers or concerted pieces from works known to us now only by name, if they were chosen in a catholic spirit, if they truly represented the schools of all countries from the time when the Netherlanders ruled supreme in music.

Saturday's performance of the first act of "Fidelio" must of course be regarded only from the standpoint of the concert-room. The hall was crowded, and each number was loudly applauded. Indeed, the applause was more hearty than discriminating, for in each and every instance the verdict of the audience was favorable to the singer. But only Mrs. Mielke (Leonora) and Mr. Fischer (Rocco) were equal to the demands made upon them, and the singing of the former cannot be praised unreservedly. Mrs. Hascall (Marcellina), Mr. Rieger (Jaquino), and Mr. Meyn (Pizarro) were earnest and faithful in the endeavor, but the results of their endeavors were far from satisfactory. It must be said in Mr. Meyn's behalf that Beethoven wrote a cruel part for the voice of the cruel Governor. The solos of Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Fischer were sung with much dramatic spirit, and they were certainly the musical peaks of the performance. The favorite quartette was taken at an unusually slow pace; the voices did not blend; the walk of the parts was not clearly defined; there were deviations from the pitch. The chorus, taken from the Boston Singers' Society, was awkwardly placed, and probably for that reason the effect of the finale did not meet the expectation. The orchestral accompaniment was often boisterous.

While Mr. Nikisch in his reading of the Fifth Symphony still follows in many respects the ideas of Wagner and Richter, the performance of Saturday evening was more conservative than the famous one of last season. It was more sane, it was more musical. There was much to praise. There was too little to censure. Surely no thoughtful person could have objected to the declamation of the opening phrase with its fermata. There was a commendable absence of false and exaggerated sentiment in the reading of the opening phrases of the second and third movements. And throughout the symphony the brass was not so overblown as on that memorable night last season.

Maurice Kufferath has lately written an essay on Richter's direction of this symphony, in which he analyzes Richter's methods and gives their musical explanation. As Mr. Nikisch follows closely with Richter the principles laid down by Wagner, this phamplet "L'Art de diriger l'orchestre" will be of benefit to any one interested in the proper or improper performance of the symphony.

Although the concert was very long—too long, in fact—the enthusiasm of the audience was unabated, and at the end of the symphony Mr. Nikisch was vehemently applauded.

The next concert will be given Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

PHILIP HALE.

[131]

BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1891.

Tenth Season of the Symphony Concerts Ended.

Director Arthur Nikisch ended his second season's labors in this city last evening, and brought the 10th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra to a most successful ending before an audience that fully tested the capacity of the Music Hall auditorium.

The evening's programme was drawn exclusively from the works of Beethoven, the "Leonore" overture, No. 2; the symphony in C, No. 5, and the first act of "Fidelio" making the selections, the work of the orchestra being supplemented in the operatic scenes by that of artists drawn from the New York Metropolitan Opera House company of the past season, and a chorus of male voices from the Boston Singers' Society.

The "Fidelio" roles were thus assigned: Leonora, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

The announcement of such a programme caused no little surprise when certain remarks of Conductor Nikisch were recalled. It will be remembered that he has, at times, protested in the most vigorous way against the incomplete performance of any symphonic composition, and has expressed the opinion that it was much like presenting a mutilated picture for criticism to perform such works save in their entirety.

The production of "Fidelio" in concert form has become justifiable by custom, but, heretofore, the grand old opera has been given complete, if at all, even at such performances, and then only by thoroughly competent singers. No exception could be reasonably taken to the work of the orchestra in the operatic selection last evening, indeed, no such generally satisfactory performance of the intrumental score can be recalled in recent years.

The city talent, however, fell much below the standard established here in the performances of former years. Mme. Mielke has gained a fine reputation on the German stage as a dramatic singer of first prominence, and her interpretation of the title role was marked by fine intelligence and great dramatic feeling. Her vocal methods, however, are many and varied, and, although she gets effects, the artistic character of her vocal work is open to criticism.

Mrs. Wilbur Hascall sang the music of Marcellina with good acceptance, her voice proving to be a bright and true soprano and well suited to the role. With the men singers the Rocco of Mr. Fischer took easy prominence, Messrs. Rieger and Meyn being negatively meritorious. The well-dressed ranks of "prisoners" on either side of the stage sang at each other with some difficulty, the wide orchestral chasm between the two sections detracting much from the effectiveness of the work done by the capable body of singers, rallied for the evening from Mr. Osgood's chorus.

The playing of the fifth symphony recalled the lively discussion of Mr. Nikisch's reading of this famous work at these concerts, soon after his arrival in this country. It was made evident by this repetition of the symphony that Conductor Nikisch has no idea of retreating from his position in regard to the proper interpretation of Beethoven's fifth. It is commendable to adhere to an ideal, but it is also unfortunate to hold to an ideal which finds support only from a desire not to offend. Director Leopold Damr sch in his life set up a standard for the interpretation of the fifth symphony which, in his day, commanded the commendation of the most critical. Director Nikisch may represent the "advanced school" in his reading of the work, and it is possible that he will educate his patrons in future seasons to accept his own ideas concerning it.

His supporters in last evening's audience made their presence and influence felt, and the gratitude of the audience for his season's labors (or the feelings of joy at the conclusion of the year's programme) led to the giving of the conductor an ovation which promises well for his future seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the next beginning on Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1891.

CLOSING SYMPHONY.

A Notable Programme Applauded by Two Brilliant Audiences.

With last evening's concert ended Mr. Nikisch's second season as conductor of the Symphony orchestra. A notably large audience attended, and by cordial demonstrations of applause expressed appreciation and approval of his efforts to furnish Boston with the very best of music during the past six months. His record for this second season will certainly not suffer by comparison with the work accomplished during 1889-90. The orchestra has attained a degree of proficiency under his careful direction not before equalled. It cannot be denied that regarding the choice of programmes there has been considerable adverse criticism, but to please everybody would be an impossibility, and Mr. Nikisch must be credited with offering the best fruits of his own judgment, more than which could not be expected. Forty-six composers have been represented on the 24 concert programmes, several of whom were given their first hearing here. Of novelties a dozen or more have been presented and, with few exceptions, they have been exceedingly welcome. Familiar works have been given new interpretations, often rendering them more delightful, and but seldom detracting from their beauty. Only Beethoven's compositions were given place upon the closing programme. The spirited and lovely "Lenore" overture No. 2, the first act of "Fidelio" and the fifth symphony were the selections. Exquisitely played was the opening number. Possibly not before has this overture been so charmingly interpreted. The symphony was also splendidly read and deservedly called forth most hearty plaudits.

Excellent artists and of high repute here are Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Emil Fischer, W. H. Rieger and Heinrich Meyn, the soloists, who gave selections from "Fidelio." Mme. Mielke sang the Lenora aria, "Oh! Hope," superbly. Rocco is one of Herr Fischer's favorite roles, and it was a treat to hear him sing "Life is nothing without money." Mrs. Hascall sang the Marcellina solos with good taste and expression. Mr. Rieger's voice, though rather light, is of pleasing quality and gave satisfactory interpretation of the Jaquino role. Mr. Meyn found good opportunities in the music assigned to Pizzaro. The several concerted numbers were finely sung, notably the famed quartet "He doth to me incline." Welcome assistance was given by a large male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 4/26

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An important event of the closing weeks of the musical season [illegible] the visit of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The organization, numbering seventy-five performers, will give three concerts at Central Music Hall the evenings of May 7 and 8 and the afternoon of May 9. The soloists to appear with the orchestra are Miss Mary Howe, the Vermont soprano; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, mezzo soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, violinists, and Anton Hekking, cellist. The sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning at Central Music Hall, where complete programmes may be obtained.

BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1891.

Tenth Season of the Symphony Concerts Ended.

Director Arthur Nikisch ended his second season's labors in this city last evening, and brought the 10th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra to a most successful ending before an audience that fully tested the capacity of the Music Hall auditorium.

The evening's programme was drawn exclusively from the works of Beethoven, the "Leonore" overture, No. 2; the symphony in C, No. 5, and the first act of "Fidelio" making the selections, the work of the orchestra being supplemented in the operatic scenes by that of artists drawn from the New York Metropolitan Opera House company of the past season, and a chorus of male voices from the Boston Singers' Society.

The "Fidelio" roles were thus assigned: Leonora, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

The announcement of such a programme caused no little surprise when certain remarks of Conductor Nikisch were recalled. It will be remembered that he has, at times, protested in the most vigorous way against the incomplete performance of any symphonic composition, and has expressed the opinion that it was much like presenting a mutilated picture for criticism to perform such works save in their entirety.

The production of "Fidelio" in concert form has become justifiable by custom, but, heretofore, the grand old opera has been given complete, if at all, even at such performances, and then only by thoroughly competent singers. No exception could be reasonably taken to the work of the orchestra in the operatic selection last evening, indeed, no such generally satisfactory performance of the intrumental score can be recalled in recent years.

The city talent, however, fell much below the standard established here in the performances of former years. Mme. Mielke has gained a fine reputation on the German stage as a dramatic singer of first prominence, and her interpretation of the title role was marked by fine intelligence and great dramatic feeling. Her vocal methods, however, are many and varied, and, although she gets effects, the artistic character of her vocal work is open to criticism.

Mrs. Wilbur Hascall sang the music of Marcellina with good acceptance, her voice proving to be a bright and true soprano and well suited to the role. With the men singers the Rocco of Mr. Fischer took easy prominence, Messrs. Rieger and Meyn being negatively meritorious. The well-dressed ranks of "prisoners" on either side of the stage sang at each other with some difficulty, the wide orchestral chasm between the two sections detracting much from the effectiveness of the work done by the capable body of singers, rallied for the evening from Mr. Osgood's chorus.

The playing of the fifth symphony recalled the lively discussion of Mr. Nikisch's reading of this famous work at these concerts, soon after his arrival in this country. It was made evident by this repetition of the symphony that Conductor Nikisch has no idea of retreating from his position in regard to the proper interpretation of Beethoven's fifth. It is commendable to adhere to an ideal, but it is also unfortunate to hold to an ideal which finds support only from a desire not to offend. Director Leopold Damr sch in his life set up a standard for the interpretation of the fifth symphony which, in his day, commanded the commendation of the most critical. Director Nikisch may represent the "advanced school" in his reading of the work, and it is possible that he will educate his patrons in future seasons to accept his own ideas concerning it.

His supporters in last evening's audience made their presence and influence felt, and the gratitude of the audience for his season's labors (or the feelings of joy at the conclusion of the year's programme) led to the giving of the conductor an ovation which promises well for his future seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the next beginning on Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

Boston Daily Advertiser.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27, 1891.

Closing Symphony Concert.

Beethoven was given all honor last Saturday night at the last Symphony Concert of this season in Music Hall, for his was the only author's name on the programme. There was a very large audience even for a symphony audience. Conductor Nikisch's stand was entwined with floral gifts, and he was the recipient of a reception on his entrance that could not fail to be encouraging and pleasing to him.

The novelty on the programme, and indeed it was a novelty in all the Symphony programmes in the past, was the presentation of the first act of Beethoven's "Fidelio," given of course in concert form. This is not an unusual thing, but it was an innovation on the part of Mr. Nikisch which has caused no little surprise. It was not finished until the usual time for these concerts to close, and there was yet the Fifth Symphony to be performed. Many were obliged to leave the hall at this juncture, but were well repaid even if they did not remain until the last notes of the Symphony had died away. There had been chosen as interpreters of the opera Mme. Mielke as Leonora, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall (nee Etta May Hunt) as Marcellina, Emil Fischer as Rocco, W. H. Rieger as Jaquino and Heinrich Meyn as Pizarro. With those artists, and they were all admirably adapted to the performance, a chorus of male prisoners from the Singers' Society and the Symphony Orchestra a fine rendition was naturally expected. Mrs. Hascall is well known in Boston, and her true, fresh and well trained voice and musical instinct stood her in good stead with the German artists with whom she was associated. In the quartette a voice of more power for the leading part would have been welcome, but her aria was finely rendered, while her modest bearing was an additional passport to instant favor with the audience. Mme. Mielke has not done anything in this city so well as her delivery of the recitative and aria of Leonora just prior to the finale of the first act. It was grand in its dramatic utterance, it was artistic in its interpretation, and the audience did itself as well as the artist the justice to acknowledge the work of the singer in a fitting manner. Mr. Fischer had a very congenial part, and the remaining artists acquitted themselves with credit. It is seldom that such a performance can be heard in any city, and the completion of the opera would have been a happy close to the season's concerts. Prior to the Fidelio, the Leonora Overture, No. 2, so called, received a masterly interpretation, displaying the resources of the orchestra and the admirable command of the conductor. This closed the season and a four weeks tour is to be entered upon, beginning this evening at Philadelphia, the dates of which have already been given in this column. It includes a festival at Louisville, Ky., and at Buffalo, both of which Mr. Nikisch will lead, and at which some very important works will be given.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.

Date 4/26

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

A List of Excellent Attractions Announced for the Star Course Next Season—Musical Matters at Home and Abroad—Notes.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the closing concert in the Star course in Music hall on Saturday evening next. Below will be found the program which this superb organization will give. As will be seen, it is calculated to display all the wonderful powers of the orchestra. Much has been said of this famous organization, which stands foremost among the musical companies of the country, and its visit is looked forward to with interest by lovers of grand music. Excellent as the attractions in general have been at the Star course this season the management promises a more splendid array for next season, though in consequence the price of a season ticket will be somewhat advanced—$2 for fifteen entertainments. The Boston symphony orchestra, two military bands, the Listemann club and the Whitney-Mockridge company have already been engaged. The tickets will be taken up at the concert next Saturday night and members are requested to write their names and address on the back of tickets with the number that they will require for next year. Following is the program for Saturday evening:

Overture—Oberon ..... Hahn
Les Dragons di Villars ..... Maillard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Suite—Peer Gynt, Op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak. The Death of Aasi. Anitra's Dance. In the Halls of the King of the Doare Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Rondo Capriccioso, for violin ..... Saint-Saens
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Songs with Piano ..... Clara K. Rogers
Kiss My Eyelids ..... Gade
The Goldsmith ..... Oscar Weil
Roses ..... Oscar Weil
(Violin obligato.)
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Symphony, No. 1 ..... Schumann
Adagio: Allegro Vivace. Adagio. Minuet. Allegro. Ma non Troppo.
Soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Musical Notes.

At the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, on Saturday evening, the 18th inst., the programme was: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; scena and aria for soprano, from "Der Freischutz"; prelude, adagio and gavotte, by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich; a group of songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D-minor. The overture and symphony were, on the whole, well played. Now and then there was a rasping roughness in the strings and an untunefulness in the wind; but, on the whole, the performance of these works was interesting and richly colored. The arrangement of the Bach selections is clear and effective, though we still fail to recognize the advisability of playing these transcriptions while there is so much good music, written especially for orchestra, that remains unheard at these concerts. The gavotte pleased so much that it was redemanded, and Mr. Nikisch granted an encore. It is a source for genuine regret that the admirable rule against encores that has hitherto prevailed at these concerts should be broken, for it not only lowers their dignity, but it is displeasing to the many who are annoyed by the success that attends the noisy persistency of the few. The soloist was Miss Marie Jahn, an artist of such limited powers that it is surprising how she could have been permitted to sing at these concerts. She has a good voice, but it has been miserably trained, and her style is disfigured by nearly every vice that singers of artistic taste and instinct avoid. To allow such singing before such an audience is an insult to its understanding. She rarely attacks a note fairly, but "scoops" up or down to it, as the case may be, making a caterwauling that is positively distressing in its effect on the ear. It was bad singing from beginning to end, wretched in its phrasing, frequently untuneful, and false in its expression. It is true that she was a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and is a German; but we have had over many of the singers of this company at these concerts, and over much of German singing, which, as a rule, is coarse and inartistic singing. While we fully recognize the musical prominence of Germany, and sincerely honor its achievements in the art, we may still protest against the exclusiveness given to German music and German singers at the Symphony concerts. Never before in the history of these concerts has there been so much singing of an unsatisfactory order heard at them. To such a thorough artist as Madam Mielke there is no objection to be made; —but why is so marked a preference given to German singers? This profusion of bad singing at these concerts is demoralizing. It lowers the standard that has been maintained hitherto; it discourages artists of genuine ability and places a premium on mediocrity. The uneducated among the audience, taking it for granted that a singer who appears at a Symphony concert does so because of superior merit, applaud the artist, and thus add their endorsement to that given to the singer by the management. It is to be hoped that in the future, solo mediocrities may be denied a hearing at these concerts. Better no singers at all than such singers as have been vouchsafed undeserved distinction this season.

INTER-OCEAN, Chicago, Ill.

Date 4/26

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. [illegible], conductor, will visit Chicago for three concerts at Central Music Hall will be heartily welcomed by the music-lovers of this community. This splendid organization is no stranger in this city, having been heard several times under its former leader, Mr. Gericke, and last season under its new Leipzic conductor, Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra numbers seventy-five performers, and will be accompanied by the following soloists: Miss Mary Howe, of Vermont, soprano; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch mezzo soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. T. Adamowski, violinists; and Mr. Anton Hekking, cellist.

The concerts will be given in Central Music Hall on Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon May 7, 8 and 9. The sale of seats opens at the box office next Thursday morning.

[132]

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1891.

Tenth Season of the Symphony Concerts Ended.

Director Arthur Nikisch ended his second season's labors in this city last evening, and brought the 10th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra to a most successful ending before an audience that fully tested the capacity of the Music Hall auditorium.

The evening's programme was drawn exclusively from the works of Beethoven, the "Leonore" overture, No. 2; the symphony in C, No. 5, and the first act of "Fidelio" making the selections, the work of the orchestra being supplemented in the operatic scenes by that of artists drawn from the New York Metropolitan Opera House company of the past season, and a chorus of male voices from the Boston Singers' Society.

The "Fidelio" roles were thus assigned: Leonora, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

The announcement of such a programme caused no little surprise when certain remarks of Conductor Nikisch were recalled. It will be remembered that he has, at times, protested in the most vigorous way against the incomplete performance of any symphonic composition, and has expressed the opinion that it was much like presenting a mutilated picture for criticism to perform such works save in their entirety.

The production of "Fidelio" in concert form has become justifiable by custom, but, heretofore, the grand old opera has been given complete, if at all, even at such performances, and then only by thoroughly competent singers. No exception could be reasonably taken to the work of the orchestra in the operatic selection last evening, indeed, no such generally satisfactory performance of the intrumental score can be recalled in recent years.

The city talent, however, fell much below the standard established here in the performances of former years. Mme. Mielke has gained a fine reputation on the German stage as a dramatic singer of first prominence, and her interpretation of the title role was marked by fine intelligence and great dramatic feeling. Her vocal methods, however, are many and varied, and, although she gets effects, the artistic character of her vocal work is open to criticism.

Mrs. Wilbur Hascall sang the music of Marcellina with good acceptance, her voice proving to be a bright and true soprano and well suited to the role. With the men singers the Rocco of Mr. Fischer took easy prominence, Messrs. Rieger and Meyn being negatively meritorious. The well-dressed ranks of "prisoners" on either side of the stage sang at each other with some difficulty, the wide orchestral chasm between the two sections detracting much from the effectiveness of the work done by the capable body of singers, rallied for the evening from Mr. Osgood's chorus.

The playing of the fifth symphony recalled the lively discussion of Mr. Nikisch's reading of this famous work at these concerts, soon after his arrival in this country. It was made evident by this repetition of the symphony that Conductor Nikisch has no idea of retreating from his position in regard to the proper interpretation of Beethoven's fifth. It is commendable to adhere to an ideal, but it is also unfortunate to hold to an ideal which finds support only from a desire not to offend. Director Leopold Damrosch in his life set up a standard for the interpretation of the fifth symphony which, in his day, commanded the commendation of the most critical. Director Nikisch may represent the "advanced school" in his reading of the work, and it is possible that he will educate his patrons in future seasons to accept his own ideas concerning it.

His supporters in last evening's audience made their presence and influence felt, and the gratitude of the audience for his season's labors (or the feelings of joy at the conclusion of the year's programme) led to the giving of the conductor an ovation which promises well for his future seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the next beginning on Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.
SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1891.

CLOSING SYMPHONY.

A Notable Programme Applauded by Two Brilliant Audiences.

With last evening's concert ended Mr. Nikisch's second season as conductor of the Symphony orchestra. A notably large audience attended, and by cordial demonstrations of applause expressed appreciation and approval of his efforts to furnish Boston with the very best of music during the past six months. His record for this second season will certainly not suffer by comparison with the work accomplished during 1889-90. The orchestra has attained a degree of proficiency under his careful direction not before equalled. It cannot be denied that regarding the choice of programmes there has been considerable adverse criticism, but to please everybody would be an impossibility, and Mr. Nikisch must be credited with offering the best fruits of his own judgment, more than which could not be expected. Forty-six composers have been represented on the 24 concert programmes, several of whom were given their first hearing here. Of novelties a dozen or more have been presented and, with few exceptions, they have been exceedingly welcome. Familiar works have been given new interpretations, often rendering them more delightful, and but seldom detracting from their beauty. Only Beethoven's compositions were given place upon the closing programme. The spirited and lovely "Lenore" overture No. 2, the first act of "Fidelio" and the fifth symphony were the selections. Exquisitely played was the opening number. Possibly not before has this overture been so charmingly interpreted. The symphony was also splendidly read and deservedly called forth most hearty plaudits.

Excellent artists and of high repute here are Mme. Antonia Mielke, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, Emil Fischer, W. H. Rieger and Heinrich Meyn, the soloists, who gave selections from "Fidelio." Mme. Mielke sang the Lenora aria, "Oh! Hope," superbly. Rocco is one of Herr Fischer's favorite roles, and it was a treat to hear him sing "Life is nothing without money." Mrs. Hascall sang the Marcellina solos with good taste and expression. Mr. Rieger's voice, though rather light, is of pleasing quality and gave satisfactory interpretation of the Jaquino role. Mr. Meyn found good opportunities in the music assigned to Pizzaro. The several concerted numbers were finely sung, notably the famed quartet "He doth to me incline." Welcome assistance was given by a large male chorus from the Boston Singers' Society.

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 4/26

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An important event of the closing weeks of the musical season will be the visit of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The organization, numbering seventy-five performers, will give three concerts at Central Music Hall the evenings of May 7 and 8 and the afternoon of May 9. The soloists to appear with the orchestra are Miss Mary Howe, the Vermont soprano; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, mezzo soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, violinists, and Anton Hekking, cellist. The sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning at Central Music Hall, where complete programmes may be obtained.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1891.

Tenth Season of the Symphony Concerts Ended.

Director Arthur Nikisch ended his second season's labors in this city last evening, and brought the 10th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra to a most successful ending before an audience that fully tested the capacity of the Music Hall auditorium.

The evening's programme was drawn exclusively from the works of Beethoven, the "Leonore" overture, No. 2; the symphony in C, No. 5, and the first act of "Fidelio" making the selections, the work of the orchestra being supplemented in the operatic scenes by that of artists drawn from the New York Metropolitan Opera House company of the past season, and a chorus of male voices from the Boston Singers' Society.

The "Fidelio" roles were thus assigned: Leonora, Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco, Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, Mr. W. H. Rieger; Pizzaro, Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

The announcement of such a programme caused no little surprise when certain remarks of Conductor Nikisch were recalled. It will be remembered that he has, at times, protested in the most vigorous way against the incomplete performance of any symphonic composition, and has expressed the opinion that it was much like presenting a mutilated picture for criticism to perform such works save in their entirety.

The production of "Fidelio" in concert form has become justifiable by custom, but, heretofore, the grand old opera has been given complete, if at all, even at such performances, and then only by thoroughly competent singers. No exception could be reasonably taken to the work of the orchestra in the operatic selection last evening, indeed, no such generally satisfactory performance of the intrumental score can be recalled in recent years.

The city talent, however, fell much below the standard established here in the performances of former years. Mme. Mielke has gained a fine reputation on the German stage as a dramatic singer of first prominence, and her interpretation of the title role was marked by fine intelligence and great dramatic feeling. Her vocal methods, however, are many and varied, and, although she gets effects, the artistic character of her vocal work is open to criticism.

Mrs. Wilbur Hascall sang the music of Marcellina with good acceptance, her voice proving to be a bright and true soprano and well suited to the role. With the men singers the Rocco of Mr. Fischer took easy prominence, Messrs. Rieger and Meyn being negatively meritorious. The well-dressed ranks of "prisoners" on either side of the stage sang at each other with some difficulty, the wide orchestral chasm between the two sections detracting much from the effectiveness of the work done by the capable body of singers, rallied for the evening from Mr. Osgood's chorus.

The playing of the fifth symphony recalled the lively discussion of Mr. Nikisch's reading of this famous work at these concerts, soon after his arrival in this country. It was made evident by this repetition of the symphony that Conductor Nikisch has no idea of retreating from his position in regard to the proper interpretation of Beethoven's fifth. It is commendable to adhere to an ideal, but it is also unfortunate to hold to an ideal which finds support only from a desire not to offend. Director Leopold Damrosch in his life set up a standard for the interpretation of the fifth symphony which, in his day, commanded the commendation of the most critical. Director Nikisch may represent the "advanced school" in his reading of the work, and it is possible that he will educate his patrons in future seasons to accept his own ideas concerning it.

His supporters in last evening's audience made their presence and influence felt, and the gratitude of the audience for his season's labors (or the feelings of joy at the conclusion of the year's programme) led to the giving of the conductor an ovation which promises well for his future seasons with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the next beginning on Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27, 1891.

Closing Symphony Concert.

Beethoven was given all honor last Saturday night at the last Symphony Concert of this season in Music Hall, for his was the only author's name on the programme. There was a very large audience even for a symphony audience. Conductor Nikisch's stand was entwined with floral gifts, and he was the recipient of a reception on his entrance that could not fail to be encouraging and pleasing to him.

The novelty on the programme, and indeed it was a novelty in all the Symphony programmes in the past, was the presentation of the first act of Beethoven's "Fidelio," given of course in concert form. This is not an unusual thing, but it was an innovation on the part of Mr. Nikisch which has caused no little surprise. It was not finished until the usual time for these concerts to close, and there was yet the Fifth Symphony to be performed. Many were obliged to leave the hall at this juncture, but were well repaid even if they did not remain until the last notes of the Symphony had died away. There had been chosen as interpreters of the opera Mme. Mielke as Leonora, Mrs. Wilbur Hascall (nee Etta May Hunt) as Marcellina, Emil Fischer as Rocco, W. H. Rieger as Jaquino and Heinrich Meyn as Pizarro. With these artists, and they were all admirably adapted to the performance, a chorus of male prisoners from the Singers' Society and the Symphony Orchestra a fine rendition was naturally expected. Mrs. Hascall is well known in Boston, and her true, fresh and well trained voice and musical instinct stood her in good stead with the German artists with whom she was associated. In the quartette a voice of more power for the leading part would have been welcome, but her aria was finely rendered, while her modest bearing was an additional passport to instant favor with the audience. Mme. Mielke has not done anything in this city so well as her delivery of the recitative and aria of Leonora just prior to the finale of the first act. It was grand in its dramatic utterance, it was artistic in its interpretation, and the audience did itself as well as the artist the justice to acknowledge the work of the singer in a fitting manner. Mr. Fischer had a very congenial part, and the remaining artists acquitted themselves with credit. It is seldom that such a performance can be heard in any city, and the completion of the opera would have been a happy close to the season's concerts. Prior to the Fidelio, the Leonora Overture, No. 2, so called, received a masterly interpretation, displaying the resources of the orchestra and the admirable command of the conductor. This closed the season and a four weeks tour is to be entered upon, beginning this evening at Philadelphia, the dates of which have already been given in this column. It includes a festival at Louisville, Ky., and at Buffalo, both of which Mr. Nikisch will lead, and at which some very important works will be given.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.
Date 4/26

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

A List of Excellent Attractions Announced for the Star Course Next Season—Musical Matters at Home and Abroad—Notes.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give the closing concert in the Star course in Music hall on Saturday evening next. Below will be found the program which this superb organization will give. As will be seen, it is calculated to display all the wonderful powers of the orchestra. Much has been said of this famous organization, which stands foremost among the musical companies of the country, and its visit is looked forward to with interest by lovers of grand music. Excellent as the attractions in general have been at the Star course this season the management promises a more splendid array for next season, though in consequence the price of a season ticket will be somewhat advanced—$2 for fifteen entertainments. The Boston symphony orchestra, two military bands, the Listemann club and the Whitney-Mockridge company have already been engaged. The tickets will be taken up at the concert next Saturday night and members are requested to write their names and address on the back of tickets with the number that they will require for next year. Following is the program for Saturday evening:

Overture—Oberon ..... Hahn
Les Dragons di Villars ..... Maillard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Suite—Peer Gynt, Op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak. The Death of Aasi. Anitra's Dance. In the Halls of the King of the Doare Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Rondo Capriccioso, for violin ..... Saint-Saens
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Songs with Piano .....
Kiss My Eyelids ..... Clara K. Rogers
The Goldsmith ..... Gade
Roses ..... Oscar Weil
(Violin obligato.)
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Symphony, No. 1 ..... Schumann
Adagio: Allegro Vivace. Adagio. Minuet. Allegro, Ma non Trappo.
Soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Musical Notes.

At the twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, on Saturday evening, the 18th inst., the programme was: Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; scena and aria for soprano, from "Der Freischutz"; prelude, adagio and gavotte, by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Bichrich; a group of songs by Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen, and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D-minor. The overture and symphony were, on the whole, well played. Now and then there was a rasping roughness in the strings and an untunefulness in the wind; but, on the whole, the performance of these works was interesting and richly colored. The arrangement of the Bach selections is clear and effective, though we still fail to recognize the advisability of playing these transcriptions while there is so much good music, written especially for orchestra, that remains unheard at these concerts. The gavotte pleased so much that it was redemanded, and Mr. Nikisch granted an encore. It is a source for genuine regret that the admirable rule against encores that has hitherto prevailed at these concerts should be broken, for it not only lowers their dignity, but it is displeasing to the many who are annoyed by the success that attends the noisy persistency of the few. The soloist was Miss Marie Jahn, an artist of such limited powers that it is surprising how she could have been permitted to sing at these concerts. She has a good voice, but it has been miserably trained, and her style is disfigured by nearly every vice that singers of artistic taste and instinct avoid. To allow such singing before such an audience is an insult to its understanding. She rarely attacks a note fairly, but "scoops" up or down to it, as the case may be, making a caterwauling that is positively distressing in its effect on the ear. It was bad singing from beginning to end, wretched in its phrasing, frequently untuneful, and false in its expression. It is true that she was a member of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and is a German; but we have had over many of the singers of this company at these concerts, and over much of German singing, which, as a rule, is coarse and inartistic singing. While we fully recognize the musical prominence of Germany, and sincerely honor its achievements in the art, we may still protest against the exclusiveness given to German music and German singers at the Symphony concerts. Never before in the history of these concerts has there been so much singing of an unsatisfactory order heard at them. To such a thorough artist as Madam Mielke there is no objection to be made; —but why is so marked a preference given to German singers? This profusion of bad singing at these concerts is demoralizing. It lowers the standard that has been maintained hitherto; it discourages artists of genuine ability and places a premium on mediocrity. The uneducated among the audience, taking it for granted that a singer who appears at a Symphony concert does so because of superior merit, applaud the artist, and thus add their endorsement to that given to the singer by the management. It is to be hoped that in the future, solo mediocrities may be denied a hearing at these concerts. Better no singers at all than such singers as have been vouchsafed undeserved distinction this season.

INTER-OCEAN, Chicago, Ill.
Date 4/26

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will visit Chicago for three concerts at Central Music Hall will be heartily welcomed by the music-lovers of this community. This splendid organization is no stranger in this city, having been heard several times under its former leader, Mr. Gericke, and last season under its new Leipzic conductor, Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra numbers seventy-five performers, and will be accompanied by the following soloists: Miss Mary Howe, of Vermont, soprano; Mrs. Arthur Nikisch mezzo soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. T. Adamowski, violinists; and Mr. Anton Hekking, cellist.

The concerts will be given in Central Music Hall on Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon May 7, 8, and 9. The sale of seats opens at the box office next Thursday morning.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the season, Saturday evening, April 25, like the last of several previous seasons, was glorious with its Beethoven programme. Exclusively Beethoven!

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.
Fidelio, First Act.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The Music Hall was filled by an eager audience, and the concert, in spite of its unusual length, was inspiring from beginning to end.

The "Leonore" overture, in C, always published as the second of the four composed for the opera finally named Fidelio, has been proved to have been actually the first, the one played at the first performance of the opera, in 1805. The so-called No. 3, the greatest of them all by far, the consummate flower of the ideas sketched in No. 1, was first heard in 1806. But it was thought too colossal for the opera, beginning with comparatively light, Mozartean numbers. Therefore in 1807 he composed for a performance in Prague (which did not come off) a third, still in C, much smaller, less exciting, which is commonly printed as No. 1. There is internal evidence in the so-called No. 1, which fully confirms the documentary proofs. It is of a different character and temper from the two great ones in C. These take you right into the stress and passion of the happily ending tragedy. They must have been written under the immediate excitement of the drama. But No. 1 is in the calmer mood of reminiscence; it is a dreamy recalling, after years had passed, of the struggle and the triumph so splendidly embodied in the work. The two great ones are the real presence; the No. 1, composed long after the storm of passion had subsided, seems to review it all in memory, as if in musing, tranquil afterthought. So what we heard in this last concert was really the first overture, the original sketch of the great "Leonore No. 3," perhaps the greatest of all overtures. It was very finely played; you recognized the essential themes and features of the more finished work; the solid, solemn, grand descent of the whole orchestra starting with C; the pathetic, gentle themes from the opera hinted by the 'celli, the clarinet, the flute, the horns, bassoons, etc.; the approaching trumpet signal of deliverance; the great crescendo of the strings (not wrought up with the overwhelming power of "No. 3"); indeed, a most interesting study on the perfected overture, as well as on Beethoven's characteristic way of working, beginning often tentatively, but not contented until he had fully realized the idea, the aspiration in his mind; he knew that it was there potentially, that it was in him, but tried again and again until he actually put his hand on it, until the dream, the inspiration, stood there solid, glowing and complete.

The music of the first act of "Fidelio," orchestral and vocal, was given without omission. The part of Leonora (Fidelio) was sung by Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina (the Jailor's daughter), by Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco (Jailor), by Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, by Mr. W. H. Rieger; and Pizarro (the tyrant and evil genius of the play) by Mr. Heinrich Meyn—all of the New York Metropolitan (Wagner) Opera Company, except Mrs. Hascall and Mr. Meyn, whose homes are here. The tenor, the hero of the play, Florestan, only appears in the prison scene of the great second act.

The lighter numbers of the opening, so suggestive of Mozart: 1, duet between Marcellina (in love with the supposed boy Fidelio) and Jaquino, tenor, vainly pressing his suit with her, baulked and enraged by knockings at the gate; 2, the Aria, love dream, of Marcellina, impassioned, rich and beautiful in orchestration; 4, the lively bass song of Rocco, "A mighty thing is money" (das Gold), were well sung and accompanied. The tenor, to be sure, was rather feeble; but Mrs. Hascall, with a very fresh, sweet, pure soprano voice, sang charmingly; and Fischer, with his noble bass, is always sure and sings the father's part with hearty unction. The incomparable Quartet, in Canon, No. 3, after Leonora, disguised as Fidelio, has come in, never fails to give delight when tolerably well sung. It is marked Andante sostenuto, and was taken not too slow. The voices blended beautifully; yet no doubt it would have sounded even better had there been time for a repetition. The Terzet (No. 5), in which Leonore gets leave of the old jailer to help him in the prison, hoping to find her husband, political prisoner of Pizarro, develops more of the deeper individuality of Beethoven's genius, and was artistically and feelingly rendered, Mrs. Hascall sustaining her part bravely.

Then comes "the gouverneur," Pizarro, with his Spanish soldiers, entering to the lively rhythm of a short, most piquant, fascinating march, in its small compass so much more effective than an elaborate, long-spun march like that in Gounod's "Faust." With such fine oboes and clarinets it sounded delightfully. The Aria (No. 7), soliloquy, of Pizarro, gloating over the thought of revenge now almost within reach of his hands, was delivered with fine dramatic force and in good voice by Mr. Meyn; and the angry furor of the solo, its ejaculations of imaginary triumph, are enhanced and made mysteriously ominous by the sotto-voce mutterings to one another of the guard: "He speaks of death," etc. Then comes No. 8, the duet, "Jetzt, Alter! Jetzt hat es Eile!" in which Pizarro vainly tries, by threat or persuasion, to work up the tender-hearted Rocco to the point of murdering the half-starved prisoner Florestan, Leonora's husband. The graphic power and intensity, the terrible suggestion and the strongly contrasted individuality of the musical dialogue, were satisfactorily brought out; the scene is thoroughly dramatic, and not a point was lost by such an orchestra under the masterly conductorship of Mr. Nikisch. It comes to a climax, none more powerful, exciting, full of impassioned indignation, fear and hope, in any opera or music-drama, in the great soprano Recitative and Aria of Leonora (No. 9): "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" In this Mme. Mielke was superb, save that her emphatic highest tones were often harsh. Dramatically she was in the spirit of the piece. The great invocation to "Hope," both the Adagio and the Allegro con brio, with the inspiring, difficult work for the three horns, was thrilling and uplifting. Only Lehmann have we heard sing this great scene with more tuneful and triumphant fervor.

The Finale of the Act, the great scene where the prisoners are let out to enjoy the open air by the kindness of Rocco, introduced a fine [illegible] opened by tenors and basses from Mr. [illegible]ton Singers." They all had good [illegible] carefully drilled for the [illegible] and how buoyant it is—trembling, swelling hope and exultation the burden of accompaniment, led in by the bassoons! How full of feeling, pathos, joy, the voices, as one part after another flows in and they swell together to a full stream of the richest harmony! Then the whispered cautions: "Speak low, we are overheard." Then the warning that the governor is coming; the prisoners retire into the background; the hurried converse between Rocco and Leonora, bracing her spirit for the trial of going down into the prison, when he tells her what deliverance awaits Florestan; then the Andante with mysterious accompaniment, in which he tells her of the grave that must be dug; the entrance of Pizarro; the farewell chorus of the prisoners, taking leave of the "warm sunset"—was ever so much music, so much meaning, pathos, expectation, condensed into one opera finale? The audience heartily enjoyed it, felt it; and no doubt many were ready to say, Enough! Let thy servants now depart in peace! For it was getting late; we had had a rich feast, one of the best in quality, already.

We are only tempted to recall the first hearing of "Fidelio" on any stage in Boston. That was at the Boston Theatre, on the 1st of April, 1857. It was an indifferent German company, brought on from New York, thanks to the management of Thalberg, the pianist. The acting was generally good; the orchestra, under Carl Bergmann, passable. But the affair was improvised and slovenly; there should have been several rehearsals of so great a work. The Fidelio was Mme. Johannsen, with a voice much worn, but with a musical and dramatic instinct which carried her through surprisingly well. Mme. Berkel, voice flexible and bright, made a pretty Marcellina. Herr Bentler, a weak tenor in voice, sang the touching soliloquy of Florestan in prison with much true expression. Herr Oehrlein was the Rocco, stout enough for any jailor, with a bass voice of uncertain truth, but a fair singer. The Chorus was from the Orpheus Musical Society, their first appearance on the stage. It had to be pronounced "a very bad performance of the very best of music." Yet not a few were delighted to have this first privilege of hearing the music and the drama put together audibly and bodily for once. It was a preparation for more satisfactory hearings under better auspices. In that way has Boston grown, from poor beginnings, to its love and intimacy toward Beethoven. Sure audience he finds always now in this old seat of Puritans!

If after all this any felt a certain dread of weariness, they soon found themselves (most of them at least) agreeably disappointed. The old Fifth Symphony had lost nothing of its charm; its spell was as potent as ever. Besides its intrinsic, never-failing inspiration, there was a special reason, perhaps merely accidental, perhaps the recollection prompting the revival, which justified its introduction on that evening. It was the fiftieth anniversary (within a few weeks) of its first performance here in Boston. In the winter of 1841, in the old Federal Street Theatre, transformed into an "Odeon," in the concerts of the Academy of Music, under the presidency of the Hon. Samuel A. Eliot, and the conductorship of Henry Schmidt, the corner stone of Boston's symphony culture was virtually laid in the first (doubtless indifferent) performance here of Beethoven's sublime C-minor Symphony. It was repeated many times in that and the succeeding seasons, often before crowded audiences. On one occasion, we remember, when every seat was taken early in the parquet, sloping to the stage, there entered a well-known clergyman with his family, who, after descending a narrow aisle the whole way, looking to the right and left in vain for any place, stalked slowly back with mortified, indignant look, when suddenly arose from one side in the upper portion, leaning over the aisle, a witty clerical brother, who in a soft, high voice, rather impudent, with all too amiable a smile of sympathy, saluted him (audibly to all the neighborhood)—"I hope it may be sanctified unto yer, brother X!" Many Beethoven symphonies were taken up and creditably studied and performed in those winters. It was the beginning of symphony in Boston—beginning at the top! The smaller symphonies of Haydn and Mozart had been practised in a private club of amateurs, but in public performance their turn came after that of Beethoven. If only from idle curiosity, we should be pleased to know how many scores of times since that day it has been granted to us to listen to the Fifth Symphony.

Now, we are not disposed to enter into any question as to the correctness of the tempo or the manner in which Mr. Nikisch set the first pregnant four notes of the opening motive. Doubtless he knows, appreciates and feels the music well enough, perhaps as well as anybody. There is character in the slow, emphatic way in which he reads the passage; his pauses must not be too lightly quarrelled with, his reading not be scouted with contempt. He is a thoroughbred musician, his temperament and instincts are musical above the average, he, too, loves his Beethoven, he must be allowed the ordinary latitude in interpretation, and, right or wrong in detail, he does succeed in bringing out the power and beauty of the work, in realizing the ideal of the master, to a degree highly edifying and uplifting. This time, certainly, his reading as a whole, with few and momentary exceptions, did not deviate widely from the familiar orthodox examples. Every movement told with quickening power upon the listener. The heavenly Andante—full of holy sympathy with man in his life struggle, full of wise, angelic counsel, full of emphatic strengthening exhortation, supremely beautiful and lofty, perfect as a queenly flower bursting from its bud, symmetrical, complete in color and in fragrance, leaving nothing to desire or dream of—was rendered to a charm. The rapid figure of the double basses in the trio of the Scherzo, which in old days was scrambled through so helplessly, was all distinctly, uniformly outlined as a landscape in a flash of lightning; the vague, prolonged monotony of the pedal point, at which you pause in doubt and wonder, but feel so sure of great things yet to come; and the finale, greatest and most glorious of all triumphal marches consummation of the whole, all were brought out with irresistible, convincing majesty and power and beauty, making it impertinent to question or to criticise. Long as they had listened, many left the hall with lingering steps, as if loath to leave a sacred place, exchanging looks and words of wonder and delight. With another programme, length and heaviness might have been the text; but here music, genius, lofty sentiment, transporting beauty, put the sense of passing time quite out of thought.

The second leaf of the programme announced, not another programme, but another season of [illegible] orchestra, to begin on Saturday even- [illegible]

J. S. D.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1891.

24th Symphony Concert—Beethoven Programme.

Portions of "Fidelio" and the Fifth Symphony.

The twenty-fourth and closing concert of this season's Symphony series was given on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven.
Part One of "Fidelio," Beethoven.
Symphony, No. 5, Beethoven.

Concert performances of Beethoven's only opera have been given before in Boston. The last one, about nine years ago, was a venture of the Arlington Club; Mr. Lang conducted, and the chorus consisted of the male voices of the Arlington and the Cecilia. Miss Dora Henninges sang the music of the part of Leonora; Mrs. Knowles, Marcellina; Mr. Adams, Florestan; Mr. Henschel, Pizzaro; Mr. Want, Jaquino. Perhaps the most vivid recollection of that performance is Mr. Henschel's dramatic singing of the air "Ha, what a day is this!" and the singing of Mr. Adams. The performance under notice was given with the assistance of the male chorus of the Boston Singers' Society, and the following soloists: Mme. Mielke, (Fidelio), Mrs. W. F. Hascall (Marcellina), Mr. W. H. Rieger (Jaquino), Mr. Emil Fischer (Rocco), Mr. Henrich Meyn (Pizzaro). This list represents an admirable selection, barring the representative of Pizzaro, who, while he gave to his music a virility of expression lacked the voice to make it effective; Pizzaro is supposed to be rather provoked when he says: "Now 'tis time to slay the slayer," and we think our readers will agree with us that few governors in Pizzaro's state of mind would give such a climatic utterance with a closed tone. A most creditable "first appearance in Boston" was Mrs. Hascall's, whose singing it has been our pleasure to note in this column. Her clear and pure soprano voice is used well, and she sings with much expression. We can recall few lyric sopranos with voices so easily poised in the throat as is hers. Both in her solo and concerted music Mrs. Hascall sang with the confidence of a veteran; as she was called upon for the part at short notice, the feat was a test of her musicianship. Jaquino is not of much account on the concert stage; Mr. Rieger kept his place and sang the notes of his part, and that was about all we could ask.

Mr. Fischer sang the song about "Gold" with the confidence of a man with pockets full of the article and the skill of one who knows himself to be a good vocalist. Mme. Mielke sang the great scene "Thou Monstrous Fiend" superbly, and her reading of the recitatives showed how fine she must be on the stage; it is a pity so great an artist will leave (?) the country without being heard in Boston in her proper sphere, that of Wagner opera. The "Canon" quartet was pretty well sung, though it dragged a little. The difficult finale of the act was given with as much effect as is possible in concert; the male chorus is to be thanked for good work. Mr. Nikisch conducted the "Fidelio" music with every evidence of knowing it thoroughly.

The lesser of the two greater "Leonore" overtures—if the paradox be admitted—was well performed, but words fail to convey our appreciation of the noble—yes, magnificent interpretation of the fifth symphony. On reviewing the work of the orchestra for the season we may refer to it again.

The audience on Saturday night was limited only by the capacity of the hall. Mr. Nikisch's desk (altar, a small but observant child called it) was covered with flowers, and our conductor closed his season amid abundant expressions of the good will and admiration of the thousands who make up his weekly audience.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Enthusiastically Received by Philadelphia Audience.

PHILADELPHIA, April 27.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the sixth concert in their course here last evening before an audience which filled the seating capacity of the house and much of the standing room. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was enthusiastically received, as were the soloists of the evening, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Anton Hepping. The programme was as follows:

Overture, Anacreon ..... Cherubini
Aria, Samson and Dalila ..... Saint-Saens
Concerto for violoncello, in D minor ..... Lalo
a. Nikia's Dream, } from Symphonie
b. In the Hammock, } Orientale, op. 84. } B. Godard
Songs with piano.
Regrets ..... Delibes
Bonne Nuit ..... Massenet
A une Fiancee ..... Ferrari
Symphony No. 2, in D major ..... Brahms
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale, Allegro con spirito.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

The beer will flow in Music Hall this summer, and we shall have our dearly-beloved "Pops" again. The commissioners are wise not to add to their unpopularity by a repetition of the foolish business of last year.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1891.

MUSIC HALL GETS A LICENSE.

Promenade Concerts to be in Order This Summer—896 Liquor Licenses to be Issued—Revenue of $1,100,000.

A license to sell liquor in Music Hall has been granted for the coming summer. Chairman Whiting of the Board of Police says so, and that a notice was sent out today. Indeed, 857 dealers who had licenses last year, when there were 893 in all, received word from the Board of Police that their licenses had been renewed. Thirty-six of the dealers of last year had to face remonstrances against a renewal of their licenses, and in one of these cases—that of Patrick Henry of Chelsea street, East Boston—the board has decided not to give another license. The other thirty-five cases are being considered by the board. Mr. Whiting, speaking for that body today, said that it was impossible to give out the names of the successful applicants, as the books of the board were in such a condition that the work of getting at the names would take altogether too much time. He also refused positively to give out the names of the dealers against whom remonstrances are pending. However, every dealer who does not today receive notice of a renewal of his license will understand that there is a hitch in his case, and all such will probably besiege the commissioners for explanation tomorrow. Instead of there being 893 licenses for the year beginning May 1—that being the number the past year—there will be 896, the increase of three being warranted by the official census figures. Excepting Music Hall, there have been as yet no licenses granted except in cases where they were held the past year. The revenue from licenses the coming year will be about $1,100,000.

In regard to the plans for the summer series of popular concerts little could be ascertained at Music Hall. Mr. C. A. Ellis is now in the West directing the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the final arrangements will not be completed until his return to this city. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, June 1, by a large orchestra of picked musicians, many of whom have been heard here during the winter in the symphony concerts. It is not yet known who will be the conductor, but that matter will be settled within a few days. In general the policy of the concerts will be the same as those in the previous summers and everything that is possible will be done by the management in order that these may be made popular entertainments. The successful feature of an evening devoted to representative works of one composer will be repeated this year and the best available vocal and instrumental talent will be heard in solos during the summer.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Closes Its Season at the Academy of Music.

There was a large but not a great audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the last in its series of concerts for the present season. The programme was the most varied and the least exacting in the six of which it was the last. Mr. Nikisch seldom gives his audience more than four numbers, but last night there were five employing the orchestra, and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment in addition. The music, moreover, was of a lighter cast than usual. To be sure the symphony was by Brahms, a composer whose name is not synonymous with lightness; but even the symphony, that in D major No. 2, was relatively light, and everything else on the programme was appreciable by the least cultured taste. Besides the symphony, the purely instrumental numbers were Cherubini's overture "Anacreon," a concerto by Lalo in D minor, for the violoncello, and two movements, "Nikio's Dream" and "In the Hammock," from Benjamin Godard's "Symphonie Orientale." All of these were extremely enjoyable. The Cherubini Overture, a fine example, in the Mozart manner, of the classic school of composition, brilliantly played, pleased every one with its elegance of form and vivacity of sentiment, and it served excellently well to heighten by contrast the essentially modern music, both in form and feeling, of Godard and Lalo, by which it was followed. The 'cello concerto of the latter, admirably played as to the solo part of Mr. Anton Hekking, proved decidedly interesting. Always fluent and melodious, romantic in spirit, rich in color, and full, as to the orchestral part, of graceful and ingenious effects, it made a most favorable impression, and confirmed the good opinion formed of the composer from a hearing of his "Symphonie Espagnole" for the violin, as played by Loeffler, and more recently by Max Bendix. The two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale" were also well received. They are descriptive in the same way that the "Scenes Poetiques" of the same composer are descriptive, but they are quite free from exaggeration or the appearance of a straining after effect, and are characterized in a notable measure by the vivid coloring and sensuous sentiment distinctive of the modern French school. The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a contralto, who captured the audience at once. She has a voice of great beauty and an unexceptionable method, and she sings with the feeling and intelligence and refinement which bespeak the artist. Her air from Saint-Saen's "Samson and Delilia" was deeply impressive, and she gave three songs with pianoforte accompaniments, exquisitely played by Mr. Nikisch, by Massenet Delibes and Ferrari, with extraordinary charm. It will be a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman again.

[133]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1891.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the season, Saturday evening, April 25, like the last of several previous seasons, was glorious with its Beethoven programme. Exclusively Beethoven!

Overture, "Leonore," No. 2.
Fidelio, First Act.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The Music Hall was filled by an eager audience, and the concert, in spite of its unusual length, was inspiring from beginning to end.

The "Leonore" overture, in C, always published as the second of the four composed for the opera finally named Fidelio, has been proved to have been actually the first, the one played at the first performance of the opera, in 1805. The so-called No. 3, the greatest of them all by far, the consummate flower of the ideas sketched in No. 1, was first heard in 1806. But it was thought too colossal for the opera, beginning with comparatively light, Mozartean numbers. Therefore in 1807 he composed for a performance in Prague (which did not come off) a third, still in C, much smaller, less exciting, which is commonly printed as No. 1. There is internal evidence in the so-called No. 1, which fully confirms the documentary proofs. It is of a different character and temper from the two great ones in C. These take you right into the stress and passion of the happily ending tragedy. They must have been written under the immediate excitement of the drama. But No. 1 is in the calmer mood of reminiscence; it is a dreamy recalling, after years had passed, of the struggle and the triumph so splendidly embodied in the work. The two great ones are the real presence; the No. 1, composed long after the storm of passion had subsided, seems to review it all in memory, as if in musing, tranquil afterthought. So what we heard in this last concert was really the first overture, the original sketch of the great "Leonore No. 3," perhaps the greatest of all overtures. It was very finely played; you recognized the essential themes and features of the more finished work; the solid, solemn, grand descent of the whole orchestra starting with C; the pathetic, gentle themes from the opera hinted by the 'celli, the clarinet, the flute, the horns, bassoons, etc.; the approaching trumpet signal of deliverance; the great crescendo of the strings (not wrought up with the overwhelming power of "No. 3"); indeed, a most interesting study on the perfected overture, as well as on Beethoven's characteristic way of working, beginning often tentatively, but not contented until he had fully realized the idea, the aspiration in his mind; he knew that it was there potentially, that it was in him, but tried again and again until he actually put his hand on it, until the dream, the inspiration, stood there solid, glowing and complete.

The music of the first act of "Fidelio," orchestral and vocal, was given without omission. The part of Leonora (Fidelio) was sung by Mme. Antonia Mielke; Marcellina (the Jailor's daughter), by Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; Rocco (Jailor), by Mr. Emil Fischer; Jaquino, by Mr. W. H. Rieger; and Pizarro (the tyrant and evil genius of the play) by Mr. Heinrich Meyn—all of the New York Metropolitan (Wagner) Opera Company, except Mrs. Hascall and Mr. Meyn, whose homes are here. The tenor, the hero of the play, Florestan, only appears in the prison scene of the great second act.

The lighter numbers of the opening, so suggestive of Mozart: 1, duet between Marcellina (in love with the supposed boy Fidelio) and Jaquino, tenor, vainly pressing his suit with her, baulked and enraged by knockings at the gate; 2, the Aria, love dream, of Marcellina, impassioned, rich and beautiful in orchestration; 4, the lively bass song of Rocco, "A mighty thing is money" (das Gold), were well sung and accompanied. The tenor, to be sure, was rather feeble; but Mrs. Hascall, with a very fresh, sweet, pure soprano voice, sang charmingly; and Fischer, with his noble bass, is always sure and sings the father's part with hearty unction. The incomparable Quartet, in Canon, No. 3, after Leonora, disguised as Fidelio, has come in, never fails to give delight when tolerably well sung. It is marked Andante sostenuto, and was taken not too slow. The voices blended beautifully; yet no doubt it would have sounded even better had there been time for a repetition. The Terzet (No. 5), in which Leonore gets leave of the old jailer to help him in the prison, hoping to find her husband, political prisoner of Pizarro, develops more of the deeper individuality of Beethoven's genius, and was artistically and feelingly rendered. Mrs. Hascall sustaining her part bravely.

Then comes "the gouverneur," Pizarro, with his Spanish soldiers, entering to the lively rhythm of a short, most piquant, fascinating march, in its small compass so much more effective than an elaborate, long-spun march like that in Gounod's "Faust." With such fine oboes and clarinets it sounded delightfully. The Aria (No. 7), soliloquy, of Pizarro, gloating over the thought of revenge now almost within reach of his hands, was delivered with fine dramatic force and in good voice by Mr. Meyn; and the angry furor of the solo, its ejaculations of imaginary triumph, are enhanced and made mysteriously ominous by the sotto voce mutterings to one another of the guard: "He speaks of death," etc. Then comes No. 8, the duet, "Jetzt, Alter! Jetzt hat es Eile!" in which Pizarro vainly tries, by threat or persuasion, to work up the tender-hearted Rocco to the point of murdering the half-starved prisoner Florestan, Leonora's husband. The graphic power and intensity, the terrible suggestion and the strongly contrasted individuality of the musical dialogue, were satisfactorily brought out; the scene is thoroughly dramatic, and not a point was lost by such an orchestra under the masterly conductorship of Mr. Nikisch. It comes to a climax, none more powerful, exciting, full of impassioned indignation, fear and hope, in any opera or music-drama, in the great soprano Recitative and Aria of Leonora (No. 9): "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" In this Mme. Mielke was superb, save that her emphatic highest tones were often harsh. Dramatically she was in the spirit of the piece. The great invocation to "Hope," both the Adagio and the Allegro con brio, with the inspiring, difficult work for the three horns, was thrilling and uplifting. Only Lehmann have we heard sing this great scene with more tuneful and triumphant fervor.

The Finale of the Act, the great scene where the prisoners are let out to enjoy the open air by the kindness of Rocco, introduced a fine [chorus] manned by tenors and basses from Mr. [Zerrahn's] "Boston Singers." They all had good [voices] and had been carefully drilled for the [occasion] by a popular musical and and prison-like [colors] in slow chords of introduction! How buoyant, full of trembling, swelling hope and exultation the figure of accompaniment, led in by the bassoons! How full of feeling, pathos, joy, the voices, as one part after another flows in and they swell together to a full stream of the richest harmony! Then the whispered cautions: "Speak low, we are overheard." Then the warning that the governor is coming; the prisoners retire into the background; the hurried converse between Rocco and Leonora, bracing her spirit for the trial of going down into the prison, when he tells her what deliverance awaits Florestan; then the Andante with mysterious accompaniment, in which he tells her of the grave that must be dug; the entrance of Pizarro; the farewell chorus of the prisoners, taking leave of the "warm sunset"—was ever so much music, so much meaning, pathos, expectation, condensed into one opera finale? The audience heartily enjoyed it, felt it; and no doubt many were ready to say, Enough! Let thy servants now depart in peace! For it was getting late; we had had a rich feast, one of the best in quality, already.

We are only tempted to recall the first hearing of "Fidelio" on any stage in Boston. That was at the Boston Theatre, on the 1st of April, 1857. It was an indifferent German company, brought on from New York, thanks to the management of Thalberg, the pianist. The acting was generally good; the orchestra, under Carl Bergmann, passable. But the affair was improvised and slovenly; there should have been several rehearsals of so great a work. The Fidelio was Mme. Johannsen, with a voice much worn, but with a musical and dramatic instinct which carried her through surprisingly well. Mme. Berkel, voice flexible and bright, made a pretty Marcellina. Herr Bentler, a weak tenor in voice, sang the touching soliloquy of Florestan in prison with much true expression. Herr Oehrlein was the Rocco, stout enough for any jailor, with a bass voice of uncertain truth, but a fair singer. The Chorus was from the Orpheus Musical Society, their first appearance on the stage. It had to be pronounced "a very bad performance of the very best of music." Yet not a few were delighted to have this first privilege of hearing the music and the drama put together audibly and bodily for once. It was a preparation for more satisfactory hearings under better auspices. In that way has Boston grown, from poor beginnings, to its love and intimacy toward Beethoven. Sure audience he finds always now in this old seat of Puritans!

If after all this any felt a certain dread of weariness, they soon found themselves (most of them at least) agreeably disappointed. The old Fifth Symphony had lost nothing of its charm; its spell was as potent as ever. Besides its intrinsic, never-failing inspiration, there was a special reason, perhaps merely accidental, perhaps the recollection prompting the revival, which justified its introduction on that evening. It was the fiftieth anniversary (within a few weeks) of its first performance here in Boston. In the winter of 1841, in the old Federal Street Theatre, transformed into an "Odeon," in the concerts of the Academy of Music, under the presidency of the Hon. Samuel A. Eliot, and the conductorship of Henry Schmidt, the corner stone of Boston's symphony culture was virtually laid in the first (doubtless indifferent) performance here of Beethoven's sublime C-minor Symphony. It was repeated many times in that and the succeeding seasons, often before crowded audiences. On one occasion, we remember, when every seat was taken early in the parquet, sloping to the stage, there entered a well-known clergyman with his family, who, after descending a narrow aisle the whole way, looking to the right and left in vain for any place, stalked slowly back with mortified, indignant look, when suddenly arose from one side in the upper portion, leaning over the aisle, a witty clerical brother, who in a soft, high voice, rather impudent, with all too amiable a smile of sympathy, saluted him (audibly to all the neighborhood)—"I hope it may be sanctified unto yer, brother X!" Many Beethoven symphonies were taken up and creditably studied and performed in those winters. It was the beginning of symphony in Boston—beginning at the top! The smaller symphonies of Haydn and Mozart had been practised in a private club of amateurs, but in public performance their turn came after that of Beethoven. If only from idle curiosity, we should be pleased to know how many scores of times since that day it has been granted to us to listen to the Fifth Symphony.

Now, we are not disposed to enter into any question as to the correctness of the tempo or the manner in which Mr. Nikisch set the first pregnant four notes of the opening motive. Doubtless he knows, appreciates and feels the music well enough, perhaps as well as anybody. There is character in the slow, emphatic way in which he reads the passage; his pauses must not be too lightly quarrelled with, his reading not be scouted with contempt. He is a thoroughbred musician, his temperament and instincts are musical above the average, he, too, loves his Beethoven, he must be allowed the ordinary latitude in interpretation, and, right or wrong in detail, he does succeed in bringing out the power and beauty of the work, in realizing the ideal of the master, to a degree highly edifying and uplifting. This time, certainly, his reading as a whole, with few and momentary exceptions, did not deviate widely from the familiar orthodox examples. Every movement told with quickening power upon the listener. The heavenly Andante—full of holy sympathy with man in his life struggle, full of wise, angelic counsel, full of emphatic strengthening exhortation, supremely beautiful and lofty, perfect as a queenly flower bursting from its bud, symmetrical, complete in color and in fragrance, leaving nothing to desire or dream of—was rendered to a charm. The rapid figure of the double basses in the trio of the Scherzo, which in old days was scrambled through so helplessly, was all distinctly, uniformly outlined as a landscape in a flash of lightning; the vague, prolonged monotony of the pedal point, at which you pause in doubt and wonder, but feel so sure of great things yet to come; and the finale, greatest and most glorious of all triumphal marches consummation of the whole, all were brought out with irresistible, convincing majesty and power and beauty, making it impertinent to question or to criticise. Long as they had listened, many left the hall with lingering steps, as if loath to leave a sacred place, exchanging looks and words of wonder and delight. With another programme, length and heaviness might have been the text; but here music, genius, lofty sentiment, transporting beauty, put the sense of passing time quite out of thought.

The second leaf of the programme announced, not another programme, but another season of this noble orchestra, to begin on Saturday even-

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1891.

24th Symphony Concert—Beethoven Programme.

Portions of "Fidelio" and the Fifth Symphony.

The twenty-fourth and closing concert of this season's Symphony series was given on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven.
Part One of "Fidelio," Beethoven.
Symphony, No. 5, Beethoven.

Concert performances of Beethoven's only opera have been given before in Boston. The last one, about nine years ago, was a venture of the Arlington Club; Mr. Lang conducted, and the chorus consisted of the male voices of the Arlington and the Cecilia. Miss Dora Henninges sang the music of the part of Leonora; Mrs. Knowles, Marcellina; Mr. Adams, Florestan; Mr. Henschel, Pizzaro; Mr. Want, Jaquino. Perhaps the most vivid recollection of that performance is Mr. Henschel's dramatic singing of the air "Ha, what a day is this!" and the singing of Mr. Adams. The performance under notice was given with the assistance of the male chorus of the Boston Singers' Society, and the following soloists: Mme. Mielke, (Fidelio), Mrs. W. F. Hascall (Marcellina), Mr. W. H. Rieger (Jaquino), Mr. Emil Fischer (Rocco), Mr. Henrich Meyn (Pizzaro). This list represents an admirable selection, barring the representative of Pizzaro, who, while he gave to his music a virility of expression lacked the voice to make it effective; Pizzaro is supposed to be rather provoked when he says: "Now 'tis time to slay the slayer," and we think our readers will agree with us that few governors in Pizzaro's state of mind would give such a climatic utterance with a closed tone. A most creditable "first appearance in Boston" was Mrs. Hascall's, whose singing it has been our pleasure to note in this column. Her clear and pure soprano voice is used well, and she sings with much expression. We can recall few lyric sopranos with voices so easily poised in the throat as is hers. Both in her solo and concerted music Mrs. Hascall sang with the confidence of a veteran; as she was called upon for the part at short notice, the feat was a test of her musicianship. Jaquino is not of much account on the concert stage; Mr. Rieger kept his place and sang the notes of his part, and that was about all we could ask.

Mr. Fischer sang the song about "Gold" with the confidence of a man with pockets full of the article and the skill of one who knows himself to be a good vocalist. Mme. Mielke sang the great scene "Thou Monstrous Fiend" superbly, and her reading of the recitatives showed how fine she must be on the stage; it is a pity so great an artist will leave (?) the country without being heard in Boston in her proper sphere, that of Wagner opera. The "Canon" quartet was pretty well sung, though it dragged a little. The difficult finale of the act was given with as much effect as is possible in concert; the male chorus is to be thanked for good work. Mr. Nikisch conducted the "Fidelio" music with every evidence of knowing it thoroughly.

The lesser of the two greater "Leonore" overtures—if the paradox be admitted—was well performed, but words fail to convey our appreciation of the noble—yes, magnificent interpretation of the fifth symphony. On reviewing the work of the orchestra for the season we may refer to it again.

The audience on Saturday night was limited only by the capacity of the hall. Mr. Nikisch's desk (altar, a small but observant child called it) was covered with flowers, and our conductor closed his season amid abundant expressions of the good will and admiration of the thousands who make up his weekly audience.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Enthusiastically Received by Philadelphia Audience.

PHILADELPHIA, April 27.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the sixth concert in their course here last evening before an audience which filled the seating capacity of the house and much of the standing room. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was enthusiastically received, as were the soloists of the evening, Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Anton Hepping. The programme was as follows:

Overture, Anacreon	Cherubini
Aria, Samson and Dalila	Saint-Saëns
Concerto for violoncello, in D minor	Lalo
a. Nikia's Dream, from Symphonie Orientale, op. 84.	B. Godard
b. In the Hammock, from Symphonie Orientale, op. 84.	B. Godard
Songs with piano.
Regrets	Delibes
Bonne Nuit	Massenet
A une Fiancee	Ferrari
Smyphony No. 2, in D major	Brahms
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale, Allegro con spirito.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 30.

The beer will flow in Music Hall this summer, and we shall have our dearly-beloved "Pops" again. The commissioners are wise not to add to their unpopularity by a repetition of the foolish business of last year.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1891.

MUSIC HALL GETS A LICENSE.

Promenade Concerts to be in Order This Summer—896 Liquor Licenses to be Issued—Revenue of $1,100,000.

A license to sell liquor in Music Hall has been granted for the coming summer. Chairman Whiting of the Board of Police says so, and that a notice was sent out today. Indeed, 857 dealers who had licenses last year, when there were 893 in all, received word from the Board of Police that their licenses had been renewed. Thirty-six of the dealers of last year had to face remonstrances against a renewal of their licenses, and in one of these cases—that of Patrick Henry of Chelsea street, East Boston—the board has decided not to give another license. The other thirty-five cases are being considered by the board. Mr. Whiting, speaking for that body today, said that it was impossible to give out the names of the successful applicants, as the books of the board were in such a condition that the work of getting at the names would take altogether too much time. He also refused positively to give out the names of the dealers against whom remonstrances are pending. However, every dealer who does not today receive notice of a renewal of his license will understand that there is a hitch in his case, and all such will probably besiege the commissioners for explanation tomorrow. Instead of there being 893 licenses for the year beginning May 1—that being the number the past year—there will be 896, the increase of three being warranted by the official census figures. Excepting Music Hall, there have been as yet no licenses granted except in cases where they were held the past year. The revenue from licenses the coming year will be about $1,100,000.

In regard to the plans for the summer series of popular concerts little could be ascertained at Music Hall. Mr. C. A. Ellis is now in the West directing the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the final arrangements will not be completed until his return to this city. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, June 1, by a large orchestra of picked musicians, many of whom have been heard here during the winter in the symphony concerts. It is not yet known who will be the conductor, but that matter will be settled within a few days. In general the policy of the concerts will be the same as those in the previous summers and everything that is possible will be done by the management in order that these may be made popular entertainments. The successful feature of an evening devoted to representative works of one composer will be repeated this year and the best available vocal and instrumental talent will be heard in solos during the summer.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Closes Its Season at the Academy of Music.

There was a large but not a great audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave the last in its series of concerts for the present season. The programme was the most varied and the least exacting in the six of which it was the last. Mr. Nikisch seldom gives his audience more than four numbers, but last night there were five employing the orchestra, and three songs with pianoforte accompaniment in addition. The music, moreover, was of a lighter cast than usual. To be sure the symphony was by Brahms, a composer whose name is not synonymous with lightness; but even the symphony, that in D major No. 2, was relatively light, and everything else on the programme was appreciable by the least cultured taste. Besides the symphony, the purely instrumental numbers were Cherubini's overture "Anacreon," a concerto by Lalo in D minor, for the violoncello, and two movements, "Nikio's Dream" and "In the Hammock," from Benjamin Godard's "Symphonie Orientale." All of these were extremely enjoyable. The Cherubini Overture, a fine example, in the Mozart manner, of the classic school of composition, brilliantly played, pleased every one with its elegance of form and vivacity of sentiment, and it served excellently well to heighten by contrast the essentially modern music, both in form and feeling, of Godard and Lalo, by which it was followed. The 'cello concerto of the latter, admirably played as to the solo part of Mr. Anton Hekking, proved decidedly interesting. Always fluent and melodious, romantic in spirit, rich in color, and full, as to the orchestral part, of graceful and ingenious effects, it made a most favorable impression, and confirmed the good opinion formed of the composer from a hearing of his "Symphonie Espagnole" for the violin, as played by Loeffler, and more recently by Max Bendix. The two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale" were also well received. They are descriptive in the same way that the "Scenes Poetiques" of the same composer are descriptive, but they are quite free from exaggeration or the appearance of a straining after effect, and are characterized in a notable measure by the vivid coloring and sensuous sentiment distinctive of the modern French school. The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, a contralto, who captured the audience at once. She has a voice of great beauty and an unexceptionable method, and she sings with the feeling and intelligence and refinement which bespeak the artist. Her air from Saint-Saen's "Samson and Delilia" was deeply impressive, and she gave three songs with pianoforte accompaniments, exquisitely played by Mr. Nikisch, by Massenet Delibes and Ferrari, with extraordinary charm. It will be a pleasure to hear Mrs. Wyman again.

[133]

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 28, 1891.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Season With a Modern Programme.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening with great success. Neither Mr. Nikisch nor his admirable band has at any time displayed more fervor or more complete and satisfying execution. The Parisian composers occupied a prominent place in the programme, the first part including Saint-Saens, Lalo and Godard, with an overture by Cherubini, who was also a Parisian, of the older school. The "Anacreon" overture is a model of dignified form as well as of true musical invention and its strong and refined performance was an inspiring introduction to the later music.

Lalo's concerto for violoncello, played with great skill by Mr. Hekking, is an exquisite example of this Spanish-Parisian's fertile fancy and of his original and dainty instrumentation. Following this were two movements from Godard's "Oriental Symphony," rich in fluent melody and warmth and variety of color, a work entirely French in spite of its Oriental languor, showing sometimes the influence of Gounod and more often the sentiment that Godard shared with Delibes and others of the school.

The example of Saint Saens was the well-known aria from "Samson and Delila," sung with excellent intelligence and style by Mrs. Walter C. Wyman. In this and in a group of songs by Massanet, Delibes and Ferrari, for which Mr. Nikisch played the piano accompaniment, Mrs. Wyman showed herself a very agreeable singer, with a capable voice, a clear, unaffected delivery and a bright, artistic method that was evidently learned from the French.

The concert closed with Brahms' D major symphony, a beautiful composition in spite of its annoying prolixity. Brahms has so much to say that there really is no reason why he should say it over and over so often. But it is all real music and it is, moreover, music of a kind that Mr. Nikisch plays delightfully. With this we bid farewell to Mr. Nikisch and band until November 2. The six concerts of next season will be given monthly on Monday evenings.

The Press

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1891.

TWELVE PAGES

The Academy—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final concert in a series which has been uniformly successful was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music in the presence of a very large and appreciative audience.

Mr. Nikisch is to be congratulated upon having received, for his methods, his orchestra, and his soloists, the most emphatic indorsement to which a leader can aspire—the indorsement of a following which has grown steadily throughout the Winter both in numbers and in enthusiasm.

The programme of last evening so well illustrates his talent for combination that it merits reprinting in full, as follows:—

Cherubini, Overture, "Anacreon"; Saint-Saens, Aria, "Samson and Dalila"; Lalo, Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor; Benjamin Godard a. Nikia's Dream, b. In the Hammock, from "Symphonie Orientale," Op. 84. Songs with piano:—Delibes, "Regrets"; Massenet, "Bonne Nuit"; Ferrari, "A une Fiancee"; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major, Allegro ma non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, Finale (Allegro con spirito). Soloists: Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, and Mr. Anton Hekking.

The first glance at such a typical programme is enough to propitiate an audience. Within the limits of good taste, avoiding license on the one hand and severity on the other, it would be difficult indeed to offer a great variety. The effect of the whole is, from the first, distinctly pleasing. But the most successful of all men is the man who pleases without pandering to vulgar tastes or debasing his standard in the effort to win applause, as though the public taste and standard were hopelessly low.

Mr. Nikish is fortunate in having the seal of just that kind of success set upon his work at the end of this season in Philadelphia. His selections were heartily applauded, and his soloists recalled again and again—especially Mrs. Wyman, whose "Bonne Nuit" (Massenet) and "A une Fiancee" (Ferrari) were really delicious.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, April 28, 1891.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Last evening at the Academy of Music the last concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. Conductor Nikisch again displayed his noteworthy incapacity as a programme maker, the only interesting numbers being Brahm's D Major Symphony and two excerpts from Godard's Oriental Symphony. Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cellist, played Lalo's concerto in colorless style, and Mrs. Wyman, a Chicago contralto, sang the hackneyed cantabile from "Samson and Delila." The soloists at these concerts are nearly always several grades below the orchestra in artistic attainments, and there was no exception to this rule last night.

Boston Journal.

WITH SUPPLEMENT.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1891.

GRANTING LIQUOR LICENSES.

Notices Sent Tuesday to 858 Dealers—The List Almost Unchanged.

On Tuesday notices were sent to 858 liquor dealers in Boston by the Board of Police informing them that their applications for licenses had been granted. All but one held licenses during the past year. There is one exception, however, and that is the case of Music Hall, which did not receive a license last year, but has had its application granted for the coming summer season. So that the frequenters of the promenade concerts in this hall in the past will again have an opportunity to pass the coming warm summer evenings in the same way. The license given to the Music Hall people takes the place of that held by Patrick Henry of Brighton last year, to whom the board refuses, for various reasons, to give a renewal. There will be 896 licenses granted altogether this year—three more than last. This is because of an error in the census, Boston's population having been found to be larger than it was reported last year. Before the remaining thirty-eight licenses are granted there will be hearings before the board on remonstrances received from citizens living in the vicinity of applicants, who stand at the head of the list. It is probable, however, that some 25 or 30 new places will receive licenses, and as many present holders of licenses will have their applications for renewal refused.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, April 28, 1891.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme made up for the final concert of the Boston Orchestra's season in this city, given at the Academy last night, contained but two orchestral numbers in addition to the symphony, which was placed at the end of the list. If the impressive succession of chords that open the "Anacreon" overture—with which the programme led off—had been especially devised to show off the unity and perfectly blended tone of the band, they could not have better served that purpose. Mr. Nikisch knows the overture by heart; his men were evidently quite familiar with it and intent upon realizing his ideas of it; which is to say that the music was given with artistic vitality and completeness. Two excerpts from Godard's "Oriental" symphony (which might almost as well be the Occidental so far as effective coloring is concerned) followed, with the eloquent but interminable Brahms second (D major) symphony in conclusion. There is no need to dwell upon the performances at any point after what has been indicated above, except to say a few pleasant words about the soloists who assisted. These were Mrs. Walter C. Wyman, contralto, and Anton Hekking, violoncellist. The latter played Lalo's D minor concerto for that instrument with marked intelligence and technical facility, and made a distinct impression upon the house.

Mrs. Wyman sang an aria from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Delilah," in a style that lacked only dramatic spirit in order to stamp her as one of the most important contralto singers of the day. Afterward she sang three French songs (all in French, and in such a way as to indicate that she is to the manner born), with the result of steadily increasing the favor of the audience toward her. "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massanet, and "To a Fiancée," by Ferrari, were the selections, and each received such altogether charming treatment that Mrs. Wyman received a couple of recalls that were cordial and unanimous. It should be added that she had the advantage of piano accompaniments by Mr. Nikisch, who is as good an accompanist as he is a conductor, and what more need be said?

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.... April 29

MADE MANY FRIENDS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Received With Enthusiasm in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Md., April 28.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave their fifth concert in this city this season at the Concordia Opera House, tonight, before an audience which filled every part of the building. The programme was as follows:

Overture, Oberon.....Weber
Concerto for piano, No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23.....Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto moderato, D flat.
Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.
Andantino semplice, D flat.
Allegro con fuoco, B flat minor.
a. Nikia's dream } from Symphonic orientale.
b. In the hammock } Op. 84....Benjamin Godard
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Finale (allegro con spirito).

Mrs. Helen Hopekirk was the soloist of the evening, and her rendering of the Tschaikowsky concerto was especially brilliant.

Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra was received with unbounded enthusiasm, and will find a warm welcome here next season.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 30.

BALTIMORE TURNED OUT.

Filled the Hall to Listen to the Kneisel Quartet.

BALTIMORE, Md., April 29.—The Kneisel quartet, composed of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, gave a matinee concert here this afternoon to the seating capacity of Hazazer's Hall. The programme was as follows:

Emperor quartet.....Haydn
Suite for violin and piano, op. 11.....Goldmark
Andante from quartet.....Tschaikowsky
Scherzo from quartet.....Cherubini
String quintet, op. 88.....Brahms

At the close of the concert the quartet went at once to Washington, where the orchestra gives a concert tonight.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its last concert of the season. The works were finely performed and the director, Arthur Nikisch, was received with hearty applause. The soloist was, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who made a vigorous attack on Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto. It was her first appearance in Baltimore and she made a fairly good impression. So far as vigor and strength were concerned Mrs. Hopekirk's style was well enough. But there are such things as accentuation, spirit and rhythm, without pounding, and with her they were often resolved into this. Her playing was wanting in flexibility and grace, but her brilliance won her generous applause and a recall at the close of the concerto. The orchestral works were: Overture, to, "Oberon," Weber; two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale"—"Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock;" symphony in D major, Brahms.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1891.

A RARE MUSICAL TREAT

Close of the Season by the Boston Symphony Concert.

The closing concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a rare delight. The Weber overture to Oberon was deliciously rendered, and then came the colossal work of the program—the wonderful Tschaikowski piano concerto. This great modern master has all the elements of musical power and expression, and he uses them to the fullest possible extent. The concerto has the grand strength of the Tartar race and the gorgeous coloring of the Orientals. Its rendition requires a magnificent orchestra, the strongest modern piano, a conductor of the highest rank, and a soloist of true musical genius. All the requirements were filled last evening, and the result will be memorable to lovers of the beautiful and the grand who had the good fortune to be present.

The two movements from Godard's Symphonie Orientale formed a delightful intermezzo between the great conterto and the Brahm's Symphony, which had the latter half of the program.

The soloist, Madam Helen Hopekirk, was enthusiastically recalled repeatedly after the concerto. The Boston Symphony Orchestra increasing its well deserved reputation at ry concert, and the season just closed is st it has ever had in this city.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

A TOUR OF TRIUMPH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pittsburg's 400.

PITTSBURG, Penn., April 30.—The Boston Symphony orchestra arrived here this morning from Washington and are at the Seventh Avenue Hotel.

The third concert of the season, under the auspices of the Mozart Club, was held in the old City Hall this evening.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist of the evening, and won much praise for her rendering of the songs assigned to her.

The programme was as follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Mozart..Canzonetta and Page's aria from The Marriage of Figaro.
Tschaikowsky..Andantino and scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Saint-Saens.....Symphonic poem, Danse Macabre
Songs with Piano.
a. Goldmark.....Die Quelle
b. Gade.....The Goldsmith
c. Delibes.....Bon Jour, Suzanne
Wagner.....Waldweben from Siegfried
Wagner.....Prelude, Die Meistersinger

Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were received with that unbounded enthusiasm which seems to follow them everywhere they go.

Among those present were Andrew Carnegie and party, H. C. Frick, Robert Pitcairn, George W. Chaifant, James Laughlin, Jr., George Westinghouse, Jr., Bishop Courtlandt Whitehead, and in fact all of Pittsburg's "400."

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

THEIR TRIUMPH CONTINUES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes in Pittsburg.

PITTSBURG, Penn., May 1.—The fourth and last concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in the old City Hall tonight, before the same representative audience that thronged the edifice last evening.

The concert was divided into two parts. First the orchestra rendered the following programme:

Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Tasso"
Lento
Allegro strepitoso; Lento.
Adagio mesto.
Meno adagio.
Allegretto mosso con grazia (quasi minuetto).
Allegro con molto brio.

Soli for Violin.

Svendsen.....Romanza
Sarasate.....Spanish Dance

Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The audience went fairly wild over Mr. Kneisel's solo, and he was recalled again and again.

The rendering of the "Tasso" symphonic poem was perfect.

For part second Verdi's requiem was given by the Mozart Club; Mr. J. P. McCollum, conductor, assisted by the orthestra. The soloists were Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin.

Tomorrow morning the orchestra go to Cleveland.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1891.

Note 648. I know no fitter place than this department to pay a tribute to the memory of one whose face was so familiar to old Bostonian lovers of music, and who was so well known personally to many contributors to this department.

William C. Nichols, musician, lately deceased, a noble-hearted, upright man, a scholarly gentleman and a Christian—such was the character of the subject of this sketch, he who has but lately passed to the life beyond.

It would perhaps better become the writer of these lines to leave it to some abler person to pay tribute to the late departed—to some one of his many acquaintances, who, without doubt, would have at their command words more expressive and better fitting the occasion. Yet, as an acquaintance of many years' standing, I beg leave herein to say a few words for my dear old friend William; for by that name have we for years greeted each other. Our intimacy dates from early in the 'sixties. Since that time we have played together for parties, marched together and travelled together in close companionship thousands of miles. We have occupied the same hotel room, stateroom and car section. We have walked together over the same grounds and reviewed the same sights in the various cities of the land. In the matter of sight-seeing our tastes were mutual.

Thus do I know whereof I speak when I say that he possessed many of the noble qualities that serve to make up the perfect man. His virtues were so numerous that one would scarcely dream of seeking for a fault.

He was also a man of great firmness and decision of character. Nothing would swerve him a jot from what he considered to be right, and in discriminating between the right and the wrong of a thing he showed excellent judgment. He was a church member—not one of your Sunday Christians merely, but one at heart, in principle and in spirit. Yet he never was in the habit of forcing his ideas upon his associates, except in the way of wholesome and kindly advice. He was fond of his little jokes, but disliked profanity. "Don't William," he has sometimes said to me; "that word adds no strength to your argument." It was a fatherly reprimand and I respected him for it. His sincere friendship for those he liked was one of his noblest traits.

He would make no false promises, but when an opportunity presented itself whereby he could aid or do a kind act for a friend, he simply did it; that was all. In the various departments of music he was well known to the entire musical fraternity of Boston as a thoroughly competent and reliable performer.

He was also known to thousands outside of the profession on account of his long connection with the Germania Band and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although he was universally respected for his many excellent qualities, by none was he more highly esteemed than by his old associates of the Symphony Orchestra and by every person who was or is in any way connected with that organization; and the thousands of the patrons of the concerts at the Boston Music Hall will long remember the familiar form and face of William C. Nichols.

W. A. F.

[134]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The tenth season ended on Saturday evening with the Beethoven programme which had been announced and which extended in performance to the preposterous length of almost two hours and a half. The "Leonore" overture was, all things weighed, well played; an unusual consideration was shown for the lighter and tenderer portions, but there was much liberty taken in proportioning the themes, thus giving almost the effect of a fantasia rather than of an overture. The fifth symphony, ending the concert, was played in the peculiar manner which Mr. Nikisch affects, and the stronger passages, especially the introduction, were severe and hard in tone and accent and extreme in pause and emphasis. The reading was sonorous and striking — especially when the kettle-drummer got his innings — but it was not all classic or refined. The "Fidelio" act gave much gratification and deserved the most of the generous applause which it received. Mme. Mielke's Leonora had warmth, variety and pathos, and proved her to be something better and higher than a mere Wagner declaimer; Mr. Fischer's Rocco was sound and sturdy, but dry and grim, the "Gold" song in particular being taken up too slowly and heavily; Marcellina was sung with animation by Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, whose voice is bright, high, and rather telling, but squeezed in formation and explosive in delivery; Mr. Rieger, of a mild, sweet and rather small tenor, was the Jaquino, and Mr. Meyn made some excellent points in the difficult music of Pizarro, which needs a phenomenal voice to cope fully with it. The male choir of the Singers—awkwardly and disadvantageously split in half by the orchestra—did very well with the Prisoner's chorus, and the orchestral score was generally played with discretion and elasticity, although the wooden wind was far too loud in Leonora's scene.

The retrospect of the season is none too happy or hopeful, and in no previous year have there been such decided expressions of discontent and doubt among those patrons who do not belong to the Boston sets which, having comparatively little judgment or independence, are obstinate in maintaining that everything relative to the Symphony concerts is managed in the best way, and the results the highest attainable on the planet. We would be the last to deny to Mr. Nikisch much talent and high artistic qualities, which have perhaps done more than his work as a musician and a director to maintain him in the favor to which he was welcomed as an untried stranger. The orchestra chafed against the precision and the martinet-like discipline of Mr. Gericke, but they respected his art and were proud of what he made them achieve. They are no less restless under the variable, good-fellow-ish management of Mr. Nikisch, while they have lost some of their esprit du corps and their determination to do the finest and best work possible. The disposition toward the sensational, which makes some of Mr. Nikisch's readings of modern things incomparably thrilling and brilliant, is utterly at variance with classic and elevated music; and as the director has a lower standard of reading, so the men have adopted a lower standard of playing. Not alone in the symphonies themselves have carelessness, coarseness, inaccuracy and want of sympathy been apparent; but when engaged for other concerts the men have infrequently done less well than many a chance body of players casually gathered for an odd evening or two. Many members retain their places, we have good reason to believe, merely because their pay is good and sure and their homes are here. Some of the better men have been already approached with offers on behalf of the orchestras to be formed in New York, and the chances are that there will be an unusual number of changes in the personnel next season. The indiscriminate applause and compliment of a socially influential part of the audience, which has seemed to delight most in what was least worthy of approval, and the almost unqualified optimism of one revered critic who was in his younger days wisely exacting and justly difficult to please, have gone far to confirm Mr. Nikisch in ways which he ought to have altered and to put reasonable and right criticism into a false attitude of captiousness and prejudice. We believe in the Symphony system and have gloried in the bold, broad spirit of its founder; we have been full and hearty in praise and eager in encouragement. We have a right therefore to comment unreservedly and to warn strongly. Our opinion is—slowly formed and reluctantly owned—that unless a radical change for the better takes place immediately at the beginning of the next season, the Boston orchestra has passed its zenith and must decline until such later time as another Gericke shall come to raise it slowly and laboriously to the height from which it should never have declined. The programmes of the season have been less well received than those of almost any previous year, and dissatisfaction with them is not altogether ill-founded. A hasty résumé of them shows that the names of German composers appeared seventy-four times as against nineteen nominations of composers from all the rest of the world—the exact division being, American works, three; French, five; Scandinavian, two; English, one; Spanish, one; Italian, two; Russian, five. Of the ninety-three titles, fifteen represent things new to Boston, of which four were first peformances in this country, one-third of these works being brought forward by the soloists. Of the authors other than German, only two were strangers to these concerts, and among the Germans there was only one newcomer—Klughardt, whose symphony was more a matter of curiosity than value. Beethoven's name appeared ten times, Wagner's eleven, Liszt's five and Schumann's four, while for Schubert, Haydn, Mozart and Handel one or two selections were thought sufficient. This is not quite the right showing for an orchestra which has claimed to be the peer of any other orchestra in the world, and the time is coming when the public, learning slowly by severe experience, will refrain from paying in its tens of thousands of dollars for a season of the [illegible] which it knows elementary [illegible]

We maintain that to direct so large a band as it should be directed through the private and public rehearsals and the fifty or sixty concerts of the season is work enough for one man and brings him honor enough. There should be at once selected by Mr. Higginson a committee of three or four competent men —and they could easily be found—to prepare the programmes and to publish in advance a general prospectus stating the chief works, old and new, which would be given, while the director, whether he be Mr. Nikisch or Mr. Blackboy, should feel that there is nothing derogatory to him in this, and that he can achieve higher accomplishments and win more fame by faithfully and nobly performing the work prepared for him. A better discretion in the choice of vocalists is also needed. The future of the Symphony Orchestra is at stake, or will be soon, and the unexampled favor shown hitherto may as easily be withdrawn by the fickle and fanciful public.

[I]E COMMONWEALTH

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

The season of Symphony concerts closed with a Beethoven programme, namely: Overture "Leonore," No. 2; Part One of "Fidelio," and the Fifth Symphony. The participants in the "Fidelio" music were Mme. Antonia Mielke (Leonora); Mrs. E. M. H. Hascall (Marcellina); Mr. W. H. Rieger (Jaquino); Mr. Emil Fischer (Rocco); Mr. Heinrich Meyn (Pizzaro). The chorus in the final scene of the act was from Mr. Osgood's Boston Singers Society.

The choice of Mr. Meyn for the part of Pizzaro was the only inadequate one, and his failure was due to physical rather than artistic limitations. Pizzaro is a ruffian who, according to Beethoven, had a voice of iron-clad character; Mr. Meyn is a gentleman with a voice of virile quality, it is true, but too slight for the purpose. Mme. Mielke's declamation and singing of the great air "Thou Monstrous Fiend," an epic in itself, was superlatively fine. A charming singer is Mrs. Hascall, whose high soprano voice is sweet and tuneful, and who sings artistically and with few faults of method. She undertook the part at short notice, and her success is all the more creditable as Marcellina's music is not in the usual repertory of young singers. Mr. Fischer's Rocco was adequate; he sang the song about gold with every indication of knowing the value of the metal. Mr. Rieger's taste was not beyond his capacity to do well. The "Canon quartet" was admirably sung, and the concerted finale, by no means an easy page of Beethoven. The male chorus had been drilled by Mr. Osgood. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance with marked attention to the spirit of Beethoven's music, and the result could not be otherwise than good. It would have been preferable to have performed the whole of "Fidelio" instead of one act; the symphony, although gloriously played, could have been spared. Mr. Nikisch was warmly applauded at the close of the concert, which was heard by an enormous audience. The next concert will be given on October 10.

A few words of retrospect: In the matter of programmes, Mr. Nikisch has made an advance over his first year; he has got bravely beyond the borders of the Rhine, and his ken includes an occasional Russian, Slav, Englishman and American. The proportion of new music performed was greater this season than last, and the novelties were generally worthy. Toward native composers, Mr. Nikisch's attitude was friendly, yet he has not given us any of Prof. Paine's music nor asked Mr. McDowell to take down his folios. Here are two great composers among us, and such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony should become their natural stimulus. With one or two exceptions, the soloists were worthy the dignity of the concerts.

Mention of the anniversary concert of the Apollo Club is deferred until after the repetition concert of Monday next. Arthur Friedheim's piano recitals have demonstrated that he is a great player, while that of Mr. Victor Benham have shown that he might be.

POCO A POCO.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON:

THURSDAY..... April 30, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last of the series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night. The attendance was limited only by the seating capacity of the building, and the attention given as well as the discriminating applause attested the general satisfaction of the listeners. Of the excellence of this band of musicians much has been said in these columns, and each performance reveals new beauties of interpretation and execution. Its work last night included Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," two movements; "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock," from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, No. 3, in E flat. The last named was the feature of the evening and in every movement the sympathy of both leader and band with the thought and idea of the great composer was manifest. The weird and dainty melody in the Godard symphony was also beautifully wrought out, and the supporting work of the orchestra in the Tschaikowsky concerto was more satisfactory than that of the piano soloist, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who seemed to display more muscular than intellectual vigor in her playing. Mr. Anton Hekking gave three numbers upon the violoncello and proved himself an artist upon this difficult but, in the [illegible] performer, entrancing in-

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891

The last Symphony concert of the season of '90-'91 was given last Saturday evening in Music Hall. The conductor's stand was prettily decorated, and when Mr. Nikisch appeared upon the stage, he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause.

* * * * *

The program was made up of the following works of Beethoven: "Lenore" overture, No. 2; the Fifth symphony; and the first act of "Fidelio," in which the parts of Leonora and Marcellina were taken by Mrs. Antonia Mielke and Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; and the parts of Rocco, Jaquino and Pizarro by Messrs. Emil Fischer, W. H. Rieger and Heinrich Meyn. The "chorus of prisoners" was composed of members of the Boston Singers' Society. The fragment of the opera was sung in the German language, and it was presented without scenery, costumes and action.

* * * * *

The concert was very long; it lasted until nearly half-past ten; and yet the interest of the audience was kept alive until the very end, and at the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was most heartily applauded. This applause was both the expression of the personal good-will of the hearers and an acknowledgment of the pleasure given by the evening's performance; for there is no doubt but that the extract from "Fidelio" was keenly relished by the majority.

* * * * *

The overture, "Lenore, No. 2," would be a great work if "Lenore, No. 3," had not been written. The former continually hints at and suggests the latter, and, however admirable the sketch may be, the enlarged and elaborated work obscures the first draught.

* * * * *

The performance of the first act of "Fidelio" may be taken as a text of a sermon, with many heads and subdivisions. It was sung in the German language, and four of the singers that took part are Germans. And yet there is an English translation of the libretto, and there are singers in this country who can sing the English language. But here in Boston a desperate attempt is made to "germanize" our music. Do we need an orchestral conductor? There is none outside of Germany, and we import a German. Is there a German singer in this country disengaged? Whether the singer is good or bad, he or she is allowed to appear upon the Music Hall stage. The fact that the singer is a German seems enough; and all questions concerning the vocal ability of the singer are thus answered in advance. In other words, with the aid and abettal of the men in power, here in Boston, an American city, German singers are constantly given the preference over all singers of other nationalities.

* * * * *

Now it is a notorious fact, a fact acknowledged by German lovers of music and German musicians, from Frederick the Great to Richard Wagner, that a German singer in the true sense of the word is a rara avis. And Wagner knew well his business when he treated the German voice as an orchestral instrument. To declaim a passage from one of Wagner's later operas is one thing; to sing a melody is another. Yet whatever the occasion may be, whether it is an opera aria of conventional form that is to be sung, or a Wagner scene, we too often see a German come upon the stage, and we assist (as the French say) at his convulsive breathing, we admire the many qualities of tone and the assortment of voices packed within his throat, we dote upon his erratic and exaggerated phrasing, and we exhibit delirious delight at the skill displayed in avoiding the pitch.

* * * * *

We as Americans are old enough to stand upon our own legs even in matters of art. A century ago Italian opera reigned supreme in Germany. The singers were Italians, the operas were written in Italian style, the directors of the opera orchestras were generally Italians. But the Germans finally came to the conclusion that their own language should be heard in their own opera houses. Why should we abhor our own language? A libretto is no more ridiculous in English than in German or Italian. (As for that matter, an opera is an absurdity when looked at coldly, whether it be by Bellini or Wagner.) The evil has spread and we find its marks in song recitals. Our own singers are almost compelled to sing in German. Audiences will tolerate grotesque pronunciation, a misconception of the meaning of the words and a consequent lame delivery of the sense of the text, so long as they hear, however incorrectly declaimed, the language that has grown so dear to them.

* * * * *

The close attention paid to the different numbers last Saturday, the applause that followed every air and each concerted piece showed the love of the people at large for opera.

* * * * *

This season we have been obliged to take our opera in small doses. We have had one or two "operatic festivals," mongrel entertainments, neither concerts strictly speaking nor operas; and yet music lovers have greedily snapped at the only opportunity of hearing anything akin to opera. Would a manager run too great a risk, if, for a few weeks in the season, he gave a series of popular operas and operettas modestly but respectably? There would be no need of gorgeous scenery or expensive ballet. There are many operas that demand only simple stage settings, a small but carefully chosen chorus and a few good singers. Mr. John Mullaly has shown this spring upon two occasions what a thorough and experienced musician could do with an orchestra, the members of which were chosen at random and hastily thrown together. There are singers in this city that would gladly embrace such an opportunity, and that are fully competent to sing in light opera. The beginning should necessarily be humble. There are operas by Lortzing, Lecocq, Adam, Auber, and many others that would not be beyond the capabilities of a company made up of singers of moderate abilities. But any opera or operetta so given should be sung in English.

* * * * *

The performance of Saturday suggests other thoughts, but the expression of them must be deferred to a more convenient season. As for the performance itself it may be summed up by saying that with the exception of Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Fischer the singers were unable to do justice to the music; that Mrs. Mielke was not heard to such advantage Saturday evening as on former occasions; that the quartet was poorly sung; and that the orchestral accompaniment was often noisy. And yet there were many pleasurable moments, and the applause of the audience was very genuine.

* * * * *

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the fifth symphony last Saturday was more conservative than that of last season and in certain respects there was a marked improvement in the performance. The brass did not so arrogantly assert itself; there was no apparent straining after theatrical effects. It is true that some take exception to Mr. Nikisch's delivery of the opening phrase; but surely this phrase should be thundered out, and the repeated notes should be played heavily and detached. The story that the phrase was intended to portray, "Fate knocking at the door," may be a silly legend; but on the other hand the notes should not be played as though they expressed a woodpecker's queries to the bark of a tree. Besides, unless these notes are played heavily and detached, and the rhythm most strongly accented, the three eighth notes are liable to be played as a triplet.

* * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

THE CLOSING CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert on Saturday evening week was but a partial success. The select ensemble for the first act of the Fidelio music was unwisely chosen, for even such first-class artists as Mme. Mielke and Mr. Emil Fischer should have been associated with a more effective Pizzaro than Mr. Meyn, in the Fidelio cast; by a worthier Jaquino than Mr. Rieger; and by a far more competent Marcellina than Mrs. Wilbur Hascall. Mrs. Nikisch was the original choice for the part of Marcellina, but on dit that after having studied the music with her usual zeal she concluded that it was all in all too difficult for her. Congratulations to the public on account of Mrs. Nikisch's decision may quite properly be transferred to her, for it is very probable that even she would have done much better with the part than did Mrs. Wilbur Hascall. This lady has not exactly a quasi soprano voice but a soprano quasi voice, and although she labored with deep sincerity with the music assigned her it can not also be maintained in her favor that she literally sang it. Mr. Meyn is altogether too good a musician to have been made the victim of a serious error (unintentional, no doubt), in being assigned the part of Pizzaro. The difficulty of the part is well known. Under more favorable conditions Mr. Meyn is undoubtedly an artist. The tenor, Mr. Rieger, was tolerable, for although he has a somewhat reedy voice, his vocalization is very good. Both Mr. Fischer and Mme. Mielke admirably well filled their respective rôles. The "Abschenlicher" aria was sung by Mme. Mielke with a dramatic effect and artistic mastery that left nothing to be desired. The male chorus of the tout ensemble was very inefficient, not because of any intrinsic shortcoming, but owing to Mr. Nikisch's inexperience as a chorus director. The overture to Leonore, No. 2, was effectively played, and Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the Fifth symphony was more conservative than that of last year.

The next concert will be given Saturday evening, October tenth.

C. L. CAPEN.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, APRIL 30, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Superb Concert as the Last of the Season.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season was given last night at the Academy of Music before an audience which was satisfactory both in numbers and quantity. This great company of musicians was never heard to better advantage than on this occasion, and their rendition of all the numbers assigned to them on the programme, and especially of Beethoven's great work—the Heroic Symphony—created enthusiasm and won unstinted applause. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk's vigorous performance of the piano concerto, selected for her first appearance here, won applause by its brilliance, though her playing was wanting in flexibility and grace. Mr. Anton Hekking's 'cello soli—nocturne of Chopin, melodie of Massenet, and Springbrunnen of Davidoff—were rendered with a beauty of execution and expression that gained for him a well-deserved recall.

Of course the part of the concert that challenged the largest share of attention was the work of the famous orchestra. It began with Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," which was given with taste, precision, and skill. "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from Goddard's "Oriental Symphony," were rendered with rare intelligence and great delicacy of shading. And the wide and varied emotional range of the gifted tone-poet in the "Symphonia Eroica" was presented by Mr. Nikisch and his company with a strength of interpretation and a breadth of meaning that made every shange in its manifold phrasing very intelligible and impressive.

The programme rendered was severely classical, but the large and distinguished audience not only seemed to endure it, but actually seemed capable of appreciation. The great work which Mr. Nikisch and his confreres are accomplishing in elevating the general average of musical taste in this country is something which must be left to the future to estimate correctly.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAY 3, 1891.

The Symphony orchestra has been having a delightful farewell tour of the season. Many of the members will play at the "pops," which, happily, are to be resumed this summer to refresh the [illegible]

[135]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The tenth season ended on Saturday evening with the Beethoven programme which had been announced and which extended in performance to the preposterous length of almost two hours and a half. The "Leonore" overture was, all things weighed, well played; an unusual consideration was shown for the lighter and tenderer portions, but there was much liberty taken in proportioning the themes, thus giving almost the effect of a fantasia rather than of an overture. The fifth symphony, ending the concert, was played in the peculiar manner which Mr. Nikisch affects, and the stronger passages, especially the introduction, were severe and hard in tone and accent and extreme in pause and emphasis. The reading was sonorous and striking — especially when the kettle-drummer got his innings — but it was not all classic or refined. The "Fidelio" act gave much gratification and deserved the most of the generous applause which it received. Mme. Mielke's Leonora had warmth, variety and pathos, and proved her to be something better and higher than a mere Wagner declaimer; Mr. Fischer's Rocco was sound and sturdy, but dry and grim, the "Gold" song in particular being taken up too slowly and heavily; Marcellina was sung with animation by Mrs. Wilbur Hascall, whose voice is bright, high, and rather telling, but squeezed in formation and explosive in delivery; Mr. Rieger, of a mild, sweet and rather small tenor, was the Jaquino, and Mr. Meyn made some excellent points in the difficult music of Pizarro, which needs a phenomenal voice to cope fully with it. The male choir of the Singers—awkwardly and disadvantageously split in half by the orchestra—did very well with the Prisoner's chorus, and the orchestral score was generally played with discretion and elasticity, although the wooden wind was far too loud in Leonora's scene.

The retrospect of the season is none too happy or hopeful, and in no previous year have there been such decided expressions of discontent and doubt among those patrons who do not belong to the Boston sets which, having comparatively little judgment or independence, are obstinate in maintaining that everything relative to the Symphony concerts is managed in the best way, and the results the highest attainable on the planet. We would be the last to deny to Mr. Nikisch much talent and high artistic qualities, which have perhaps done more than his work as a musician and a director to maintain him in the favor to which he was welcomed as an untried stranger. The orchestra chafed against the precision and the martinet-like discipline of Mr. Gericke, but they respected his art and were proud of what he made them achieve. They are no less restless under the variable, good-fellow-ish management of Mr. Nikisch, while they have lost some of their esprit du corps and their determination to do the finest and best work possible. The disposition toward the sensational, which makes some of Mr. Nikisch's readings of modern things incomparably thrilling and brilliant, is utterly at variance with classic and elevated music; and as the director has a lower standard of reading, so the men have adopted a lower standard of playing. Not alone in the symphonies themselves have carelessness, coarseness, inaccuracy and want of sympathy been apparent; but when engaged for other concerts the men have infrequently done less well than many a chance body of players casually gathered for an odd evening or two. Many members retain their places, we have good reason to believe, merely because their pay is good and sure and their homes are here. Some of the better men have been already approached with offers on behalf of the orchestras to be formed in New York, and the chances are that there will be an unusual number of changes in the personnel next season. The indiscriminate applause and compliment of a socially influential part of the audience, which has seemed to delight most in what was least worthy of approval, and the almost unqualified optimism of one revered critic who was in his younger days wisely exacting and justly difficult to please, have gone far to confirm Mr. Nikisch in ways which he ought to have altered and to put reasonable and right criticism into a false attitude of captiousness and prejudice. We believe in the Symphony system and have gloried in the bold, broad spirit of its founder; we have been full and hearty in praise and eager in encouragement. We have a right therefore to comment unreservedly and to warn strongly. Our opinion is—slowly formed and reluctantly owned—that unless a radical change for the better takes place immediately at the beginning of the next season, the Boston orchestra has passed its zenith and must decline until such later time as another Gericke shall come to raise it slowly and laboriously to the height from which it should never have declined. The programmes of the season have been less well received than those of almost any previous year, and dissatisfaction with them is not altogether ill-founded. A hasty résumé of them shows that the names of German composers appeared seventy-four times as against nineteen nominations of composers from all the rest of the world—the exact division being, American works, three; French, five; Scandinavian, two; English, one; Spanish, one; Italian, two; Russian, five. Of the ninety-three titles, fifteen represent things new to Boston, of which four were first peformances in this country, one-third of these works being brought forward by the soloists. Of the authors other than German, only two were strangers to these concerts, and among the Germans there was only one newcomer—Klughardt, whose symphony was more a matter of curiosity than value. Beethoven's name appeared ten times, Wagner's eleven, Liszt's five and Schumann's four, while for Schubert, Haydn, Mozart and Handel one or two selections were thought sufficient. This is not quite the right showing for an orchestra which has claimed to be the peer of any other orchestra in the world, and the time is coming when the public, learning slowly by severe experience, will refrain from paying in its tens of thousands of dollars for a season of the [illegible] of which it knows [illegible]

We maintain that to direct so large a band as it should be directed through the private and public rehearsals and the fifty or sixty concerts of the season is work enough for one man and brings him honor enough. There should be at once selected by Mr. Higginson a committee of three or four competent men—and they could easily be found—to prepare the programmes and to publish in advance a general prospectus stating the chief works, old and new, which would be given, while the director, whether he be Mr. Nikisch or Mr. Blackboy, should feel that there is nothing derogatory to him in this, and that he can achieve higher accomplishments and win more fame by faithfully and nobly performing the work prepared for him. A better discretion in the choice of vocalists is also needed. The future of the Symphony Orchestra is at stake, or will be soon, and the unexampled favor shown hitherto may as easily be withdrawn by the fickle and fanciful public.

THE COMMONWEALTH

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

The season of Symphony concerts closed with a Beethoven programme, namely: Overture "Leonore," No. 2; Part One of "Fidelio," and the Fifth Symphony. The participants in the "Fidelio" music were Mme. Antonia Mielke (Leonora); Mrs. E. M. H. Hascall (Marcellina); Mr. W. H. Rieger (Jaquino); Mr. Emil Fischer (Rocco); Mr. Heinrich Meyn (Pizzaro). The chorus in the final scene of the act was from Mr. Osgood's Boston Singers Society.

The choice of Mr. Meyn for the part of Pizzaro was the only inadequate one, and his failure was due to physical rather than artistic limitations. Pizzaro is a ruffian who, according to Beethoven, had a voice of iron-clad character; Mr. Meyn is a gentleman with a voice of virile quality, it is true, but too slight for the purpose. Mme. Mielke's declamation and singing of the great air "Thou Monstrous Fiend," an epic in itself, was superlatively fine. A charming singer is Mrs. Hascall, whose high soprano voice is sweet and tuneful, and who sings artistically and with few faults of method. She undertook the part at short notice, and her success is all the more creditable as Marcellina's music is not in the usual repertory of young singers. Mr. Fischer's Rocco was adequate; he sang the song about gold with every indication of knowing the value of the metal. Mr. Rieger's taste was not beyond his capacity to do well. The "Canon quartet" was admirably sung, and the concerted finale, by no means an easy page of Beethoven. The male chorus had been drilled by Mr. Osgood. Mr. Nikisch conducted the performance with marked attention to the spirit of Beethoven's music, and the result could not be otherwise than good. It would have been preferable to have performed the whole of "Fidelio" instead of one act; the symphony, although gloriously played, could have been spared. Mr. Nikisch was warmly applauded at the close of the concert, which was heard by an enormous audience. The next concert will be given on October 10.

A few words of retrospect: In the matter of programmes, Mr. Nikisch has made an advance over his first year; he has got bravely beyond the borders of the Rhine, and his ken includes an occasional Russian, Slav, Englishman and American. The proportion of new music performed was greater this season than last, and the novelties were generally worthy. Toward native composers, Mr. Nikisch's attitude was friendly, yet he has not given us any of Prof. Paine's music nor asked Mr. McDowell to take down his folios. Here are two great composers among us, and such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony should become their natural stimulus. With one or two exceptions, the soloists were worthy the dignity of the concerts.

Mention of the anniversary concert of the Apollo Club is deferred until after the repetition concert of Monday next. Arthur Friedheim's piano recitals have demonstrated that he is a great player, while that of Mr. Victor Benham have shown that he might be.

POCO A POCO.

THE EVENING STAR.

WASHINGTON:

THURSDAY..... April 30, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last of the series of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night. The attendance was limited only by the seating capacity of the building, and the attention given as well as the discriminating applause attested the general satisfaction of the listeners. Of the excellence of this band of musicians much has been said in these columns, and each performance reveals new beauties of interpretation and execution. Its work last night included Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," two movements; "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock," from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, No. 3, in E flat. The last named was the feature of the evening and in every movement the sympathy of both leader and band with the thought and idea of the great composer was manifest. The weird and dainty melody in the Godard symphony was also beautifully wrought out, and the supporting work of the orchestra in the Tschaikowsky concerto was more satisfactory than that of the piano soloist, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who seemed to display more muscular than intellectual vigor in her playing. Mr. Anton Hekking gave three numbers upon the violoncello and proved himself an artist upon this difficult but, in the hands of a finished performer, entrancing in-

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891

The last Symphony concert of the season of '90–'91 was given last Saturday evening in Music Hall. The conductor's stand was prettily decorated, and when Mr. Nikisch appeared upon the stage, he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause.

* * * * *

The program was made up of the following works of Beethoven: "Lenore" overture, No. 2; the Fifth symphony; and the first act of "Fidelio," in which the parts of Leonora and Marcellina were taken by Mrs. Antonia Mielke and Mrs. Wilbur Hascall; and the parts of Rocco, Jaquino and Pizarro by Messrs. Emil Fischer, W. H. Rieger and Heinrich Meyn. The "chorus of prisoners" was composed of members of the Boston Singers' Society. The fragment of the opera was sung in the German language, and it was presented without scenery, costumes and action.

* * * * *

The concert was very long; it lasted until nearly half-past ten; and yet the interest of the audience was kept alive until the very end, and at the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was most heartily applauded. This applause was both the expression of the personal good-will of the hearers and an acknowledgment of the pleasure given by the evening's performance; for there is no doubt but that the extract from "Fidelio" was keenly relished by the majority.

* * * * *

The overture, "Lenore, No. 2," would be a great work if "Lenore, No. 3," had not been written. The former continually hints at and suggests the latter, and, however admirable the sketch may be, the enlarged and elaborated work obscures the first draught.

* * * * *

The performance of the first act of "Fidelio" may be taken as a text of a sermon, with many heads and subdivisions. It was sung in the German language, and four of the singers that took part are Germans. And yet there is an English translation of the libretto, and there are singers in this country who can sing the English language. But here in Boston a desperate attempt is made to "germanize" our music. Do we need an orchestral conductor? There is none outside of Germany, and we import a German. Is there a German singer in this country disengaged? Whether the singer is good or bad, he or she is allowed to appear upon the Music Hall stage. The fact that the singer is a German seems enough; and all questions concerning the vocal ability of the singer are thus answered in advance. In other words, with the aid and abettal of the men in power, here in Boston, an American city, German singers are constantly given the preference over all singers of other nationalities.

* * * * *

Now it is a notorious fact, a fact acknowledged by German lovers of music and German musicians, from Frederick the Great to Richard Wagner, that a German singer in the true sense of the word is a rara avis. And Wagner knew well his business when he treated the German voice as an orchestral instrument. To declaim a passage from one of Wagner's later operas is one thing; to sing a melody is another. Yet whatever the occasion may be, whether it is an opera aria of conventional form that is to be sung, or a Wagner scene, we too often see a German come upon the stage, and we assist (as the French say) at his convulsive breathing, we admire the many qualities of tone and the assortment of voices packed within his throat, we dote upon his erratic and exaggerated phrasing, and we exhibit delirious delight at the skill displayed in avoiding the pitch.

* * * * *

We as Americans are old enough to stand upon our own legs even in matters of art. A century ago Italian opera reigned supreme in Germany. The singers were Italians, the operas were written in Italian style, the directors of the opera orchestras were generally Italians. But the Germans finally came to the conclusion that their own language should be heard in their own opera houses. Why should we abhor our own language? A libretto is no more ridiculous in English than in German or Italian. (As for that matter, an opera is an absurdity when looked at coldly, whether it be by Bellini or Wagner.) The evil has spread and we find its marks in song recitals. Our own singers are almost compelled to sing in German. Audiences will tolerate grotesque pronunciation, a misconception of the meaning of the words and a consequent lame delivery of the sense of the text, so long as they hear, however incorrectly declaimed, the language that has grown so dear to them.

* * * * *

The close attention paid to the different numbers last Saturday, the applause that followed every air and each concerted piece showed the love of the people at large for opera.

* * * * *

This season we have been obliged to take our opera in small doses. We have had one or two "operatic festivals," mongrel entertainments, neither concerts strictly speaking nor operas; and yet music lovers have greedily snapped at the only opportunity of hearing anything akin to opera. Would a manager run too great a risk, if, for a few weeks in the season, he gave a series of popular operas and operettas modestly but respectably? There would be no need of gorgeous scenery or expensive ballet. There are many operas that demand only simple stage settings, a small but carefully chosen chorus and a few good singers. Mr. John Mullaly has shown this spring upon two occasions what a thorough and experienced musician could do with an orchestra, the members of which were chosen at random and hastily thrown together. There are singers in this city that would gladly embrace such an opportunity, and that are fully competent to sing in light opera. The beginning should necessarily be humble. There are operas by Lortzing, Lecocq, Adam, Auber, and many others that would not be beyond the capabilities of a company made up of singers of moderate abilities. But any opera or operetta so given should be sung in English.

* * * * *

The performance of Saturday suggests other thoughts, but the expression of them must be deferred to a more convenient season. As for the performance itself it may be summed up by saying that with the exception of Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Fischer the singers were unable to do justice to the music; that Mrs. Mielke was not heard to such advantage Saturday evening as on former occasions; that the quartet was poorly sung; and that the orchestral accompaniment was often noisy. And yet there were many pleasurable moments, and the applause of the audience was very genuine.

* * * * *

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the fifth symphony last Saturday was more conservative than that of last season and in certain respects there was a marked improvement in the performance. The brass did not so arrogantly assert itself; there was no apparent straining after theatrical effects. It is true that some take exception to Mr. Nikisch's delivery of the opening phrase; but surely this phrase should be thundered out, and the repeated notes should be played heavily and detached. The story that the phrase was intended to portray, "Fate knocking at the door," may be a silly legend; but on the other hand the notes should not be played as though they expressed a woodpecker's queries to the bark of a tree. Besides, unless these notes are played heavily and detached, and the rhythm most strongly accented, the three eighth notes are liable to be played as a triplet.

* * * * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

THE CLOSING CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert on Saturday evening week was but a partial success. The select ensemble for the first act of the Fidelio music was unwisely chosen, for even such first-class artists as Mme. Mielke and Mr. Emil Fischer should have been associated with a more effective Pizzaro than Mr. Meyn, in the Fidelio cast; by a worthier Jaquino than Mr. Rieger; and by a far more competent Marcellina than Mrs. Wilbur Hascall. Mrs. Nikisch was the original choice for the part of Marcellina, but on dit that after having studied the music with her usual zeal she concluded that it was all in all too difficult for her. Congratulations to the public on account of Mrs. Nikisch's decision may quite properly be transferred to her, for it is very probable that even she would have done much better with the part than did Mrs. Wilbur Hascall. This lady has not exactly a quasi soprano voice but a soprano quasi voice, and although she labored with deep sincerity with the music assigned her it can not also be maintained in her favor that she literally sang it. Mr. Meyn is altogether too good a musician to have been made the victim of a serious error (unintentional, no doubt), in being assigned the part of Pizzaro. The difficulty of the part is well known. Under more favorable conditions Mr. Meyn is undoubtedly an artist. The tenor, Mr. Rieger, was tolerable, for although he has a somewhat reedy voice, his vocalization is very good. Both Mr. Fischer and Mme. Mielke admirably well filled their respective rôles. The "Abschenlicher" aria was sung by Mme. Mielke with a dramatic effect and artistic mastery that left nothing to be desired. The male chorus of the tout ensemble was very inefficient, not because of any intrinsic shortcoming, but owing to Mr. Nikisch's inexperience as a chorus director. The overture to Leonore, No. 2, was effectively played, and Mr. Nikisch's rendering of the Fifth symphony was more conservative than that of last year.

The next concert will be given Saturday evening, October tenth.

C. L. CAPEN.

The Washington Post.

WASHINGTON, APRIL 30, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Superb Concert as the Last of the Season.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season was given last night at the Academy of Music before an audience which was satisfactory both in numbers and quantity. This great company of musicians was never heard to better advantage than onthis occasion, and their rendition of all the numbers assigned to them on the programme, and especially of Beethoven's great work—the Heroic Symphony—created enthusiasm and won unstinted applause. Mrs. Helen Hopekirk's vigorous performance of the piano concerto, selected for her first appearance here, won applause by its brilliance, though her playing was wanting in flexibility and grace. Mr. Anton Hekking's 'cello soli—nocturne of Chopin, melodie of Massenet, and Springbrunnen of Davidoff—were rendered with a beauty of execution and expression that gained for him a well-deserved recall.

Of course the part of the concert that challenged the largest share of attention was the work of the famous orchestra. It began with Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," which was given with taste, precision, and skill. "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock" from Goddard's "Oriental Symphony," were rendered with rare intelligence and great delicacy of shading. And the wide and varied emotional range of the gifted tonepoet in the "Symphonia Eroica" was presented by Mr. Nikisch and his company with a strength of interpretation and a breadth of meaning that made every shange in its manifold phrasing very intelligible and impressive.

The programme rendered was severely classical, but the large and distinguished audience not only seemed to endure it, but actually seemed capable of appreciation. The great work which Mr. Nikisch and his confreres are accomplishing in elevating the general average of musical taste in this country is something which must be left to the future to estimate correctly.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAY 3, 1891.

The Symphony orchestra has been having a delightful farewell tour of the season. Many of the members will play at the "pops," which, happily, are to be resumed this summer to refresh the unlucky stay-at-homes.

[135]

PITTSBURGH

FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT OLD CITY HALL LAST NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, as soloist, appeared last evening before an audience which crowded Old City hall to the doors. The orchestra has the reputation of being the finest in the country organized and maintained for concert purposes exclusively, and the artistic interpretation of the high-class music included in the program of last night but strengthened the goodly opinion of musicians and critics. The program was a varied one with wide scope for expression, and from the opening of the magnificent Schumann "Spring" symphony to the final echoes of the closing Wagnerian selection, interest was sustained while applause was generally accorded not only at the conclusion of numbers, but also during the brief intervals marking the space between the movements of melody. The opening selection, the Schumann "Spring" symphony, is said to have emanated from the happiest period of the composer's life when all obstacles to his marriage had been overcome and he had won a high position as a composer and authority in music, in its buoyant measures seemed to reflect very characteristically the happy mood of the composer and the environments of a refreshing spring day.

THE SCHUMANN SYMPHONY.

Four movements were introduced, the first movement with its motto phrase stated in unison with horns and trumpets and then deepening into an exhaustive development into which several subsidiary items were introduced and finally losing itself in a little song of thankfulness; the second movement slow but deliciously expressive; the third with its artistic trios, and the fourth in which the whole force of the orchestra was employed and an effect masterly and impressive produced, formed a rendition of the most artistic proportion.

The second number of the orchestra was a Tschaikowsky symphony, a melody full of fanciful figures expressive and brilliant. From the main theme, clear cut by the oboe and followed by a delicious statement by the strings, pizzicato, on through the intricate measures of the violoncellos, the accompaniment of the long, gently-moving notes in the horns, and the basses with their almost inaudible tones, the melody spread forth in finer and more delicate movement until a cresendo of effective beauty was reached. An exquisite variant and a dainty movement of the strings and the rich harmony proceeded, graceful changes marking its contour, now dramatic, now a ripple of exquisite rythm, and on until the instruments ended in low answering tones only to be brought into forceful action by the rollicking explanatory phrase appended to the Schera movement. It was in the wierd Saint-Saens Dance Macabre, however, when the orchestra revealed its scope for piquant movement and the doleful midnight bell, the dance of the shrouded skeletons, the cracking of their bones as the dance grows wilder and wilder among the tombs, all combined to form a grotesque, as well as clever piece of instrumentation. With the powerful Wagnerian selections as concluding selections, the orchestral performance came to a close.

A SWEET SINGER.

Mrs. Nikisch appeared several times as soloist during the concert. The lady possesses a delightfully clear and sympathetic voice and which is under excellent control. In her first and second selections the latter immediately succeeding the former, opportunity was given for sharp contrast in the love songs selected from Mozart's comic opera, the first, bashful in its intonation but clear and lovely in its scope, and the second, full of intensity, expressing the vibration of sentiment, of passion and anguish.

The sweet singer was liberally applauded. Mrs. Nikisch, who is of pleasing stage presence, of pleasant manner and youthful in appearance, was heard in further selections during the program, songs with the piano accompaniment. The concert was given under the auspices of the Mozart club. The second concert will be given to-night. The orchestra will render the symphonic poem, "Tasso" of Liszt; violin solos will be given by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and Verdi's requiem will be presented by the Mozart club, with Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin as soloists.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1891.

The Music Hall Promenade concerts will begin on Monday, May 31, and continue at least, until after July 4. The name of the conductor is not yet divulged: it may be Mr. Kneisel, possibly Mr. Grunberg, hardly Mr. Neuendorff who it would appear was engaged with the Juch company in New York city during the month of June. The Promenades will be conducted quite as before; the orchestra will be made up in part of Symphony men; light refreshments will be served, smoking will be encouraged, and the place made attractive to gentlemen and ladies with escorts, who for a season have missed the grace and cheer they were wont to find there.

PITTSBURG, FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Concert and a Number of Weddings.

Thanks to Arthur Nikisch, to his bewitching and talented wife, and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening was one very delightfully spent by several hundred music lovers who attended the Mozart Club's concert in Old City Hall. The auditorium had no empty chairs and the raised seats behind the orchestra platform were filled with members of the patron organization.

Conductor Nikisch is natty, trim of figure, quick in movement, and withal a graceful man "at the baton." The magnificent orchestra, in spite of the speedy trip from Baltimore, where they played Wednesday night, arriving here at noon yesterday over the B. & O. in three vestibule sleeping coaches—seemed in splendid condition. There may have been slight faults in the performance, noticeable to the extremely well-attuned musical ears, but to the great majority who are not educated in soulful sounds to that fine degree which precludes enjoyment of any execution short of absolute perfection, there was nothing but genuine unalloyed pleasure derived from the rendition of the programme of last night.

Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, sang with great sweetness and feeling. Her smile, too, is quite captivating, and her mobile features give her a face of rare powers for expression, while her changing moods keep her audience nicely informed of the sentiments of the lines she sings.

The programme, as presented, included the following orchestral numbers: Schumann's "Symphony No. 1, in B-flat," Mozart's "Canzonetta and Page's Aria, from 'The Marriage of Figaro,'" with Mrs. Nikisch, soloist; Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Danze Macabre," Wagner's Waldweben from "Siegfried," and his prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Mrs. Nikisch, accompanied by her husband on the piano, sang Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Gade's "The Goldsmith," and Delibe's "Bon Jour, Susanne."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Musical Notes.

The last of this season's Symphony concerts, on the evening of the 25th ult., was heard by an enormous audience. The programme, wholly devoted to Beethoven, was: "Overture "Leonore," No. 2; "Fidelio," Act I.; and Symphony in C-minor, No. 5. The "Fidelio" music was, of course, the notable feature of the evening. There is something to be said for, and more to be said against, the violent severing of the music of an opera from its proper surroundings. Dramatic action is so necessary to lend the intended force and meaning to the composer's intentions, that without it his music loses a large part of the emphasis that gives it clearness, and also something of its original interest. However, it may, and with justice, be urged that it is perhaps desirable to hear great operatic works even under such unfavorable conditions than not to hear them at all. The music was sung on this occasion by Mme. Mielke, Mrs. Hascall, Mr. Rieger, Mr. Fischer, Mr. Meyn, and the male chorus of the Boston Singers Society. With the exception of Mme. Mielke and Mr. Fischer, the soloists did not acquit themselves with special skill or good effect; and even the former did not achieve as favorable results with Beethoven as she did with Wagner at her earlier appearance here. Her work in the great "Abscheulicher" scena was very disappointing. Mr. Fischer, who sang Rocco's music, was the only artist who did full justice to his music. Mrs. Hascall's voice proved too weak for so large a hall, and Mr. Meyn's singing of Pizarro's part was almost painful in the exaggerated style and the physical effort he brought to bear on it. The chorus, which was divided into two bodies, one of which was placed on either side of the stage, was not favorably arranged for the production of the most desirable effect. It sang steadily and well, but the result, owing to the division named, was unsatisfactory. The orchestra was noisy throughout. However, every number was enthusiastically applauded, and the singing, good, bad, and indifferent, was similarly honored. It is a pity that the applause at these concerts is not more genuinely appreciative. The symphony was read in a style that adhered more closely to tradition than did the boisterously modern interpretation of last season. It was still modern enough to set the conservative thinking of the possible effect of such a reading on the composer if he could have heard it; but there was less of the blatantly melodramatic and less of the sickly sentimental that characterized it when it was first heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction. In fact, the improvement was decided. The vast audience waited to the end, and when all was over Mr. Nikisch was applauded with immense and prolonged vigor by way of an au revoir. The first concert of the new season will take place on the evening of Oct. 10. In summing up the season's work it can scarcely be said with justice that the high standard of these concerts was sustained by the series just ended. The orchestral work has often deteriorated into roughness, the programmes have presented little that was new, and have been lamentably lacking in the broad eclectic spirit that should have distinguished them. Soloists were permitted to appear whose deservings did not qualify them to enjoy the honor accorded them, and here the standard of the concerts were unmistakably lowered. The admirable rule, hitherto enforced, of steadily discountenancing encores, was broken through in favor of very inferior singers, and these were also conceded the privilege of singing a class of music that has heretofore found no place on the programmes of the concerts. Many and many a time it was impossible to repress a wish for a return to the regime of Mr. Gericke, under whom the dignity of the concerts was never allowed to relax, and under whom also, the orchestra was always kept up to the highest state of efficiency. There is a marked deterioration in the finish of the playing since his departure; and though he was perhaps a little over-rigid at times, he was always faithful to his composer, and was not possessed of the heresy that the older masters should be read in a modern way wholly at variance with the spirit of the era in which they lived and the sentiment that inspired them in the writing of their works. He never treated a Beethoven or a Mozart symphony as if it were a Wagner opera, and to be interpreted with operatic color, operatic ritardandos, operatic passion, operatic climaxes. Of Mr. Nicisch's skill as a conductor there can be no question. He has complete control over his orchestra, and can easily produce whatever effects he desires from it. Here there is no fault to be found with him; the only point open to animadversion in his work is his interpretation of the older composers, and his persistent attempts to modernize them after a sensational Wagnerian fashion; his evident desire to obtain new readings that have no stronger recommendation to respect than their mere newness. The baneful poison of Wagnerism has entered deeply into his soul, and oozes out of the end of his baton and impregnates, more or less, all the music that it guides. It is well enough to sneer at conservatism in art, but it is also well enough to protest against the retouching, in a modern spirit, of the masterpieces of Beethoven and Mozart, as well as the masterpieces of Shakespeare and Milton, of Rembrandt and Raphael. It is to be hoped that another season may see these concerts restored to the dignified standard at which Mr. Gericke left them, not only in respect to the finish of the orchestral playing and the conservatism that was observed in connection with the great masters of the past, but also in respect to the soloists who may be engaged. Such mediocrities, German or otherwise, as have slipped into these concerts this season, should never again be vouchsafed the unmerited honor of an appearance at them.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

RESUME OF THE TENTH SEASON.

Another series of twenty-four Symphony concerts has been given in Music hall and with as varied a répertoire in the aggregate as one could wish. The complete list of works performed is given below.

Beethoven:
Symphonies—E flat, No. 3; C, No. 1; F. No. 2; A, No. 7; C minor, No. 5. Overtures—Leonore, No. 2; Egmont; Coriolanus. Opera—1st act from "Fidelio."

Bach:
Concerto in D minor for two violins and stringed orchestra; Toccata; Preludium, adagio and gavotte.

Berlioz:
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Symphonie Fantastique.

Burmeister:
Concerto for pianoforte, D minor.

Brahms:
Symphony in D, No. 2; C minor, No. 1. Overture, "Academic Festival." Songs, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Wie bist du meine Koenigen."

Cherubini:
Overture, "Anacreon."

Chadwick:
Symphony, B flat, No. 2.

Chopin:
Mazurka; Concerto for pianoforte, F minor; Sonate for pianoforte, B minor.

Dvorak:
Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.

Delibes:
Song, "Regrets."

Foote:
Overture, Symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini."

Gade:
Overture, Ossian.

Gluck:
"I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus."

Godard:
"Nikia's Dream," "In the Hammock," from "Symphonie Orientale."

Goldmark:
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding"; Overture, "Prometheus Bound"; Concerto for violin, A minor, op. 28.

Grieg:
Two melodies for string orchestra.

Gounod:
Aria from "Sappho."

Haendel:
Concerto Grosse for string orchestra, first time.

Haydn:
Symphony in D; Concerto for violoncello, in D.

Heuberger:
Variations on a theme by Schubert, first time.

Klughardt:
Symphony D, No. 3. First time in United States.

Lalo:
Rhapsody in A.

Liszt:
Hungarian Rhapsody in F, No. 1; Symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Rakoczy march.

Mendelssohn:
Symphony in A minor.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding march, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"; overture, "Fingal's Cave."

Mozart:
Recit. and rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata"; Symphony in C; Romanza and aria from "Marriage of Figaro."

Mackenzie:
Ballade for orchestra.

Moszkowski:
Suite in F, No. 1.

Schubert:
Symphony in C, No. 9; B minor, No. 8.

Pederewski:
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor. First time in United States.

Raff:
Symphony, No. 3, "Ino Walde."

Reinecke:
Concerto in D minor for violoncello.

Rubinstein:
Overture, "Anthony and Cleopatra" (first time.)

Schumann:
Symphony, C, No. 2; B flat, No. 1; D minor, No. 4.

Svensden:
Symphony, B flat, No. 2.

Sphor:
Concerto for violin in E minor.

Secci:
Song, "Love me or not."

Saint-Saëns:
Symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules."

Scharwenka:
Concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1.

Smetana:
Symphonic poem, "Platava" (first time).

Sgambati:
Concerto for pianoforte, G minor, op. 15.

Tschaikowsky:
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony in F minor (first time); concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1; overture, Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

Volkmann:
Overture to "Richard III"; Symphony in D minor, No. 1.

Weber:
Overtures, "Oberon," "Euryanthe," "Der Freischeutz"; Aria from "Der Freischeutz".

Wagner:
Arias from "Tannhauser," "Faust" overture, "Ride of the Walkueries"; Waldweben from "Siegfried"; prelude, "Lohengrin"; overture, "The Flying Dutchman"; Lohengrin's Legend; introduction to "Die Meistersingers"; duet from "Die Gotterdammerung"; Siegfried's "Passage to Brünhilde's Rock," Morning Dawn, Rhein Journey, Funeral march, and closing scene from "Die Gotterdammerung."

Wieniawski:
Concerto for violin, D minor.

Whiting:
Suite, G minor, op. 8, MS. (First time).

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

MELODY AT CLEVELAND.

Symphony Soloists Welcomed with Enthusiasm.

CLEVELAND, O., May 2.—The Boston Symphony orchestra arrived here at noon today from Pittsburg, and gave a concert in Music Hall this evening.

The audience completely filled the hall and were most enthusiastic.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here as a soloist, and sang the aria from "Les Dragons des Villars," and several songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. T. Adamowski was one of the soloists, and his rendering of "Saint-Saens" rondo capriccioso was superbly done.

The programme was as follows:

Weber.....Overture, Oberon
Maillard.....Aria from Les Dragons des Villars
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Grieg.....Suite, Peer Gynt, Op. 46
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains.
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Saint-Saens.....Rondo Capriccioso for violin
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Songs with piano.
a. C. K. Rogers, Kiss my Eyelids (with violin obligato)
b. Gade.....The Goldsmith
c. O Weil.....Roses (with violin obligato)
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat

—Everybody in society and out of it is equally delighted at thought of the "Pops" coming again, and Mr. Ellis will find the absence of them last summer will only serve to make his patrons all the more desirous of assisting to render them a success this season.

THE DETROIT TRIBUNE.

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1891.

FOUND AT THE HOTELS.

A peculiarity of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the fact that the entire company, 78 people, are quartered at the Russell house. As a rule, half a dozen of the leading people in such combinations are registered at the leading hotels, while the remainder are "farmed out" wherever cheap prices can be obtained. When the Cleveland boat arrived yesterday morning, the entire orchestra was taken directly to the Russell house, their names filling about four pages of the register. The reason for this was explained last evening by C. A. Ellis, manager, and F. R. Comee, assistant manager.

"You see," they said, "every member of our large organization is, by birth and education, a gentleman. An effort to induce him to put up with anything cheaper than we ourselves demand would be resented. There are perhaps half a dozen of our men who desire to board at restaurants, but we allow them exactly the same that would have had to be paid for them at the Russell house for their expenses. This is our fifth annual tour. We shall be out just four weeks, and shall go no further west than Chicago. After playing in Chicago all the remainder of the week, after leaving Detroit, we go to Cincinnati, and from there to Buffalo. On Tuesday evening we appear in Ann Arbor, coming back to Detroit for Wednesday evening. This is Nikisch's second season with us, but he is without a peer."

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

STORMING MICHIGAN'S METROPOLIS.

Mrs. Nikisch's Appearance Greeted with Applause.

DETROIT, Mich., May 4.—It would remind a Bostonian of a Saturday evening in Music Hall had he dropped into the Lyceum Theatre here last evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra was giving the first of their last two concerts this season.

The auditorium was crowded to the doors.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here, and took the city by storm.

There is much disappointment expressed that she will not sing at the concert Wednesday night, and many people have arranged to go to Ann Arbor tomorrow, where she sings in the concert to be given at the University.

The programme last evening was as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto cellini, op. 23.....Berlioz
Aria, from Mignon.....A. Thomas
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasie for 'cello, O Cara Memoria.....Servais
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with piano.
a. Die quelle.....Goldmark
b. Liebeslust.....Liszt
c. Vergebliches standchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Symphony No. 3, Im Walde.....Raff
In the daytime (allegro). In the twilight (largo). Dance of the Dryads (allegro assai). Night; Silent breath of night in the forest; entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotton; Break of day (allegro).

Mr. Anton Hekking played one of Servais' fantasia for the 'cello with his accustomed excellence.

[136]

Commercial Gazette.
PITTSBURGH
FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT OLD CITY HALL LAST NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, as soloist, appeared last evening before an audience which crowded Old City hall to the doors. The orchestra has the reputation of being the finest in the country organized and maintained for concert purposes exclusively, and the artistic interpretation of the high-class music included in the program of last night but strengthened the goodly opinion of musicians and critics. The program was a varied one with wide scope for expression, and from the opening of the magnificent Schumann "Spring" symphony to the final echoes of the closing Wagnerian selection, interest was sustained while applause was generally accorded not only at the conclusion of numbers, but also during the brief intervals marking the space between the movements of melody. The opening selection, the Schumann "Spring" symphony, is said to have emanated from the happiest period of the composer's life when all obstacles to his marriage had been overcome and he had won a high position as a composer and authority in music, in its buoyant measures seemed to reflect very characteristically the happy mood of the composer and the environments of a refreshing spring day.

THE SCHUMANN SYMPHONY.

Four movements were introduced, the first movement with its motto phrase stated in unison with horns and trumpets and then deepening into an exhaustive development into which several subsidiary items were introduced and finally losing itself in a little song of thankfulness; the second movement slow but deliciously expressive; the third with its artistic trios, and the fourth in which the whole force of the orchestra was employed and an effect masterly and impressive produced, formed a rendition of the most artistic proportion.

The second number of the orchestra was a Tschaikowsky symphony, a melody full of fanciful figures expressive and brilliant. From the main theme, clear cut by the oboe and followed by a delicious statement by the strings, pizzicato, on through the intricate measures of the violoncellos, the accompaniment of the long, gently-moving notes in the horns, and the basses with their almost inaudible tones, the melody spread forth in finer and more delicate movement until a crescendo of effective beauty was reached. An exquisite variant and a dainty movement of the strings and the rich harmony proceeded, graceful changes marking its contour, now dramatic, now a ripple of exquisite rythm, and on until the instruments ended in low answering tones only to be brought into forceful action by the rollicking explanatory phrase appended to the Scherz movement. It was in the wierd Saint-Saens Dance Macabre, however, when the orchestra revealed its scope for piquant movement and the doleful midnight bell, the dance of the shrouded skeletons, the cracking of their bones as the dance grows wilder and wilder among the tombs, all combined to form a grotesque, as well as clever piece of instrumentation. With the powerful Wagnerian selections as concluding selections, the orchestral performance came to a close.

A SWEET SINGER.

Mrs. Nickish appeared several times as soloist during the concert. The lady possesses a delightfully clear and sympathetic voice and which is under excellent control. In her first and second selections the latter immediately succeeding the former, opportunity was given for sharp contrast in the love songs selected from Mozart's comic opera, the first, bashful in its intonation but clear and lovely in its scope, and the second, full of intensity, expressing the vibration of sentiment, of passion and anguish.

The sweet singer was liberally applauded. Mrs. Nikisch, who is of pleasing stage presence, of pleasant manner and youthful in appearance, was heard in further selections during the program, songs with the piano accompaniment. The concert was given under the auspices of the Mozart club. The second concert will be given to-night. The orchestra will render the symphonic poem, "Tasso" of Liszt; violin solos will be given by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and Verdi's requiem will be presented by the Mozart club, with Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin as soloists.

Boston Daily Traveller
MONDAY, MAY 4, 1891.

The Music Hall Promenade concerts will begin on Monday, May 31, and continue at least, until after July 4. The name of the conductor is not yet divulged; it may be Mr. Kneisel, possibly Mr. Grunberg, hardly Mr. Neuendorff who it would appear was engaged with the Juch company in New York city during the month of June. The Promenades will be conducted quite as before; the orchestra will be made up in part of Symphony men; light refreshments will be served, smoking will be encouraged, and the place made attractive to gentlemen and ladies with escorts, who for a season have missed the grace and cheer they were wont to find there.

The Dispatch.
PITTSBURG, FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

The Boston Symphony Concert and a Number of Weddings.

Thanks to Arthur Nikisch, to his bewitching and talented wife, and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening was one very delightfully spent by several hundred music lovers who attended the Mozart Club's concert in Old City Hall. The auditorium had no empty chairs and the raised seats behind the orchestra platform were filled with members of the patron organization.

Conductor Nikisch is natty, trim of figure, quick in movement, and withal a graceful man "at the baton." The magnificent orchestra, in spite of the speedy trip from Baltimore, where they played Wednesday night, arriving here at noon yesterday over the B. & O. in three vestibule sleeping coaches—seemed in splendid condition. There may have been slight faults in the performance, noticeable to the extremely well-attuned musical ears, but to the great majority who are not educated in soulful sounds to that fine degree which precludes enjoyment of any execution short of absolute perfection, there was nothing but genuine unalloyed pleasure derived from the rendition of the programme of last night.

Mrs. Nikisch, the soloist, sang with great sweetness and feeling. Her smile, too, is quite captivating, and her mobile features give her a face of rare powers for expression, while her changing moods keep her audience nicely informed of the sentiments of the lines she sings.

The programme, as presented, included the following orchestral numbers: Schumann's "Symphony No. 1, in B-flat," Mozart's "Canzonetta and Page's Aria, from 'The Marriage of Figaro,'" with Mrs. Nikisch, soloist; Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Danze Macabre," Wagner's Waldweben from "Siegfried," and his prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Mrs. Nikisch, accompanied by her husband on the piano, sang Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Gade's "The Goldsmith," and Delibe's "Bon Jour, Suzanne."

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3.
HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Musical Notes.

The last of this season's Symphony concerts, on the evening of the 25th ult., was heard by an enormous audience. The programme, wholly devoted to Beethoven, was: "Overture "Leonore," No. 2; "Fidelio," Act I.; and Symphony in C-minor, No. 5. The "Fidelio" music was, of course, the notable feature of the evening. There is something to be said for, and more to be said against, the violent severing of the music of an opera from its proper surroundings. Dramatic action is so necessary to lend the intended force and meaning to the composer's intentions, that without it his music loses a large part of the emphasis that gives it clearness, and also something of its original interest. However, it may, and with justice, be urged that it is perhaps desirable to hear great operatic works even under such unfavorable conditions than not to hear them at all. The music was sung on this occasion by Mme. Mielke, Mrs. Hascall, Mr. Rieger, Mr. Fischer, Mr. Meyn, and the male chorus of the Boston Singers Society. With the exception of Mme. Mielke and Mr. Fischer, the soloists did not acquit themselves with special skill or good effect; and even the former did not achieve as favorable results with Beethoven as she did with Wagner at her earlier appearance here. Her work in the great "Abscheulicher" scena was very disappointing. Mr. Fischer, who sang Rocco's music, was the only artist who did full justice to his music. Mrs. Hascall's voice proved too weak for so large a hall, and Mr. Meyn's singing of Pizarro's part was almost painful in the exaggerated style and the physical effort he brought to bear on it. The chorus, which was divided into two bodies, one of which was placed on either side of the stage, was not favorably arranged for the production of the most desirable effect. It sang steadily and well, but the result, owing to the division named, was unsatisfactory. The orchestra was noisy throughout. However, every number was enthusiastically applauded, and the singing, good, bad, and indifferent, was similarly honored. It is a pity that the applause at these concerts is not more genuinely appreciative. The symphony was read in a style that adhered more closely to tradition than did the boisterously modern interpretation of last season. It was still modern enough to set the conservative thinking of the possible effect of such a reading on the composer if he could have heard it; but there was less of the blatantly melodramatic and less of the sickly sentimental that characterized it when it was first heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction. In fact, the improvement was decided. The vast audience waited to the end, and when all was over Mr. Nikisch was applauded with immense and prolonged vigor by way of an au revoir. The first concert of the new season will take place on the evening of Oct. 10. In summing up the season's work it can scarcely be said with justice that the high standard of these concerts was sustained by the series just ended. The orchestral work has often deteriorated into roughness, the programmes have presented little that was new, and have been lamentably lacking in the broad eclectic spirit that should have distinguished them. Soloists were permitted to appear whose deservings did not qualify them to enjoy the honor accorded them, and here the standard of the concerts were unmistakably lowered. The admirable rule, hitherto enforced, of steadily discountenancing encores, was broken through in favor of very inferior singers, and these were also conceded the privilege of singing a class of music that has heretofore found no place on the programmes of the concerts. Many and many a time it was impossible to repress a wish for a return to the regime of Mr. Gericke, under whom the dignity of the concerts was never allowed to relax, and under whom also, the orchestra was always kept up to the highest state of efficiency. There is a marked deterioration in the finish of the playing since his departure; and though he was perhaps a little over-rigid at times, he was always faithful to his composer, and was not possessed of the heresy that the older masters should be read in a modern way wholly at variance with the spirit of the era in which they lived and the sentiment that inspired them in the writing of their works. He never treated a Beethoven or a Mozart symphony as if it were a Wagner opera, and to be interpreted with operatic color operatic ritardandos, operatic passion, operatic climaxes. Of Mr. Nickisch's skill as a conductor there can be no question. He has complete control over his orchestra, and can easily produce whatever effects he desires from it. Here there is no fault to be found with him; the only point open to animadversion in his work is his interpretation of the older composers, and his persistent attempts to modernize them after a sensational Wagnerian fashion; his evident desire to obtain new readings that have no stronger recommendation to respect than their mere newness. The baneful poison of Wagnerism has entered deeply into his soul, and oozes out of the end of his baton and impregnates, more or less, all the music that it guides. It is well enough to sneer at conservatism in art, but it is also well enough to protest against the retouching, in a modern spirit, of the masterpieces of Beethoven and Mozart, as well as the masterpieces of Shakespeare and Milton, of Rembrandt and Raphael. It is to be hoped that another season may see these concerts restored to the dignified standard at which Mr. Gericke left them, not only in respect to the finish of the orchestral playing and the conservatism that was observed in connection with the great masters of the past, but also in respect to the soloists who may be engaged. Such mediocrities, German or otherwise, as have slipped into these concerts this season, should never again be vouchsafed the unmerited honor of an appearance at them.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

RESUME OF THE TENTH SEASON.

Another series of twenty-four Symphony concerts has been given in Music hall and with as varied a répertoire in the aggregate as one could wish. The complete list of works performed is given below.

Beethoven:
Symphonies—E flat, No. 3; C, No. 1; F. No. 2; A, No. 7; C minor, No. 5. Overtures—Leonore, No. 2; Egmont; Coriolanus. Opera—1st act from "Fidelio."

Bach:
Concerto in D minor for two violins and stringed orchestra; Toccata; Præludium, adagio and gavotte.

Berlioz:
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Symphonie Fantastique.

Burmeister:
Concerto for pianoforte, D minor.

Brahms:
Symphony in D, No. 2; C minor, No. 1. Overture, "Academic Festival." Songs, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Wie bist du meine Koenigen."

Cherubini:
Overture, "Anacreon."

Chadwick:
Symphony, B flat, No. 2.

Chopin:
Mazurka; Concerto for pianoforte, F minor; Sonate for pianoforte, B minor.

Dvorak:
Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.

Delibes:
Song, "Regrets."

Foote:
Overture, Symphonic prologue, "Francesca da Rimini."

Gade:
Overture, Ossian.

Gluck:
"I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus."

Godard:
"Nikia's Dream," "In the Hammock," from "Symphonie Orientale."

Goldmark:
Symphony, "Rustic Wedding"; Overture, "Prometheus Bound"; Concerto for violin, A minor, op. 28.

Grieg:
Two melodies for string orchestra.

Gounod:
Aria from "Sappho."

Haendel:
Concerto Grosse for string orchestra, first time.

Haydn:
Symphony in D; Concerto for violoncello, in D.

Heuberger:
Variations on a theme by Schubert, first time.

Klughardt:
Symphony D, No. 3. First time in United States.

Lalo:
Rhapsody in A.

Liszt:
Hungarian Rhapsody in F, No. 1; Symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Rakoczy march.

Mendelssohn:
Symphony in A minor.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding march, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"; overture, "Fingal's Cave."

Mozart:
Recit. and rondo, "Mia Speranza Adorata"; Symphony in C; Romanza and aria from "Marriage of Figaro."

Mackenzie:
Ballade for orchestra.

Moszkowski:
Suite in F, No. 1.

Schubert:
Symphony in C, No. 9; B minor, No. 8.

Pederewski:
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor. First time in United States.

Raff:
Symphony, No. 3, "Ino Walde."

Reinecke:
Concerto in D minor for violoncello.

Rubinstein:
Overture, "Anthony and Cleopatra" (first time.)

Schumann:
Symphony, C, No. 2; B flat, No. 1; D minor, No. 4.

Svensden:
Symphony, B flat, No. 2.

Sphor:
Concerto for violin in E minor.

Secci:
Song, "Love me or not."

Saint-Saëns:
Symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules."

Scharwenka:
Concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1.

Smetana:
Symphonic poem, "Platava" (first time).

Sgambati:
Concerto for pianoforte, G minor, op. 15.

Tschaikowsky:
Andantino and scherzo from Symphony in F minor (first time); concerto for pianoforte, B flat minor, No. 1; overture, Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet."

Volkmann:
Overture to "Richard III"; Symphony in D minor, No. 1.

Weber:
Overtures, "Oberon," "Euryanthe," "Der Freischeutz"; Aria from "Der Freischeutz".

Wagner:
Arias from "Tannhauser," "Faust" overture; "Ride of the Walkueries"; Waldweben from "Siegfried"; prelude, "Lohengrin"; overture, "The Flying Dutchman"; Lohengrin's Legend; introduction to "Die Meistersingers"; quet from "Die Gotterdammerung"; Siegfried's "Passage to Brünhilde's Rock," Morning Dawn, Rhein Journey, Funeral march, and closing scene from "Die Gotterdammerung."

Wieniawski:
Concerto for violin, D minor.

Whiting:
Suite, G minor, op. 8, MS. (First time).

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.
SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1891.

MELODY AT CLEVELAND.

Symphony Soloists Welcomed with Enthusiasm.

CLEVELAND, O., May 2.—The Boston Symphony orchestra arrived here at noon today from Pittsburg, and gave a concert in Music Hall this evening.

The audience completely filled the hall and were most enthusiastic.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here as a soloist, and sang the aria from "Les Dragons des Villars," and several songs with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. T. Adamowski was one of the soloists, and his rendering of "Saint-Saens" rondo capriccioso was superbly done.

The programme was as follows:

Weber.....Overture, Oberon
Maillard.....Aria from Les Dragons des Villars
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Grieg.....Suite, Peer Gynt, Op. 46
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains.
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Saint-Saens.....Rondo Capriccioso for violin
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Songs with piano.
a. C. K. Rogers,
Kiss my Eyelids (with violin obligato)
b. Gade.....The Goldsmith
c. O Weil.....Roses (with violin obligato)
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B flat

——Everybody in society and out of it is equally delighted at thought of the "Pops" coming again, and Mr. Ellis will find the absence of them last summer will only serve to make his patrons all the more desirous of assisting to render them a success this season.

THE DETROIT TRIBUNE.
MONDAY, MAY 4, 1891.

FOUND AT THE HOTELS.

A peculiarity of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the fact that the entire company, 78 people, are quartered at the Russell house. As a rule, half a dozen of the leading people in such combinations are registered at the leading hotels, while the remainder are "farmed out" wherever cheap prices can be obtained. When the Cleveland boat arrived yesterday morning, the entire orchestra was taken directly to the Russell house, their names filling about four pages of the register. The reason for this was explained last evening by C. A. Ellis, manager, and F. R. Comee, assistant manager.

"You see," they said, "every member of our large organization is, by birth and education, a gentleman. An effort to induce him to put up with anything cheaper than we ourselves demand would be resented. There are perhaps half a dozen of our men who desire to board at restaurants, but we allow them exactly the same that would have had to be paid for them at the Russell house for their expenses. This is our fifth annual tour. We shall be out just four weeks, and shall go no further west than Chicago. After playing in Chicago all the remainder of the week, after leaving Detroit, we go to Cincinnati, and from there to Buffalo. On Tuesday evening we appear in Ann Arbor, coming back to Detroit for Wednesday evening. This is Nikisch's second season with us, but he is without a peer."

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

STORMING MICHIGAN'S METROPOLIS.

Mrs. Nikisch's Appearance Greeted with Applause.

DETROIT, Mich., May 4.—It would remind a Bostonian of a Saturday evening in Music Hall had he dropped into the Lyceum Theatre here last evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra was giving the first of their last two concerts this season.

The auditorium was crowded to the doors.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here, and took the city by storm.

There is much disappointment expressed that she will not sing at the concert Wednesday night, and many people have arranged to go to Ann Arbor tomorrow, where she sings in the concert to be given at the University.

The programme last evening was as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto cellini, op. 23.....Berlioz
Aria, from Mignon.....A. Thomas
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasie for 'cello, O Cara Memoria.....Servais
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Songs with piano.
a. Die quelle.....Goldmark
b. Liebeslust.....Liszt
c. Vergebliches standchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Symphony No. 3, Im Walde.....Raff
In the daytime (allegro). In the twilight (largo). Dance of the Dryads (allegro assai). Night: Silent breath of night in the forest; entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotton; Break of day (allegro).

Mr. Anton Hekking played one of Servais' fantasie for the 'cello with his accustomed excellence.

[136]

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE, FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

THE POPS ARE COMING.

Delightful Glimpses of a Distant July Evening Sunset Horizon.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

SINGING AT ANN ARBOR.

Mrs. Nikisch Continues to Win Golden Opinions as a Soloist.

DETROIT, Mich., May 5.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went over to Ann Arbor this evening and gave a concert in University Hall, which was crowded to the doors, many people going from this city. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist of the evening, and sang effectively Thomas' aria from "Mignon" and several songs with piano accompaniment by Director Nikisch. The programme, which was an exceedingly interesting one, was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Thomas.....Aria, from "Mignon,"
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B-flat
{ Andante un poco maestoso.
{ Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Songs with piano.
a. Wallnoefer.....Lindenbaum
b. Godard.....Florian's song
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Wagner.....Prelude, Lohengrin
Wagner.....Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from Siegfried and Die Goetterdaemmerung.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MAY 7.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....May 7

BACK IN DETROIT.

Marie Jahn's Successful Efforts as a Soloist.

DETROIT, Mich, May 6.—The last of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Lyceum Theatre this evening. Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato molto.
Bridal Song, allegretto.
In the Garden, andante.
Dance, Finale, allegro molto.
Aria from Freischutz, Wie nahte mir der Schlummer.....Weber
Miss Marie Jahn.
Rhapsody for orchestra, in A.....Lalo
Songs with piano.
a. Es blinkt der Thau.....Rubinstein
b. Wiegenlied.....Wagner
c. Voglein wohin so Schnell.....Lassen
Miss Marie Jahn.
Waldweben from Siegfried.....Wagner
Prelude, Die Meistersinger.....Wagner

Director NIKISCH is travelling dangerously near the wild West with such musical themes as the following:

Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

As THEODORE THOMAS once found, some cowboy is liable to drop in, and, after inquiring what this thing all means, introduce the classic NIKISCH to the Arkansas Traveller at the end of a B flat Winchester.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1891.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, May 3, 1891.

THIS is the program of the last concert given this season in this city by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, on April 28:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for piano, No. 1, B flat minor.....Tschaikowsky
a, "Nikia's Dream" } from "Symphonie Orientale"..Benj. Godard
b, "In the Hammock" }
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

Mrs. Helen Hopekirk distinguished herself as a pianist of thorough technical training in her playing of the concerto.

At the eighth Burmeister students' concert, on the 30th, Miss Lotta Mills played a difficult and varied program of piano compositions; in fact, it was all done with such intelligence and devotion to the work that I append the program:

Prelude and fugue in E minor, op. 35, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Thirty-two variations in C minor.....Beethoven
Barcarolle in A minor, No. 5.....Rubinstein
Ballade in A flat major, op, 47.....Chopin
Two transcriptions. { Song, by Mendelssohn } .....Liszt
{ "Soirées de Vienne," by Schubert }
Concertstuck.....Weber
With accompaniment of a second piano.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.
Date 4/30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston symphony orchestra concludes, as usual, the Star course series for the season at Music hall next Saturday night, May 2. It is a difficult matter for New Yorkers to say: "Better than ours." Yet the Herald of Dec. 9 says: "In certain respects the work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of the far famed Philharmonic society." There will be a few seats sold at Burrows Brothers' this evening.

Clipping from Press, Detroit, Mich.
Date 4-30

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is to be one of the soloists at the symphony concert next Monday evening, during her first season in America has become a favorite concert singer in the eastern cities. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano. A charming stage presence adds to the attractiveness of her performance. Her interpretation of German songs with her husband at the piano is said to be particularly

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.
Date 5-2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A great concert event [illegible] one orchestra, which takes place at Music [illegible] tonight as the closing entertainment of [illegible] course for the season. The Cleveland concert, which is one of the series of [illegible] Boston concerts, which have become famous, will be given by the complete [illegible] of seventy performers. The programme [illegible] the Schumann symphony No. [illegible] "Der Freischutz," the overture [illegible] songs by Mrs. Nikisch and [illegible] orchestra.

Clipping from Leader, Alliance O.
Date 5-2

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra Company passed through Alliance today. There were seventy-seven in the company and were en route for Cleveland, where they will appear tonight in Music Hall. Before returning to Boston, they will play in Detroit, Chicago and other western cities. The orchestra appeared last night

The Detroit Daily Tribune.

PITTSBURG, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

DOUBLY A SUCCESS.

The Second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Last Evening,

ASSISTED BY THE MOZART CLUB.

Postponement of the Academy of Science and Art Election.

SOCIETY CHATTER OF A SPRING FRIDAY

Our Mozart Club marked the close of its thirteenth season with a choral performance that has never been equalled in this community and, indeed, could not have been much better done by any similar chorus in existence. These be strong words, but carefully weighed withal; they are put in the forefront of this review, as conveying the most significant achievement of last evening's concert at Old City Hall by the Mozart Club with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Before the choral work forming the bulk of the programme, however, were prefaced two instrumental numbers that call for prior attention. The first was Liszt's Symphonic Poem, (Anglice) "Tasso; his Lamentation and Triumph." This, the second of that brilliant series of 12 works for which Liszt coined the name of Poeme Symphonique, and in which he embodied his advanced ideas upon programme music, is designed to depict the woes endured so long by the noble Italian poet, and also the long-deferred but complete triumph that he finally gained over his persecutors. Though the "Tasso" has not heretofore, it is believed, been heard in Pittsburg, the general mode of treatment and the opulence of orchestral effect bestowed upon it, may readily be inferred from other of its companion pieces—notably from the third, "Les Preludes," given here by the Boston players last year.

All Their Energies on the Work.

Mr. Nikisch and his superb orchestra bent their best energies to the performance of the work. The band does not seem to have suffered any such technical deterioration as some of the most ardent admirers of Mr. Gericke—prince of drill-masters—seemed to apprehend when his careful hand was removed. The string quartet still remains unrivalled, the wood-wind is deliciously smooth and characteristic and the brasses more richly sonorous, yet prudently handled, than ever. Space does not permit detailed review of the playing; suffice it to say that Mr. Nikisch's readings and their realization by the players were at once intelligent, warm and forceful to a rare degree. Liszt's work can claim no right to a better interpretation than it had last night.

Two pieces for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, brought to the front Mr. Franz Kneisel, the Concertmeister of the orchestra. The beautiful "Romanze," by Svendsen, is a more extended work than usually goes by that name; it might better be called a "ballade" or a "legend," following well-known precedents. It is altogether charming music, redolent of Northern climes, but without certain less desirable peculiarities of the ultra-modern Scandinavians. Mr. Kneisel displayed a delicious tone; not large, but sympathetic and penetrating. His style is most refined, and there are abundant warmth and feeling in his playing. However, even his most passionate moments are serious, it seems; and in his interpretation of one of Sarasate's familiar Spanish Dances, despite the luscious tenderness of the cantilene and the arch grace of the more capricious passages, there was lacking a certain dash, the scintillant humor peculiar to the Spanish virtuoso-composer.

The Triumph in the Requiem.

Verdi's great Manzoni Requiem filled the remainder of the evening. Of its origin and characteristics enough has been recently said in this journal to obviate the need of such comment this morning. It formed last evening the medium of a genuine triumph for Pittsburg's much-prized permanent chorus. With full remembrance of past successes—particularly the "Elijah" of 1889 and the two last "Messiah" performances—this evening's work must be soberly adjudged, taking all qualities together, to be the best of the entire 13 years. There were perfect attack, rare purity of intonation, great clearness of phrasing and all the other points of choral virtuosity upon as high a plane as has yet been touched. There were also, at least as much spirit, earnestness and intelligence in realizing to the full the composer's intentions, as ever before. And there was, besides, a refinement in shading, a delicacy of nuance, a delightful pianissimo, such as this chorus has never yet equaled. It is a great pleasure to see this department of dynamic effect brought by Conductor McCollum up to the same high level that characterizes all the rest of the club's singing. It were impossible, even did space permit, to enumerate in detail the portions of Verdi's dramatic work in which these several qualities were most apparent.

Among the soloists, the chief credit, perhaps, belongs to Mrs. S. C. Ford, of Cleveland, who was at the very last moment summoned to take Mrs. Bishop's place, vacated by sudden illness. Her rich voice and fervid style earned the hearty applause they received. Miss Lena Little, the mezzo-soprano, displayed a good voice, except in the lower register, and sang with taste and feeling. Mr. Paul Zimmerman, Pittsburg's veteran tenor, has not been in better voice for some time, and sang with all his old-time finesse and skill. Dr. Carl Martin's noble bass and dignified manner of singing were effective in the extreme. Too much credit cannot be given to Conductor McCollum for his all-important share in this exceedingly successful concert.

The Detroit Daily Tribune.

PUBLISHED DAILY AND WEEKLY.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 5, 1891.

NIKISCH AND HIS ORCHESTRA.

The Lyceum Concert Attended by the Music Devotees of the City.

MRS. NIKISCH AND MR. HEKKING SHARE IN THE HONORS.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its appearance at the Lyceum Theater for the first of two concerts to be given in Detroit this week, and was accorded a reception which was in keeping with its eminent and dignified position as an artistic organization. It is one of only a very few institutions in this country or in Europe capable of interpreting the great symphonies which have been written, the composers of which must have had in mind an orchestra of this kind with a Nikisch at its head. A concert by this orchestra is an enjoyment but rarely within reach in this city, and is universally regarded as the most auspicious musical occasion of the year.

One is attracted irresistibly at first to the achievements of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, in whose hands depends the entire effect of the composition on the music stands of his performers. American poetry has had but one Longfellow; its drama but one Booth; its history but one Bancroft; its art but one West and its orchestras but one Nikisch. Modesty is his watchword. As he moves out and in through his musicians towards the director's stand, to those who do not know him he may be the first trombone player, or even the manipulator of the kettle drums, but as he makes a graceful salute towards his audience and takes his baton in hand, he becomes a director, and a mistake cannot recur. With an interest which is itself magnetic he gracefully and quietly signifies by a dip of the ivory baton the commencement of the theme at hand. The music is on a rack before him, but he refers to it but little more than to turn the leaves. His orchestra responds as if controlled by one being; the sixteen first violinists draw their bows in perfect unison; a slight gesture as if drawing the stop of an organ and a crescendo or a diminuendo is given; a glance this way and one instrumental effect follows; another and and the audience is held spellbound by the result. Nikisch "plays upon" his orchestra as an enthusiastic violinist draws the harmony from his instrument. All of his men watch him with scrupulous attention, and even the audience feels what he intends his musicians to understand. Mr. Nikisch bowed to a very satisfactory audience last evening and faced the orchestra for the first number. The men were arranged with sixteen first violinists to the left: the second violinists to the right, and the violoncellos, reed instruments, brass bass and drums facing the audience—seventy-five in number. From the opening strain of the overture to Benvenuto Cellini, by Berlioz, to the closing number, interest did not lag. The programme was carried throughout with marvelous skill, and it can only be said that the director and his musicians are beyond the limit of ordinary criticism. The only two numbers of the orchestra were Berlioz' overture and Raff's Symphony No. 3, "Im Walde." The contrast between the two numbers was not particularly remarkable and this was the source of some regret on the part of those who will not be allowed to hear the next concerts on Wednesday evening. Each number was a succession of beautiful harmonies constantly suggesting themes from more familiar compositions and frequently brought by Nikisch into marvelous effects. Now the music would die away until it seemed like the faint breathing of the wind, and now it would swell into the roar of a hurricane, the audience being too impressed to express its feelings.

The greatest achievement of the orchestra last evening was the symphony of Raff in three movements, largo, allegro arsai and allegro. In the second movement the theme burst into a scherzo which called the technical ability of the orchestra into prominent and very satisfactory notice. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, was the vocal soloist at this concert, and has a mezzo soprano voice of very pleasing quality. She distinguished herself last evening for the purity and evenness of her sustained passages, her enunciation and her phrasing. A large bouquet of roses was presented to her upon one recall, bearing the compliments of the Detroit Philharmonic Club. Her selections were the aria from Mignon and a group of ballads by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms.

The effect of the solo number for the 'cello by Anton Hekking upon the audience was remarkable. Applause burst from every portion of the house in deafening volume and was continued after three recalls until he responded with Chopin's Nocturne. Mr. Hekking is known in Detroit as a former member of the Mendelssohn Quartet of Boston, and is an artist of rare accomplishments. A 'cello in his hands is transformed into a magic instrument from which the melody flows in astonishing ease and abundance. He has a technical ability which seems equal to any emergency and a depth of feeling which finds its way directly to the soul of his audience.

The following is the programme to be given to-morrow (Wednesday) evening at the Lyceum Theater:

Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26; Weber, aria from "Freischuetz," "Wie Nahte Mir der Schlummer," Miss Marie Jahn; Lalo, rhapsody for orchestra, in A; songs with piano, Miss Marie Jahn; Wagner, "Waldweben" from "Siegfried;" Wagner, prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

[137]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, FRIDAY, MAY 1, 1891.

THE POPS ARE COMING.

Delightful Glimpses of a Distant July Evening Sunset Horizon.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MAY 7.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....May 7

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

SINGING AT ANN ARBOR.

Mrs. Nikisch Continues to Win Golden Opinions as a Soloist.

DETROIT, Mich., May 5.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra went over to Ann Arbor this evening and gave a concert in University Hall, which was crowded to the doors, many people going from this city. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist of the evening, and sang effectively Thomas' aria from "Mignon" and several songs with piano accompaniment by Director Nikisch.

The programme, which was an exceedingly interesting one, was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonore," No. 3
Thomas.....Aria, from "Mignon."
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Songs with piano.
a. Wallnofer.....Lindenbaum
b. Godard.....Florian's song
c. Brahms.....Vergebliches Staendchen
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Wagner.....Prelude, Lohengrin
Wagner.....Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from Siegfried and Die Goetterdaemmerung.

BACK IN DETROIT.

Marie Jahn's Successful Efforts as a Soloist.

DETROIT, Mich, May 6.—The last of the two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Lyceum Theatre this evening. Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato molto.
Bridal Song, allegretto.
In the Garden, andante.
Dance, Finale, allegro molto.
Aria from Freischutz, Wie nahte mir der Schlummer.....Weber
Miss Marie Jahn.
Rhapsody for orchestra, in A.....Lalo
Songs with piano,
a. Es blinkt der Thau.....Rubinstein
b. Wiegenlied.....Wagner
c. Voglein wohin so Schnell.....Lassen
Miss Marie Jahn.
Waldweben from Siegfried.....Wagner
Prelude, Die Meistersinger.....Wagner

Director NIKISCH is travelling dangerously near the wild West with such musical themes as the following:

Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

As THEODORE THOMAS once found, some cowboy is liable to drop in, and, after inquiring what this thing all means, introduce the classic NIKISCH to the Arkansas Traveller at the end of a B flat Winchester.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1891.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, May 3, 1891.

THIS is the program of the last concert given this season in this city by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, on April 28:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for piano, No. 1, B flat minor.....Tschaikowsky
a, "Nikia's Dream"..... } from "Symphonie Orientale"..Benj. Godard
b, "In the Hammock".... }
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

Mrs. Helen Hopekirk distinguished herself as a pianist of thorough technical training in her playing of the concerto.

At the eighth Burmeister students' concert, on the 30th, Miss Lotta Mills played a difficult and varied program of piano compositions; in fact, it was all done with such intelligence and devotion to the work that I append the program:

Prelude and fugue in E minor, op. 35, No. 1.....Mendelssohn
Thirty-two variations in C minor.....Beethoven
Barcarolle in A minor, No. 5.....Rubinstein
Ballade in A flat major, op, 47.....Chopin
Two transcriptions. { Song, by Mendelssohn..... } .....Liszt
{ "Soirées de Vienne," by Schubert }
Concertstuck.....Weber
With accompaniment of a second piano.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O. Clipping from .....

Date 4/30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston symphony orchestra concludes, as usual, the Star course series for the season at Music hall next Saturday night, May 2. It is a difficult matter for New Yorkers to say: "Better than ours." Yet the Herald of Dec. 9 says: "In certain respects the work of the Boston orchestra under Mr. Nikisch surpasses even that of the far famed Philharmonic society." There will be a few seats sold at Burrows Brothers' th[illegible]ening.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5-2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A great concert [illegible] symphony orchestra, which takes place at Music hall tonight as the closing entertainment of the Star course for the season. The Cleveland concert, which is one of the series of fortyeight Boston concerts, which have become famous, will be given by the complete orchestra of seventy performers. The program includes the Schumann symphony No. 2, the Grieg suite "Peer Gynt," the overture to Oberon, besides songs by Mrs. Nikish and a violin solo by T. Adamowski.

Clipping from Leader Alliance O.

Date 5-2

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra Company passed through Alliance today. There were seventy-seven in the company and were en route for Cleveland, where they will appear tonight in Music Hall. Before returning to Boston, they will play in Detroit, Chicago and other western cities. The orchestra appeared last night in Pittsburg.

The Dispatch.

PITTSBURG, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1891.

DOUBLY A SUCCESS.

The Second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Last Evening,

ASSISTED BY THE MOZART CLUB.

Postponement of the Academy of Science and Art Election.

SOCIETY CHATTER OF A SPRING FRIDAY

Our Mozart Club marked the close of its thirteenth season with a choral performance that has never been equalled in this community and, indeed, could not have been much better done by any similar chorus in existence. These be strong words, but carefully weighed withal; they are put in the forefront of this review, as conveying the most significant achievement of last evening's concert at Old City Hall by the Mozart Club with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Before the choral work forming the bulk of the programme, however, were prefaced two instrumental numbers that call for prior attention. The first was Liszt's Symphonic Poem, (Anglice) "Tasso; his Lamentation and Triumph." This, the second of that brilliant series of 12 works for which Liszt coined the name of Poeme Symphonique, and in which he embodied his advanced ideas upon programme music, is designed to depict the woes endured so long by the noble Italian poet, and also the long-deferred but complete triumph that he finally gained over his persecutors. Though the "Tasso" has not heretofore, it is believed, been heard in Pittsburg, the general mode of treatment and the opulence of orchestral effect bestowed upon it, may readily be inferred from other of its companion pieces—notably from the third, "Les Preludes," given here by the Boston players last year.

All Their Energies on the Work.

Mr. Nikisch and his superb orchestra bent their best energies to the performance of the work. The band does not seem to have suffered any such technical deterioration as some of the most ardent admirers of Mr. Gericke—prince of drill-masters—seemed to apprehend when his careful hand was removed. The string quartet still remains unrivalled, the wood-wind is deliciously smooth and characteristic and the brasses more richly sonorous, yet prudently handled, than ever. Space does not permit detailed review of the playing; suffice it to say that Mr. Nikisch's readings and their realization by the players were at once intelligent, warm and forceful to a rare degree. Liszt's work can claim no right to a better interpretation than it had last night.

Two pieces for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, brought to the front Mr. Franz Kneisel, the Concertmeister of the orchestra. The beautiful "Romanze," by Svendsen, is a more extended work than usually goes by that name; it might better be called a "ballade" or a "legend," following well-known precedents. It is altogether charming music, redolent of Northern climes, but without certain less desirable peculiarities of the ultra-modern Scandinavians. Mr. Kneisel displayed a delicious tone; not large, but sympathetic and penetrating. His style is most refined, and there are abundant warmth and feeling in his playing. However, even his most passionate moments are serious, it seems: and in his interpretation of one of Sarasate's familiar Spanish Dances, despite the luscious tenderness of the cantilene and the arch grace of the more capricious passages, there was lacking a certain dash, the scintillant humor peculiar to the Spanish virtuoso-composer.

The Triumph in the Requiem.

Verdi's great Manzoni Requiem filled the remainder of the evening. Of its origin and characteristics enough has been recently said in this journal to obviate the need of such comment this morning. It formed last evening the medium of a genuine triumph for Pittsburg's much-prized permanent chorus. With full remembrance of past successes—particularly the "Elijah" of 1889 and the two last "Messiah" performances—this evening's work must be soberly adjudged, taking all qualities together, to be the best of the entire 13 years. There were perfect attack, rare purity of intonation, great clearness of phrasing and all the other points of choral virtuosity upon as high a plane as has yet been touched. There were also, at least as much spirit, earnestness and intelligence in realizing to the full the composer's intentions, as ever before. And there was, besides, a refinement in shading, a delicacy of nuance, a delightful pianissimo, such as this chorus has never yet equaled. It is a great pleasure to see this department of dynamic effect brought by Conductor McCollum up to the same high level that characterizes all the rest of the club's singing. It were impossible, even did space permit, to enumerate in detail the portions of Verdi's dramatic work in which these several qualities were most apparent.

Among the soloists, the chief credit, perhaps, belongs to Mrs. S. C. Ford, of Cleveland, who was at the very last moment summoned to take Mrs. Bishop's place, vacated by sudden illness. Her rich voice and fervid style earned the hearty applause they received. Miss Lena Little, the mezzo-soprano, displayed a good voice, except in the lower register, and sang with taste and feeling. Mr. Paul Zimmerman, Pittsburg's veteran tenor, has not been in better voice for some time, and sang with all his old-time finesse and skill. Dr. Carl Martin's noble bass and dignified manner of singing were effective in the extreme. Too much credit cannot be given to Conductor McCollum for his all-important share in this exceedingly successful concert.

Date 4-30

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is to be one of the soloists at the symphony concert next Monday evening, during [illegible] first season in America has become a favorite concert singer in the eastern cities. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano. A charming stage presence adds to the attractiveness of her performance. Her interpretation of German songs with her husband at the piano is said to be particularly fine.

The Free Press.

PUBLISHED DAILY AND WEEKLY.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 5, 1891.

NIKISCH AND HIS ORCHESTRA.

The Lyceum Concert Attended by the Music Devotees of the City.

MRS. NIKISCH AND MR. HEKKING SHARE IN THE HONORS.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its appearance at the Lyceum Theater for the first of two concerts to be given in Detroit this week, and was accorded a reception which was in keeping with its eminent and dignified position as an artistic organization. It is one of only a very few institutions in this country or in Europe capable of interpreting the great symphonies which have been written, the composers of which must have had in mind an orchestra of this kind with a Nikisch at its head. A concert by this orchestra is an enjoyment but rarely within reach in this city, and is universally regarded as the most auspicious musical occasion of the year.

One is attracted irresistibly at first to the achievements of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, in whose hands depends the entire effect of the composition on the music stands of his performers. American poetry has had but one Longfellow; its drama but one Booth; its history but one Bancroft; its art but one West and its orchestras but one Nikisch. Modesty is his watchword. As he moves out and in through his musicians towards the director's stand, to those who do not know him he may be the first trombone player, or even the manipulator of the kettle drums, but as he makes a graceful salute towards his audience and takes his baton in hand, he becomes a director, and a mistake cannot recur. With an interest which is itself magnetic he gracefully and quietly signifies by a dip of the ivory baton the commencement of the theme at hand. The music is on a rack before him, but he refers to it but little more than to turn the leaves. His orchestra responds as if controlled by one being; the sixteen first violinists draw their bows in perfect unison; a slight gesture as if drawing the stop of an organ and a crescendo or a diminuendo is given; a glance this way and one instrumental effect follows; another and and the audience is held spellbound by the result. Nikisch "plays upon" his orchestra as an enthusiastic violinist draws the harmony from his instrument. All of his men watch him with scrupulous attention, and even the audience feels what he intends his musicians to understand. Mr. Nikisch bowed to a very satisfactory audience last evening and faced the orchestra for the first number. The men were arranged with sixteen first violinists to the left; the second violinists to the right, and the violoncellos, reed instruments, brass bass and drums facing the audience—seventy-five in number. From the opening strain of the overture to Benvenuto Cellini, by Berlioz, to the closing number, interest did not lag. The programme was carried throughout with marvelous skill, and it can only be said that the director and his musicians are beyond the limit of ordinary criticism. The only two numbers of the orchestra were Berlioz' overture and Raff's Symphony No. 3, "Im Walde." The contrast between the two numbers was not particularly remarkable and this was the source of some regret on the part of those who will not be allowed to hear the next concerts on Wednesday evening. Each number was a succession of beautiful harmonies constantly suggesting themes from more familiar compositions and frequently brought by Nikisch into marvelous effects. Now the music would die away until it seemed like the faint breathing of the wind, and now it would swell into the roar of a hurricane, the audience being too impressed to express its feelings.

The greatest achievement of the orchestra last evening was the symphony of Raff in three movements, largo, allegro arsai and allegro. In the second movement the theme burst into a scherzo which called the technical ability of the orchestra into prominent and very satisfactory notice. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, wife of the conductor, was the vocal soloist at this concert, and has a mezzo soprano voice of very pleasing quality. She distinguished herself last evening for the purity and evenness of her sustained passages, her enunciation and her phrasing. A large bouquet of roses was presented to her upon one recall, bearing the compliments of the Detroit Philharmonic Club. Her selections were the aria from Mignon and a group of ballads by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms.

The effect of the solo number for the 'cello by Anton Hekking upon the audience was remarkable. Applause burst from every portion of the house in deafening volume and was continued after three recalls until he responded with Chopin's Nocturne. Mr. Hekking is known in Detroit as a former member of the Mendelssohn Quartet of Boston, and is an artist of rare accomplishments. A 'cello in his hands is transformed into a magic instrument from which the melody flows in astonishing ease and abundance. He has a technical ability which seems equal to any emergency and a depth of feeling which finds its way directly to the soul of his audience.

The following is the programme to be given to-morrow (Wednesday) evening at the Lyceum Theater:

Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26; Weber, aria from "Freischuetz," "Wie Nahte Mir der Schlummer," Miss Marie Jahn; Lalo, rhapsody for orchestra, in A; songs with piano, Miss Marie Jahn; Wagner, "Waldweben" from "Siegfried;" Wagner, prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

[137]

THE DETROIT TRIBUNE.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is now about ten years since Henry L. Higginson, a public spirited citizen of Boston, established the famous orchestra known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Higginson did not embark in the enterprise as a money making scheme. He was prepared to lose money, and his expectations were perhaps more than realized, for there was a balance on the wrong side of the ledger of from twenty to thirty thousand dollars each year for seven or eight years, but the orchestra is now at least self-supporting, if not profitable.

For the first three years of its existence George Henschel was the director. During the first year of his work Mr. Henschel was very sharply criticized, but as he gained in experience the playing of the orchestra improved, and when his term of office expired Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna assumed control of a much more cultivated body of musicians than Mr. Henschel started with. Gericke wielded the baton for five seasons and then gave place to Arthur Nikisch, the present conductor, who when the orchestra was established was associate director with Anton Seidl at the Leipzig Stadt theatre. Although still a young man Mr. Nikisch is in many respects an ideal orchestra leader. He plays upon the orchestra as though it were a concert grand piano, so subservient are its members to every gesture which he makes, though his motions are never extravagant. He was somewhat criticised when he commenced his work in Boston for the boldness of his interpretations of the works of the old classical composers, but if the critics did not like his renderings the people did, and the critics now have very little to say in opposition.

What has made the Boston Symphony orchestra the perfect musical organization it is? In the first place, money. The capital invested has been used to bring to this country the best musicians of the old world. Whenever a weakness is discovered in any part, or any player becomes indifferent to his work, he will soon find himself supplanted by a better man, and the management has the world to choose from. A liberal use of money and hard work by the players will give Detroit an equally good orchestra.

It was a brilliant audience assembled at the Lyceum theater last evening to listen to the first of the two concerts given here by the famous orchestra. Those who attended in a critical frame of mind had little to do but enjoy, for such a performance disarms criticism. Some who felt as if something in a fault-finding way ought to be said, commented adversely on the make-up of the program, and would have preferred some other composers represented, but really the only dissatisfied ones were those who stayed away, for no one who attended had any fault to find with the program or its performance.

The opening number was the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by that master of orchestration, Hector Berlios, which was faultlessly rendered, as were also the two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, the difficult pizzicati passages for the strings in the Scherso being rendered in perfect unity; and throughout the precision of attack indicated the wonderful control Mr. Nikisch has over his players. It is in such work as this, and in the beautiful shading, sometimes going abruptly from a pianissimo to a fortissimo, and sometimes insensibly gliding from the softest possible tone volume to the fullest power of the orchestra, that the value of long and continued practice is made manifest.

Raff's symphony "In the Woods" was the closing number on the program. The interest in its performance was greatly enhanced by the analytical notes of Mr. Wilson, which were printed on the program; and the fact that many would have enjoyed hearing a Beethoven symphony, did not detract from the pleasure derived from the admirable reading given Raff's work.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocalist of the evening, was on friendly terms with the audience at once. She was tastefully attired, and her attractive manner and unaffected style added much to the pleasure given by her singing. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of excellent quality, and her method is marked by that rare accomplishment nowadays, distinctness of enunciation. Her first number was the familiar aria from Mignon, "Know'st Thou the Land," which was sung in French to the accompaniment of the orchestra. Later in the program, with Mr. Nikisch at the piano, a group of German songs was charmingly rendered.

Any instrumental soloist connected with this organization is sure to be of the first rank, and Anton Hekking is certainly no exception to the rule. His 'cello solo, "O Cara Memoria," by Servais, won him several recalls, to which he finally responded with a superb rendering of an arrangement of Chopin's Nocturne in E flat.

At the second concert on Wednesday evening Miss Marie Jahn is to be the soloist, and the orchestral work includes Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony," a rhapsody by Lalo, and two Wagner selections.

E. T. B.

The Evening News.

DETROIT, TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

Artistic to the last degree, best describes the work of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Lyceum theater last evening. Detroit has never heard better orchestration, and it is doubtful if any organization has ever visited this city which could, in all the fine points which go to make up a symphony orchestra, compare with the one which was heard last night under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The individual performers are all musicians of undoubted merit and having been trained together under the highest type of a musical director, the result is a breadth and delicacy of tone coloring that must delight the most critical. The orchestra in the very passion of almost musical madness is subservient to the wave of the director's baton, and so admirably is it controlled that it would seem the leader touched the keys of some giant instrument, evoking tones at will. The ensemble playing was marvelous; it was impossible to catch the sound of any particular instrument, but the sound came in those great waves which show harmony in its grandest form.

The program rendered, though it did not include any of Wagner's music, was none the less artistic and high class for that. The composers represented were all great musicians and the audience seemed all the more pleased to have new dishes offered for their entertainment and instruction.

The initial number was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," an opera which has never become popular, although the overture is considered a wonderful specimen of his best work. The score of the master was admirably rendered by the 75 musicians on the stage, whose work introduced even new beauties to those who were familiar with the beauties of Berlioz's compositions.

The adantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, the second orchestral number, was chiefly noticeable for the wonderful banding of the pizzicato passages in the scherzo. The large and critical audience was captured by this number, and the applause was deafening. The closing number was Raff's "im Walde," and it was evident from the beginning of the allegro, or first movement, that the best had been reserved for the last of the musical feast. It was given that breathless attention which is the best applause, and when the final note of the third movement had died away the audience seemed to wake as from a dream.

The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, mezzo soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cellist. Mrs. Nikish has a voice of remarkable purity, and her numbers were sung with good effect, her artistic training being plainly observable. Her first number was the aria, "Know'st thou the land," from Thomas' "Mignon." She was again heard in a group of German songs by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms. She was very warmly applauded, and presented with a magnificent bunch of roses by the Detroit Philharmonic club.

Mr. Hekking as a 'cello player occupies the first rank of the musicians of today who perform on that instrument. Under his skillful fingers the instrument expresses emotions almost as plainly as could an animate being. His execution of Servais' "O Cara Memoria" brought a storm of applause, which would not down until he reappeared and played Chopin's nocturne in E flat, which performance demonstrated that his technical ability is phenomenal.

Tonight the orchestra plays at Ann Arbor, and it will be heard again at the Lyceum tomorrow evening, with Miss Marie Jahn as the soloist. The program to be presented by the orchestra embraces selections from the works of Goldmark, Lalo and Wagner, and the vocal numbers will be by Weber, Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen.

Clipping from Review Alliance O

Date 5-2

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra company passed through Alliance this morning on the C. & P. enroute to Cleveland where they play tonight. The entire company took lunch at Russell & Aker's west side restaurant, and a member of the company in talking with a REVIEW reporter said: "Yes we have quite a large company seventy five in all. We came from Pittsburgh where we have been playing two days. From Cleveland we go to Buffalo, N. Y., and from there westward striking Detroit, Chicago and Louisville. Our program is entirely a musical one and our company is made up of French, German, Austrian and American talent."

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give concerts at Central Music Hall Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon of next week. The orchestra numbers seventy-five picked players and will have the assistance of the following soloists: Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Lena Little, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski and Anton Hekking. The sale of seats is now in progress.

News, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-2

The musical event of the coming weeks will be more noteworthy or more thoroughly enjoyable than the series of concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The announcement embraces three concerts, upon Thursday evening, May 7, Friday evening, May 8, and Saturday afternoon, May 9. The well-known superiority of this organization and the indubitable fact that in many regards it stands without a parallel among modern orchestras insures a warm reception for the band. Mr. Nikisch brings with him as soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Miss Mary Howe, who has achieved a considerable reputation as an artiste, and Messrs. Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, who are members of the orchestra's violin corps. The programmes are throughout of a high class and admirably varied. That for the first concert on Thursday includes Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, the "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," and Raff's symphony, No. 3. Mr. Kneisel will play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing an aria by Raff and three songs by Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. The box-office is now open for the sale of seats.

DETROIT JOURNAL

EIGHTH YEAR.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the first of its two concerts in Detroit at the Lyceum last evening and received a deservedly enthusiastic welcome. For 10 years the orchestra has had the reputation of being the leader of orchestral organizations in this country, and the justice of this reputation was further substantiated by last night's performance.

The orchestra's principal piece on the program was Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," or "In the Woods," in four movements. In this the remarkable technique of the musicians, and the more remarkable control of Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was shown to best advantage. The theme of the piece is a scene in the woods, with twilight, darkness, sylvan dances and the break of day. Throughout the piece was remarkably rendered, every part being taken with as much sympathy and artistic expression as could be desired by the most critical musician. The orchestra also rendered Berlioz' overture to the opera of "Benvenu to Cellini" and the andantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4. Both of these selections received hearty applause, the greatest enthusiasm being shown over the scherzo movement in the latter piece. This movement consisted largely of pizzicati passages, which are rendered with as much unity and delicate expression as the ordinary passages.

Aside from the orchestra, the hit of the evening was made by Anton Hekking, who has been heard in Detroit as the 'cellist of the Mendelssohn quartet, of Boston. Mr. Hekking played Lewals' fantasie for the 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," displaying a technique seldom equaled by 'cellists. His playing, aside from being faultless technically, is full of sympathy and expression, and every pause in the piece was followed by enthusiastic applause. At the conclusion of the piece there was a spontaneous burst of applause, which clearly showed how he had captured the highly critical audience. He was recalled to the stage three times and finally responded by rendering Chopin's nocturne in E flat.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocal soloist of the evening, possesses a fine mezzo-soprano voice which is particularly noticeable for its clearness and "true musical qualities." She sings with pleasing expression, and, what is even more pleasing, with distinct enunciation, the latter being a quality seldom possessed by concert singers. Her selections consisted of an air from "Mignon," in French, and a group of three German songs, by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms, all of which were well received.

The orchestra gives another concert at the same place tomorrow evening, when Marie Jahn will be the soloist. Miss Jahn will sing an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and a group of songs by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. The orchestral selections will include Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," in four movements, and selections by Lalo and Wagner.

***

PRESS, Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5-1

THE SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

Old City Hall Crowded to Hear Boston's Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is king of all melody making organizations that have visited Pittsburg. It has been kept up as a professional concert orchestra and its membership is composed of men who play in it from year to year. This being the case, and with such a man as Arthur Nikisch as director, it is no wonder that old city hall last night was crowded to its utmost capacity with representative musicians and music lovers, assembled to hear the famous orchestra. Many in the audience had heard the orchestra before, which only made them more anxious to hear it again.

It was 8:30 o'clock when the trim, modest-looking director, Arthur Nikisch, quietly stepped out and raised his baton. There had been no discordant tuning of instruments. Amid the utmost quiet the first notes of Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat were heard. A beautiful work it is. Written by Schumann in the happiest time of his life, when hope for his future was strong and the success of his present assured. When the orchestra had executed in its masterly way the different movements and Mr. Nikisch had stepped down from the conductor's dias, the applause of the audience must have been very gratifying to him. Following, as the next number, came two solos by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, a soprano singer that has attracted great attention of late. She is a beautiful woman and sings delightfully. Perhaps she was a little disappointing to some who may have been expecting too much. Her high tones were hardly what were expected, but they were strong and smooth. In her second number, an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart, her singing was better. Upon her second appearance on the stage she sang three songs, with piano accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch. In these numbers she was more acceptable and was rapturously applauded.

The symphonic poem "Danse Macabra," by Saint-Saens, was a selection that attracted a great deal of attention. It is wildly weird, and something unexpected is continuously happening. Doleful midnight bells, death and ghostly dances, with rattling bones, run through until finally the cock crows in the break of day, and the deathly dancers are heard making away.

The "Waldweben," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, were the closing numbers of this excellent program. The prelude was delightfully rendered, ending with a roar and the strength of the full orchestra.

The audience did not grow weary. The program was not too long, as is often the case with orchestral concerts.

But few mistakes were made in the playing, none, certainly, that an unpracticed ear would notice. To-night the orchestra will play several selections in connection with the Mozart's concert. Verdi's "Requiem," with Mr. McCollum as director, will take up the second part of the program. The soloists will be Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin.

LEADER, Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave a Grand Concert Last Night.

Old City hall was crowded last night to hear the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch appeared as soloist. The program was a varied one with wide scope for expression, and from the opening of the magnificent Schumann "Spring" symphony to the final echoes of the closing Wagnerian selection, interest was sustained while applause was generally accorded not only at the conclusion of numbers, but also during the brief intervals marking the space between the movements of melody. The opening selection, the Schumann "Spring" symphony, is said to have emanated from the happiest period of the composer's life when all obstacles to his marriage had been overcome and he had won a high position as a composer and authority in music, in its buoyant measures seemed to reflect very characteristically the happy mood of the composer and the environments of a refreshing spring day.

Mrs. Nikisch appeared several times during the concert. The lady possesses a delightfully clear and sympathetic voice which is under excellent control. In her first and second selections the latter immediately succeeding the former, opportunity was given for sharp contrast in the love songs selected from Mozart's comic opera, the first, bashful in its intonation but clear and lovely in its scope, and the second, full of intensity, expressing the vibration of sentiment, of passion and anguish. The sweet singer was liberally applauded. Mrs. Nikisch, who is of pleasing stage presence, of pleasant manner and youthful in appearance, was heard in further selections during the program, songs with the piano accompaniment. The concert was given under the auspices of the Mozart club. The second concert will be given to-night. The orchestra will render the symphonic poem, "Tasso", of Liszt; violin solos will be given by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Verdi's requiem will be presented by the Mozart club, with Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin as soloists.

JOURNAL, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5-2

THE END OF A SEASON.

DRAMATICALLY THE PRESENT SEASON ALMOST OVER.

The Symphony Concerts Next Week—Cowper's Play and Its Local Cast—Crumhorn's New Yankee Play—Only Two Bookings for May at the Detroit.

The two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, at the Lyceum theater next Monday and Wednesday evenings, will not only prove a musical treat of rare excellence, but will also call out the elite and swell music lovers of Detroit. Of the organization itself it is perhaps unnecessary to say but a word. Standing almost alone in its position, it has ever proved one of the strongest attractions of its kind, and has always fulfilled to the letter every prediction of success, artistic and social, that has been claimed for it. Under the able directorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, formerly of Leipsic, it has even improved in tone, and merit and fame. The following is the program for Monday night:

[ARTHUR NIKISCH.]

Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23; A. Thomas, aria from "Mignon," Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor; Servais, Fantasie for 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," Mr. Anton Hekking; songs with piano, by Goldmark, Liszt, Brahms, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Raff, symphony No. 3, "Im Walde."

For Wednesday evening: Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26, in four movements; Weber, aria from "Freischuetz," Miss Marie Jahn; Lalo, rhapsody for orchestra, in A; songs with piano, by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. Miss Marie Jahn; Wagner, Waldweben from "Siegfried;" Wagner, prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

Clipping from Post, Pittsburg, PA.

Date 5/1

AN EVENING OF HARMONY.

Delightful Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Old City Hall.

THE MOZART CLUB WILL SING TO-NIGHT.

Rev. C. E. Locke Gives a House-Warming at His New Parsonage.

SOCIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS OF INTEREST.

The Boston Symphony orchestra appeared under the auspices of the Mozart club at old city hall last night. A most hearty reception was tendered this superb organization. The fashionable, the musical and the critical devotees to the divine art taxed the capacity of the room. The Mozart club was seated on the stage. Too much praise cannot be accorded the Symphony orchestra nor to its conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The playing had that uniformity and precision necessary to a careful interpretation of great orchestral scores. The program was faultless; admirably chosen.

Symphony No 1, in b flat, by Schumann, was the first selection. This was his first great work. It combines the revered severity of the old German school with an originality that commands attention.

Two movements: The andante and scherzo from symphony No. 4, by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, were of an interesting character. The peculiar rhythm and quaint melodic phrases were produced in a forcible manner. Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, was the most piquant conceit in instrumentation played for a long time in Pittsburgh. It represented Death tuning a viol. Two selections from "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, were the last of the instrumental selections, and were rendered with an admirable coloring and tone painting that was extremely striking.

The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. She has a clear, sweet voice, yet one that is not powerful. She sang two selections from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and three other arias by Goldmark, Gade and Delibes respectively. To-night the Mozart club will give Verdi's Requiem, accompanied by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

LEADER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5-3

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A Great Audience Greets the Boston Symphony Orchestra—John Marquardt's Vocal Recitals—English Church Music—The Fresh Air and Union Veterans Union Concert.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be the attraction of the closing Star course entertainment drew a large concourse of people to Music Hall last evening. Besides a full representation of the course patrons, there were enough outsiders to fill every vacant seat. The programme began with the overture to Weber's "Oberon," the delicate treatment of which stilled the audience to close attention. The next orchestral number was the "Peer Gynt Suite," by Grieg. This aroused great enthusiasm in the audience. It is a weird and striking work, picturesque in coloring, and vivid in characteristic portrayal, and was given in a magnificent manner. It contains the "Daybreak," "The Death of Aase," "Anitra's Dance," and "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains," with the fitful, imperious, harrowing chase of Peer Gynt by the Imps. The whole was well portrayed, and the applause of the audience was very loud. The Schumann Symphony No. 1 was the closing number, Andante un poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace, largetto, molto vivace, allegro animate grazioso. It was given so smoothly and perfectly, that it challenged criticism, and the audience seemed entranced during the rendition. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang "[illegible] Dragons de Villars," Maillard; with (a) "[illegible] My Eyelids," C. K. Rogers, (b) "The [illegible] smith," Gade, (c) and "Roses," Oscar [illegible]. The lady's appearance wins the good will of her audience immediately, and her voice, pleasing and sympathetic, her agreeable style in singing suffices to it. The other soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski, gave St. Saens' Rondo Capriccio for violin which he played with perfect mastery of its difficulties. He was persistently encored but could only bow his acknowledgments. The vehement applause at the close of the Peer Gynt suite was rewarded by a repetition of the latter part.

[138]

THE DETROIT TRIBUNE.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is now about ten years since Henry L. Higginson, a public spirited citizen of Boston, established the famous orchestra known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Higginson did not embark in the enterprise as a money making scheme. He was prepared to lose money, and his expectations were perhaps more than realized, for there was a balance on the wrong side of the ledger of from twenty to thirty thousand dollars each year for seven or eight years, but the orchestra is now at least self-supporting, if not profitable.

For the first three years of its existence George Henschel was the director. During the first year of his work Mr. Henschel was very sharply criticized, but as he gained in experience the playing of the orchestra improved, and when his term of office expired Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna assumed control of a much more cultivated body of musicians than Mr. Henschel started with. Gericke wielded the baton for five seasons and then gave place to Arthur Nikisch, the present conductor, who when the orchestra was established was associate director with Anton Seidl at the Leipzig Stadt theatre. Although still a young man Mr. Nikisch is in many respects an ideal orchestra leader. He plays upon the orchestra as though it were a concert grand piano, so subservient are its members to every gesture which he makes, though his motions are never extravagant. He was somewhat criticized when he commenced his work in Boston for the boldness of his interpretations of the works of the old classical composers, but if the critics did not like his renderings the people did, and the critics now have very little to say in opposition.

What has made the Boston Symphony orchestra the perfect musical organization it is? In the first place, money. The capital invested has been used to bring to this country the best musicians of the old world. Whenever a weakness is discovered in any part, or any player becomes indifferent to his work, he will soon find himself supplanted by a better man, and the management has the world to choose from. A liberal use of money and hard work by the players will give Detroit an equally good orchestra.

It was a brilliant audience assembled at the Lyceum theater last evening to listen to the first of the two concerts given here by the famous orchestra. Those who attended in a critical frame of mind had little to do but enjoy, for such a performance disarms criticism. Some who felt as if something in a fault-finding way ought to be said, commented adversely on the make-up of the program, and would have preferred some other composers represented, but really the only dissatisfied ones were those who stayed away, for no one who attended had any fault to find with the program or its performance.

The opening number was the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by that master of orchestration, Hector Berlioz, which was faultlessly rendered, as were also the two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony in F minor, the difficult pizzicati passages for the strings in the Scherzo being rendered in perfect unity; and throughout the precision of attack indicated the wonderful control Mr. Nikisch has over his players. It is in such work as this, and in the beautiful shading, sometimes going abruptly from a pianissimo to a fortissimo, and sometimes insensibly gliding from the softest possible tone volume to the fullest power of the orchestra, that the value of long and continued practice is made manifest.

Raff's symphony "In the Woods" was the closing number on the program. The interest in its performance was greatly enhanced by the analytical notes of Mr. Wilson, which were printed on the program; and the fact that many would have enjoyed hearing a Beethoven symphony, did not detract from the pleasure derived from the admirable reading given Raff's work.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocalist of the evening, was on friendly terms with the audience at once. She was tastefully attired, and her attractive manner and unaffected style added much to the pleasure given by her singing. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of excellent quality, and her method is marked by that rare accomplishment nowadays, distinctness of enunciation. Her first number was the familiar aria from Mignon, "Know'st Thou the Land," which was sung in French to the accompaniment of the orchestra. Later in the program, with Mr. Nikisch at the piano, a group of German songs was charmingly rendered.

Any instrumental soloist connected with this organization is sure to be of the first rank, and Anton Hekking is certainly no exception to the rule. His 'cello solo, "O Cara Memoria," by Servais, won him several recalls, to which he finally responded with a superb rendering of an arrangement of Chopin's Nocturne in E flat.

At the second concert on Wednesday evening Miss Marie Jahn is to be the soloist, and the orchestral work includes Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony," a rhapsody by Lalo, and two Wagner selections.

E. T. R.

[138]

The Evening News.

DETROIT, TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

Artistic to the last degree, best describes the work of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Lyceum theater last evening. Detroit has never heard better orchestration, and it is doubtful if any organization has ever visited this city which could, in all the fine points which go to make up a symphony orchestra, compare with the one which was heard last night under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The individual performers are all musicians of undoubted merit and having been trained together under the highest type of a musical director, the result is a breadth and delicacy of tone coloring that must delight the most critical. The orchestra in the very passion of almost musical madness is subservient to the wave of the director's baton, and so admirably is it controlled that it would seem the leader touched the keys of some giant instrument, evoking tones at will. The ensemble playing was marvelous; it was impossible to catch the sound of any particular instrument, but the sound came in those great waves which show harmony in its grandest form.

The program rendered, though it did not include any of Wagner's music, was none the less artistic and high class for that. The composers represented were all great musicians and the audience seemed all the more pleased to have new dishes offered for their entertainment and instruction.

The initial number was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," an opera which has never become popular, although the overture is considered a wonderful specimen of his best work. The score of the master was admirably rendered by the 75 musicians on the stage, whose work introduced even new beauties to those who were familiar with the beauties of Berlioz's compositions.

The adantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, the second orchestral number, was chiefly noticeable for the wonderful handling of the pizzicato passages in the scherzo. The large and critical audience was captured by this number, and the applause was deafening. The closing number was Raff's "im Walde," and it was evident from the beginning of the allegro, or first movement, that the best had been reserved for the last of the musical feast. It was given that breathless attention which is the best applause, and when the final note of the third movement had died away the audience seemed to wake as from a dream.

The soloists of the evening were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, mezzo soprano, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cellist. Mrs. Nikish has a voice of remarkable purity, and her numbers were sung with good effect, her artistic training being plainly observable. Her first number was the aria, "Know'st thou the land," from Thomas' "Mignon." She was again heard in a group of German songs by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms. She was very warmly applauded, and presented with a magnificent bunch of roses by the Detroit Philharmonic club.

Mr. Hekking as a 'cello player occupies the first rank of the musicians of today who perform on that instrument. Under his skillful fingers the instrument expresses emotions almost as plainly as could an animate being. His execution of Servais' "O Cara Memoria" brought a storm of applause, which would not down until he reappeared and played Chopin's nocturne in E flat, which performance demonstrated that his technical ability is phenomenal.

Tonight the orchestra plays at Ann Arbor, and it will be heard again at the Lyceum tomorrow evening, with Miss Marie Jahn as the soloist. The program to be presented by the orchestra embraces selections from the works of Goldmark, Lalo and Wagner, and the vocal numbers will be by Weber, Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen.

Clipping from Review Alliance O

Date 5-2

—The Boston Symphony Orchestra company passed through Alliance this morning on the C. & P. enroute to Cleveland where they play tonight. The entire company took lunch at Russell & Aker's west side restaurant, and a member of the company in talking with a REVIEW reporter said: "Yes we have quite a large company seventy five in all. We came from Pittsburgh where we have been playing two days. From Cleveland we go to Buffalo, N. Y., and from there westward striking Detroit, Chicago and Louisville. Our program is entirely a musical one and our company is made up of French, German, Austrian and American talent."

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give concerts at Central Music Hall on Thursday and Friday evenings and Saturday afternoon of next week. The orchestra numbers seventy-five picked players and will have the assistance of the following soloists: Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Lena Little, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski and Anton Hekking. The sale of seats is now in progress.

Date 5-2

The musical event of the coming weeks will be more noteworthy or more thoroughly enjoyable than the series of concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The season embraces three concerts, upon Thursday evening, May 7, Friday evening, May 8, and Saturday afternoon, May 9. The well-known superiority of this organization and the indubitable fact that in many regards it stands without a parallel among modern orchestras insures a warm reception for the band. Mr. Nikisch brings with him as soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Miss Mary Howe, who has achieved a considerable reputation as an artiste, and Messrs. Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, who are members of the orchestra's violin corps. The programmes are throughout of a high class and admirably varied. That for the first concert on Thursday includes Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, the "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," and Raff's symphony, No. 3. Mr. Kneisel will play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing an aria by Raff and three songs by Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. The box-office is now open for the sale of seats.

DETROIT JOURNAL

EIGHTH YEAR.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1891.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the first of its two concerts in Detroit at the Lyceum last evening and received a deservedly enthusiastic welcome. For 10 years the orchestra has had the reputation of being the leader of orchestral organizations in this country, and the justice of this reputation was further substantiated by last night's performance.

The orchestra's principal piece on the program was Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," or "In the Woods," in four movements. In this the remarkable technique of the musicians, and the more remarkable control of Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was shown to best advantage. The theme of the piece is a scene in the woods, with twilight, darkness, sylvan dances and the break of day. Throughout the piece was remarkably rendered, every part being taken with as much sympathy and artistic expression as could be desired by the most critical musician. The orchestra also rendered Berlioz' overture to the opera of "Benvenu to Cellini" and the andantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4. Both of these selections received hearty applause, the greatest enthusiasm being shown over the scherzo movement in the latter piece. This movement consisted largely of pizzicati passages, which are rendered with as much unity and delicate expression as the ordinary passages.

Aside from the orchestra, the hit of the evening was made by Anton Hekking, who has been heard in Detroit as the 'cellist of the Mendelssohn quartet, of Boston. Mr. Hekking played Lewais' fantasie for the 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," displaying a technique seldom equaled by 'cellists. His playing, aside from being faultless technically, is full of sympathy and expression, and every pause in the piece was followed by enthusiastic applause. At the conclusion of the piece there was a spontaneous burst of applause, which clearly showed how he had captured the highly critical audience. He was recalled to the stage three times and finally responded by rendering Chopin's nocturne in E flat.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocal soloist of the evening, possesses a fine mezzo-soprano voice which is particularly noticeable for its clearness and "true musical qualities." She sings with pleasing expression, and, what is even more pleasing, with distinct enunciation, the latter being a quality seldom possessed by concert singers. Her selections consisted of an air from "Mignon," in French, and a group of three German songs, by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms, all of which were well received.

The orchestra gives another concert at the same place tomorrow evening, when Marie Jahn will be the soloist. Miss Jahn will sing an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and a group of songs by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. The orchestral selections will include Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," in four movements, and selections by Lalo and Wagner.

***

PRESS, Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5-1

THE SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

Old City Hall Crowded to Hear Boston's Great Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is king of all melody making organizations that have visited Pittsburg. It has been kept up as a professional concert orchestra and its membership is composed of men who play in it from year to year. This being the case, and with such a man as Arthur Nikisch as director, it is no wonder that old city hall last night was crowded to its utmost capacity with representative musicians and music lovers, assembled to hear the famous orchestra. Many in the audience had heard the orchestra before, which only made them more anxious to hear it again.

It was 8:30 o'clock when the trim, modest-looking director, Arthur Nikisch, quietly stepped out and raised his baton. There had been no discordant tuning of instruments. Amid the utmost quiet the first notes of Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat were heard. A beautiful work it is. Written by Schumann in the happiest time of his life, when hope for his future was strong and the success of his present assured. When the orchestra had executed in its masterly way the different movements and Mr. Nikisch had stepped down from the conductor's dias, the applause of the audience must have been very gratifying to him. Following, as the next number, came two solos by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, a soprano singer that has attracted great attention of late. She is a beautiful woman and sings delightfully. Perhaps she was a little disappointing to some who may have been expecting too much. Her high tones were hardly what were expected, but they were strong and smooth. In her second number, an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart, her singing was better. Upon her second appearance on the stage she sang three songs, with piano accompaniments played by Mr. Nikisch. In these numbers she was more acceptable and was rapturously applauded.

The symphonic poem "Danse Macabra," by Saint-Saens, was a selection that attracted a great deal of attention. It is wildly weird, and something unexpected is continuously happening. Doleful midnight bells, death and ghostly dances, with rattling bones, run through until finally the cock crows in the break of day, and the deathly dancers are heard making away.

The "Waldweben," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, were the closing numbers of this excellent program. The prelude was delightfully rendered, ending with a roar and the strength of the full orchestra.

The audience did not grow weary. The program was not too long, as is often the case with orchestral concerts.

But few mistakes were made in the playing, none, certainly, that an unpracticed ear would notice. To-night the orchestra will play several selections in connection with the Mozart's concert. Verdi's "Requiem," with Mr. McCollum as director, will take up the second part of the program. The soloists will be Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin.

LEADER, Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5/1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave a Grand Concert Last Night.

Old City hall was crowded last night to hear the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch appeared as soloist. The program was a varied one with wide scope for expression, and from the opening of the magnificent Schumann "Spring" symphony to the final echoes of the closing Wagnerian selection, interest was sustained while applause was generally accorded not only at the conclusion of numbers, but also during the brief intervals marking the space between the movements of melody. The opening selection, the Schumann "Spring" symphony, is said to have emanated from the happiest period of the composer's life when all obstacles to his marriage had been overcome and he had won a high position as a composer and authority in music, in its buoyant measures seemed to reflect very characteristically the happy mood of the composer and the environments of a refreshing spring day.

Mrs. Nikisch appeared several times during the concert. The lady possesses a delightfully clear and sympathetic voice which is under excellent control. In her first and second selections the latter immediately succeeding the former, opportunity was given for sharp contrast in the love songs selected from Mozart's comic opera, the first, bashful in its intonation but clear and lovely in its scope, and the second, full of intensity, expressing the vibration of sentiment, of passion and anguish. The sweet singer was liberally applauded. Mrs. Nikisch, who is of pleasing stage presence, of pleasant manner and youthful in appearance, was heard in further selections during the program, songs with the piano accompaniment. The concert was given under the auspices of the Mozart club. The second concert will be given to-night. The orchestra will render the symphonic poem, "Tasso", of Liszt; violin solos will be given by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Verdi's requiem will be presented by the Mozart club, with Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Dr. Carl Martin as soloists.

JOURNAL, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5-2

THE END OF A SEASON.

DRAMATICALLY THE PRESENT SEASON ALMOST OVER.

The Symphony Concerts Next Week—Cowper's Play and Its Local Cast—Crumhorn's New Yankee Play—Only Two Bookings for May at the Detroit.

The two concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, at the Lyceum theater next Monday and Wednesday evenings, will not only prove a musical treat of rare excellence, but will also call out the elite and swell music lovers of Detroit. Of the organization itself it is perhaps unnecessary to say but a word. Standing almost alone in its position, it has ever proved one of the strongest attractions of its kind, and has always fulfilled to the letter every prediction of success, artistic and social, that has been claimed for it. Under the able directorship of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, formerly of Leipsic, it has even improved in tone, and merit and fame. The following is the program for Monday night:

[ARTHUR NIKISCH.]

Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23; A. Thomas, aria from "Mignon," Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor; Servais, Fantasie for 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," Mr. Anton Hekking; songs with piano, by Goldmark, Liszt, Brahms, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch; Raff, symphony No. 3, "Im Walde."

For Wednesday evening: Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26, in four movements; Weber, aria from "Freischuetz," Miss Marie Jahn; Lalo, rhapsody for orchestra, in A; songs with piano, by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. Miss Marie Jahn; Wagner, Waldweben from "Siegfried;" Wagner, prelude, "Die Meistersinger."

***

Tribune, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5-4

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will be given at the Lyceum theater this evening. A very attractive program is announced, and a splendid performance may be anticipated. A feature of the concert will be the first appearance in this city of Mrs. Nikisch, who will sing with orchestral accompaniment the aria from "Mignon," and a group of songs accompanied at the piano by her distinguished husband. Mr. Anton Hekking will also appear as soloist, and will play a fantasie for 'cello by Servais. Tickets may be secured during the day at Bohzin's music store.

Clipping from Post, Pittsburg, PA.

Date 5/1

AN EVENING OF HARMONY.

Delightful Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Old City Hall.

THE MOZART CLUB WILL SING TO-NIGHT.

Rev. C. E. Locke Gives a House-Warming at His New Parsonage.

SOCIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS OF INTEREST.

The Boston Symphony orchestra appeared under the auspices of the Mozart club at old city hall last night. A most hearty reception was tendered this superb organization. The fashionable, the musical and the critical devotees to the divine art taxed the capacity of the room. The Mozart club was seated on the stage. Too much praise cannot be accorded the Symphony orchestra nor to its conductor, Arthur Nikisch. The playing had that uniformity and precision necessary to a careful interpretation of great orchestral scores. The program was faultless; admirably chosen.

Symphony No 1, in b flat, by Schumann, was the first selection. This was his first great work. It combines the revered severity of the old German school with an originality that commands attention.

Two movements: The andante and scherzo from symphony No. 4, by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, were of an interesting character. The peculiar rhythm and quaint melodic phrases were produced in a forcible manner. Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, was the most piquant conceit in instrumentation played for a long time in Pittsburgh. It represented Death tuning a viol. Two selections from "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, were the last of the instrumental selections, and were rendered with an admirable coloring and tone painting that was extremely striking.

The soloist was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. She has a clear, sweet voice, yet one that is not powerful. She sang two selections from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and three other arias by Goldmark, Gade and Delibes respectively. To-night the Mozart club will give Verdi's Requiem, accompanied by the Boston Symphony orch...

LEADER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5-3

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A Great Audience Greets the Boston Symphony Orchestra—John Marquardt's Violin Recitals—English Church Music—The Fresh Air and Union Veterans Union Concert.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be the attraction of the closing Star course entertainment drew a large concourse of people to Music Hall last evening. Besides a full representation of the course patrons, there were enough outsiders to fill every vacant seat. The programme began with the overture to Weber's "Oberon," the delicate treatment of which stilled the audience to close attention. The next orchestral number was the "Peer Gynt Suite," by Grieg. This aroused great enthusiasm in the audience. It is a weird and striking work, picturesque in coloring, and vivid in characteristic portrayal, and was given in a magnificent manner. It contains the "Daybreak," "The Death of Aase," "Anitra's Dance," and "In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains," with the fitful, imperious, harrowing chase of Peer Gynt by the Imps. The whole was well portrayed, and the applause of the audience was very loud. The Schumann Symphony No. 1 was the closing number, Andante un poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace, largetto, molto vivace, allegro animate grazioso. It was given so smoothly, so perfectly, that it challenged criticism, and the audience seemed entranced during its rendition. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang "Les Dragons de Villars," Maillard; with (a) "Kiss My Eyelids," C. K. Rogers, (b) "The Goldsmith," Gade, (c) and "Roses," Oscar Weil. The lady's appearance wins the good will of her audience immediately, and her voice, pleasing and sympathetic, with her agreeable style in singing suffices to keep it. The other soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski, gave St. Saens' Rondo Capriccio for violin, which he played with perfect mastership of its difficulties. He was persistently encored, but could only bow his acknowledgments. The vehement applause at the close of the Peer Gynt suite was rewarded by a repetition of the latter part.

Clipping from Register. Ann Arbor, Mich.

Date 4-30

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventy performers, will be here Tuesday evening, May 5. This will be welcome news to our music lovers. The concert will be the great event of the season. This organization has been having the most wonderful success, and the program which they will play in Ann Arbor will show the remarkable qualities of the orchestra. Tickets to this concert will be sold under the same conditions as to the other Choral Union concerts. The following program has been arranged: Overture, "Lenore No. 3," Beethoven; Symphony, B flat, No. 1, Schumann; Aria from Mignon, A. Thomas, Mrs. Nikisch; Vorspiel, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Songs with Piano—Passage to Bruenwhildes Rock," "Morning Dawn," "Rhine Journey" from Siegfried and Goetter Daemmerung, Wagner. It is impossible to speak too highly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the citizens of Ann Arbor are fortunate in being able to hear such a concert as this will be. The doors will be closed promptly at the beginning of the first number.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5/3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Grand Concert in Music Hall Closes the Star Course.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the closing entertainment in the Star course at Music hall last evening before an audience which crowded the building to the doors. It is fashionable with Cleveland audiences not to arrive until the performance is half over and therefore a great many missed the opening number, the overture to "Oberon." The music is of a charmingly fanciful character and was played to perfection by the orchestra. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang an aria from Maillard's "Les Dragons des Villars." Her voice, while not remarkable, is full and rich in quality and her execution is good. The charm of her singing lies largely in her clear and distinct vocalization. The words of the songs she sang were distinctly pronounced and could be easily followed. In the middle register her voice is particularly good. The second number allotted to her were the songs with piano and violin obligato a, "Kiss My Eyelids," by C. K. Rogers; b, "The Goldsmith," by Gade, and c, "Roses," by O. Weil. The rendition of "The Goldsmith," a delicious little affair, evoked much applause. Mr. T. Adamowski gave a violin solo rondo capriccioso capably and was urged to respond to an encore but declined. The number with which the audience was most in sympathy was the suite "Peer Gynt" by Grieg. The music is in four movements, representing Daybreak, the Death of Aase, Anitra's Dance and the Hall of the Mountain King. The music varies from light to funereal, weird and ghostly and closes with a march. The closing number was Schumann's symphony No. 1 in five movements and the technical difficulties of the score were overcome with ease and precision. In this number the superb qualities of the orchestra were put to the test.

POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 5-3

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Two Concerts to be Given in This City by This Famous Body.

The famous Boston Festival Orchestra will give two concerts at the Academy of Music on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, May 14. An orchestra of forty under the baton of Mr. Victor Herbert, with Emil Mollenhauer as concert-master, and a number of eminent soloists make up the attraction. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the well-known pupil of Liszt, has countless admirers in Washington who will be sure to be present at her only performance in this city for the season. Miss Rose Stewart, of Boston, is a lyric soprano, with high, pure voice of great flexibility. Her teacher, Mme. Marchesi, of Paris, regards her as one of the most brilliant floriture singers he has met in the thirty years of her experience. In addition, Miss Stewart is young and of pleasing appearance and address. Felix Winternitz, the violinist, was graduated with the highest honors from the great Vienna Conservatory in 1885, and came to this country to join the Boston Orchestra. Tone, technique, and artistic comprehension of his music he has in high degree. His solo work in Boston received praise from all the critics. As he is still a youth, his future is full of promise. Myron W. Whitney, America's greatest basso, and the genial Victor Herbert, 'cellist, make up the list of soloists. Programme books will be ready for distribution the first of the week, and season tickets at $1.50 each will be on sale at Metzerott's Tuesday morning. Tickets for single concerts will not be sold until May 11. The prices have been made popular, and one can hear the two concerts for what is usually paid for one.

NEWS, Indianapolis, Ind.

5-1

The Louisville Music Festival will open Tuesday [illegible] and symphony concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the overture, "Sakuntala," by Goldmark; symphony, "In Walde," by Raff; a suite, "Peer Gynt," by Greig, and Saint Saen's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." At this concert Miss Marie John will be heard in vocal selections, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, will play Brohm's concerto in D, op 77, with the orchestra. Wednesday afternoon a young peoples' popular concert will be given, when the orchestra will render the overture from "Mignon" (Thomas), "Nikia's Dream," and "In the Hammock," from Godard's "Symphonic Orientale;" "Norwegian Rhapsodie" (Lalo); symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lament and Triumph" (Liszt), and the Paris edition of Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser." Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be heard in vocal selections, and Paganini's concerto, "Perpetual Motion," will be given by all the violins in the orchestra. Wednesday night there will be an open rehearsal of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" by the orchestra and chorus. Thursday evening occurs the grand classical concert, when the orchestra will play the overture from "Prometheus Bound," (Goldmark); Brohm's symphony No. 2 in D, op 73; "Waldweben," from "Siegfreid," and the "Prelude and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde" (Wagner), with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in vocal solos. Friday night the orchestra will play overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op 23 (Berlio) and Beethoven's symphony, No. 6 (Pastoral), and Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" will be rendered, with Mlle. DeVere, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Mr. Whitney Mockridge and Mr. Wm. Ludwig as the soloists. Saturday night "Elijah" will be sung, with the solos taken by the above-named artists.

JOURNAL, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5/5

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the first of its two concerts in Detroit at the Lyceum last evening and received a deservedly enthusiastic welcome. For 10 years the orchestra has had the reputation of being the leader of orchestral organizations in this country, and the justice of this reputation was further substantiated by last night's performance.

The orchestra's principal piece on the program was Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," or "In the Woods," in four movements. In this the remarkable technique of the musicians, and the more remarkable control of Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was shown to best advantage. The theme of the piece is a scene in the woods, with twilight, darkness, sylvan dances and the break of day. Throughout the piece was remarkably rendered, every part being taken with as much sympathy and artistic expression as could be desired by the most critical musician. The orchestra also rendered Berlioz' overture to the opera of "Benvenu to Cellini" and the andantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4. Both of these selections received hearty applause, the greatest enthusiasm being shown over the scherzo movement in the latter piece. This movement consisted largely of pizzicati passages, which are rendered with as much unity and delicate expression as the ordinary passages.

Aside from the orchestra, the hit of the evening was made by Anton Hekking, who has been heard in Detroit as the 'cellist of the Mendelssohn quartet, of Boston. Mr. Hekking played Lewals' fantasie for the 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," displaying a technique seldom equaled by 'cellists. His playing, aside from being faultless technically, is full of sympathy and expression, and every pause in the piece was followed by enthusiastic applause. At the conclusion of the piece there was a spontaneous burst of applause, which clearly showed how he had captured the highly critical audience. He was recalled to the stage three times and finally responded by rendering Chopin's nocturne in E flat.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocal soloist of the evening, possesses a fine mezzo-soprano voice which is particularly noticeable for its clearness and "true musical qualities." She sings with pleasing expression, and, what is even more pleasing, with distinct enunciation, the latter being a quality seldom possessed by concert singers. Her selections consisted of an air from "Mignon," in French, and a group of three German songs, by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms, all of which were well received.

The orchestra gives another concert at the same place tomorrow evening, when Marie Jahn will be the soloist. Miss Jahn will sing an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and a group of songs by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. The orchestral selections will include Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," in four movements, and selections by Lalo and Wagner.

Date 4/29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its last concert of the season. The works were finely performed and the director, Arthur Nikisch, was received with hearty applause. The soloist was, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who made a vigorous attack on Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto. It was her first appearance in Baltimore and she made a fairly good impression. So far as vigor and strength were concerned Mrs. Hopekirk's style was well enough. But there are such things as accentuation, spirit and rhythm, without pounding, and with her they were often resolved into this. Her playing was wanting in flexibility and grace, but her brilliance won her generous applause and a recall at the close of the concerto. The orchestral works were: Overture, to "Oberon," Weber; two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale"—"Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock"

[139]

Clipping from Courier Evening Star, Ottawa

Date 4-27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Among orchestral organizations in America the Boston symphony orchestra has by universal consent been given the first place. Its rendering of the masterpieces of the great composers is unequaled by that of any similar organization in this country. This superb band was brought into existence through the munificence and public spirit of a wealthy Boston gentleman, who supplied the large amount of money necessary to establish and maintain, until it was self-supporting, such a great organization. Its artistic excellence is the result of having always the very best conductor that money could procure, with very few changes in the players. Having a firm financial basis, the best musicians could be procured and maintained, which gave this orchestra an immeasurable advantage over similar organizations that were obliged to make frequent changes in their musicians. The unequaled merit of the band soon was manifested and received the warmest appreciation. Year after year in Boston and throughout the eastern towns the interest in its entertainments grew, until everywhere the band is known and its appearance is the red-letter event of the musical season. The orchestra is composed of about eighty musicians. This season it gave forty-eight concerts in the Boston music hall, embracing twenty-four evening and twenty-four afternoon performances. Every seat in the great hall for all performances was taken nearly three weeks before the first concert was given, and standing room was usually difficult to obtain, so great was the throng of people who desired to hear the excellent music even at a sacrifice of their personal convenience. A great enthusiasm was also manifested in New York, Washington, Baltimore and other large eastern cities, where the largest halls are crowded to the doors by the wealth and culture of the cities. It will please lovers of the highest class of music in and about Chicago to learn that this magnificent orchestra will give two concerts in Central music hall instead of one as heretofore, on Thursday and Saturday evenings, May 7 and [illegible]. The orchestra is always accompanied by soloists of exceptional ability. Those desiring seats reserved for both concerts may have the tickets sent them by addressing Edmund W. Ballentine, La Salle street, Chicago.

Clipping from NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 4-29

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

A Charming Chamber Concert at Haseltine's Galleries.

The Adamowski Quartet, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, gave a very enjoyable concert at Haseltine's Galleries yesterday afternoon. There were three instrumental numbers on the programme. The opening quartet was that by Haydn in D, Peters, No. 6, a bright and simple composition, lucid and melodious and agreeably concise. The other quartet was that by Schumann in E flat, op. 47, for piano and strings, which in the complexity of its structure and the emotional intensity of its themes furnished a striking and effective contrast to Haydn's graceful, genial, but somewhat primitive music. Besides the two quartets, the programme included the allegretto from Grieg's sonata for piano and violin in F, op. 8, a captivating movement, full of the poetic melancholy by which so much of Grieg's music is distinguished. In this as in the Schumann quartet Mr. Nikisch sustained the piano part, and did so in a manner which showed him to be as good a performer as he is a conductor. A very agreeable feature of the concert was the intelligent and expressive singing of Mrs. Nikisch, who was heard in Franz' "Stille Sicherheit," Schumann's "Provencalishes Lied," and "Auftraye," Bizet's "Pastorale," Godard's "Chanson de Florian," and Delibes' "Bonjour, Sazon." Mrs. Nikisch has an attractive personality and is a sympathetic and accomplished singer.

Clipping from POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 4/29

Symphony Concert To-night.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concerts always prove occasions of rare musical enjoyment, will close their series at Lincoln Music Hall this evening. The orchestra will have the assistance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, a pianiste of high repute, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cellist in solo numbers. A fine programme is promised, closing with the Boston [illegible] Eroica Symphony.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 4/29

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Last of the Series—Works by Living Composers.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, took place last evening at the Concordia Opera House. With but one exception (Weber) the programme consisted of selections from the works of living composers (Brahms, Tschaipowsky, Benjamin Godard). Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon," the first number on the programme, is too well known to need comment. The soloist of the evening was Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianiste, of London fame. Mme. Hopekirk played Tschaipowsky's concerto for piano No. 1 in B flat minor, a work which is very much what the Germans fitly term "undankbar."

If under this disadvantage a pianist may nevertheless present the work in a more than acceptable shape, and in consequence be compelled to appear twice, much praise must be accorded to the soloist. Regularity and precision in the most rapid runs and certainly in presentation are the most conspicuous characteristics of her style of playing. The next number consisted of the third and fourth selections from the "Symphonic Orientale" of Benjamin Godard. The selections are entitled "Le Reve de la Nikia" (Persia) and "Sara la Baigneuse" (Greece). These selections together with three others, "Les Elephants" (Arabia), "Chinoiserie" (China), "Marche Turque" (Turkey), form the symphony, which is evidently an attempt to depict the national characteristics of the five representative oriental races. His style is bizarre in the extreme. He brings together all sorts of heterogeneous matter, making thereby an inconsistent mixture of all styles and lending to his works rather a cosmopolitan character than a definite, independent individuality. Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major served as the conclusion to the concert. Whereas the first is full of passion and unrest almost as clearly as Beethoven's C minor symphony, the second is remarkable for cheerfulness, repose and almost pastoral simplicity. The concert proved to be a fitting close to this most successful series. It is the intention to give six concerts next season.

Lybrand—Renner.

LEADER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5-2

The Great Concert To-Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives the closing concert of the Star Course for the season at Music Hall to-night, offers a programme of unusual excellence. It includes the Oberon overture, the Grieg suite, "Peer Gynt," the Schumann Symphony No. 1, besides songs by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and a violin solo by T. Adamowski. As is known by most of the readers of the LEADER, this great body of seventy musicians is one of the finest orchestras in the world, and brings to Cleveland the same grandeur of programme and perfection of playing which have made their Boston season of forty-eight concerts famous. This is at the same time a compliment and a great treat, which, though furnished at very great expense, will be appreciated, as usual, by a crowd limited only by the capacity of the hall. General admission tickets will be sold at the door, and those who would be admitted should be on hand early.

News, Chicago, Ill.

5-2

No musical event of the coming weeks will be more noteworthy or more thoroughly enjoyable than the series of concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur [illegible] braces three concerts, upon Thursday evening, May 7, Friday evening, May 8, and Saturday afternoon, May 9. The well-known superiority of this organization and the indubitable fact that in many regards it stands without a parallel among modern orchestras insures a warm reception for the band. Mr. Nikisch brings with him as soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Miss Mary Howe, who has achieved a considerable reputation as an artiste, and Messrs. Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, who are members of the orchestra's violin corps. The programmes are throughout of a high class and admirably varied. That for the first concert on Thursday includes Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, the "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," and Raff's symphony, No. 3. Mr. Kneisel will play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing an aria by Raff and three songs by Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. The box-office is now open for the sale of seats.

Clipping from COURANT, Hartford, Conn.

Date 4/29

Three vocalists, who are to be heard at the May festival, had solo parts at the Boston symphony [illegible] concerts, [illegible] Mielke and Messrs. Rieger and Meyn. The Advertiser said on Monday of the great German soprano: "Mme. Mielke's Lenora can be warmly commended. Purity, earnestness, depth of feeling and artistic loveliness predominated in all that the artiste had to do, and a very high value must be placed upon her musical intelligence. The eloquence of her interpretation as she sang the great aria, "Thou Monstrous Fiend," and the passion and power of her singing was as near an approach to perfection in tone, taste, knowledge, sensibility and expression as it is possible to imagine."

Clipping from Register. Ann Arbor, Mich.

Date 4-30

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventy performers, will be here Tuesday evening, May 5. This will be welcome news to our music lovers. The concert will be the great event of the season. This organization has been having the most wonderful success, and the program which they will play in Ann Arbor will show the remarkable qualities of the orchestra. Tickets to this concert will be sold under the same conditions as to the other Choral Union concerts. The following program has been arranged: Overture, "Lenore No. 3," Beethoven; Symphony, B flat, No. 1, Schumann; Aria from Mignon, A. Thomas, Mrs. Nikisch; Vorspiel, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Songs with Piano—Passage to Bruenwhildes Rock," "Morning Dawn," "Rhine Journey" from Siegfried and Goetter Daemmerung, Wagner. It is impossible to speak too highly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the citizens of Ann Arbor are fortunate in being able to hear such a concert as this will be. The doors will be closed promptly at the beginning of the first number.

PLAIN DEALER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5/3

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Grand Concert in Music Hall Closes the Star Course.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the closing entertainment in the Star course at Music hall last evening before an audience which crowded the building to the doors. It is fashionable with Cleveland audiences not to arrive until the performance is half over and therefore a great many missed the opening number, the overture to "Oberon." The music is of a charmingly fanciful character and was played to perfection by the orchestra. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang an aria from Maillard's "Les Dragons des Villars." Her voice, while not remarkable, is full and rich in quality and her execution is good. The charm of her singing lies largely in her clear and distinct vocalization. The words of the songs she sang were distinctly pronounced and could be easily followed. In the middle register her voice is particularly good. The second number allotted to her were the songs with piano and violin obligato a, "Kiss My Eyelids," by C. K. Rogers; b, "The Goldsmith," by Gade, and c, "Roses," by O. Weil. The rendition of "The Goldsmith," a delicious little affair, evoked much applause. Mr. T. Adamowski gave a violin solo rondo capriccioso capably and was urged to respond to an encore but declined. The number with which the audience was most in sympathy was the suite "Peer Gynt" by Grieg. The music is in four movements, representing Daybreak, the Death of Aase, Anitra's Dance and the Hall of the Mountain King. The music varies from light to funereal, weird and ghostly and closes with a march. The closing number was Schumann's symphony No. 1 in five movements and the technical difficulties of the score were overcome with ease and precision. In this number the superb qualities of the orchestra were put to the test.

Clipping from POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 5-3

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Two Concerts to Be Given in This City by This Famous Body.

The famous Boston Festival Orchestra will give two concerts at the Academy of Music on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, May 14. An orchestra of forty under the baton of Mr. Victor Herbert, with Emil Mollenhauer as concert-master, and a number of eminent soloists make up the attraction. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the well-known pupil of Liszt, has countless admirers in Washington who will be sure to be present at her only performance in this city for the season. Miss Rose Stewart, of Boston, is a lyric soprano, with high, pure voice of great flexibility. Her teacher, Mme. Marchesi, of Paris, regards her as one of the most brilliant fioriture singers she has met in the thirty years of her experience. In addition, Miss Stewart is young and of pleasing appearance and address. Felix Winternitz, the violinist, was graduated with the highest honors from the great Vienna Conservatory in 1885, and came to this country to join the Boston Orchestra. Tone, technique, and artistic apprehension of his music he has in high degree. His solo work in Boston received praise from all the critics. As he is still a youth, his future is full of promise.

Myron W. Whitney, America's greatest basso, and the genial Victor Herbert, 'cellist, make up the list of soloists. Programme books will be ready for distribution the first of the week, and season tickets at $1.50 each will be on sale at Metzerott's Tuesday morning. Tickets for single concerts will not be sold until May 11. The prices have been made popular, and one can hear the two concerts for what is usually paid for one.

[139]

NEWS, Indianapolis, Ind.

5-1

The Louisville Music Festival will open Tuesday [illegible] and symphony concert. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the overture, "Sakuntala," by Goldmark; symphony, "In Walde," by Raff; a suite, "Peer Gynt," by Greig, and Saint Saen's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." At this concert Miss Marie John will be heard in vocal selections, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, will play Brohm's concerto in D, op 77, with the orchestra. Wednesday afternoon a young peoples' popular concert will be given, when the orchestra will render the overture from "Mignon" (Thomas), "Nikia's Dream," and "In the Hammock," from Godard's "Symphonic Orientale;" "Norwegian Rhapsodie" (Lalo); symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lament and Triumph" (Liszt), and the Paris edition of Wagner's overture from "Tannhauser." Mrs. Arthur Nikisch will be heard in vocal selections, and Paganini's concerto, "Perpetual Motion," will be given by all the violins in the orchestra. Wednesday night there will be an open rehearsal of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" by the orchestra and chorus. Thursday evening occurs the grand classical concert, when the orchestra will play the overture from "Prometheus Bound," (Goldmark); Brohm's symphony No. 2 in D, op 73; "Waldweben," from "Siegfreid," and the "Prelude and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde" (Wagner), with Mrs. Arthur Nikisch in vocal solos. Friday night the orchestra will play overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," op 23 (Berlio) and Beethoven's symphony, No. 6 (Pastoral), and Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" will be rendered, with Mlle. DeVere, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Mr. Whitney Mockridge and Mr. Wm. Ludwig as the soloists. Saturday night "Elijah" will be sung, with the solos taken by the above-named artists.

JOURNAL, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5/6

The Boston symphony orchestra gave the first of its two concerts in Detroit at the Lyceum last evening and received a deservedly enthusiastic welcome. For 10 years the orchestra has had the reputation of being the leader of orchestral organizations in this country, and the justice of this reputation was further substantiated by last night's performance.

The orchestra's principal piece on the program was Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," or "In the Woods," in four movements. In this the remarkable technique of the musicians, and the more remarkable control of Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, was shown to best advantage. The theme of the piece is a scene in the woods, with twilight, darkness, sylvan dances and the break of day. Throughout the piece was remarkably rendered, every part being taken with as much sympathy and artistic expression as could be desired by the most critical musician. The orchestra also rendered Berlioz' overture to the opera of "Benvenu to Cellini" and the andantino and scherzo movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4. Both of these selections received hearty applause, the greatest enthusiasm being shown over the scherzo movement in the latter piece. This movement consisted largely of pizzicati passages, which are rendered with as much unity and delicate expression as the ordinary passages.

Aside from the orchestra, the hit of the evening was made by Anton Hekking, who has been heard in Detroit as the 'cellist of the Mendelssohn quartet, of Boston. Mr. Hekking played Lewals' fantasie for the 'cello, "O Cara Memoria," displaying a technique seldom equaled by 'cellists. His playing, aside from being faultless technically, is full of sympathy and expression, and every pause in the piece was followed by enthusiastic applause. At the conclusion of the piece there was a spontaneous burst of applause, which clearly showed how he had captured the highly critical audience. He was recalled to the stage three times and finally responded by rendering Chopin's nocturne in E flat.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the vocal soloist of the evening, possesses a fine mezzo-soprano voice which is particularly noticeable for its clearness and "true musical qualities." She sings with pleasing expression, and, what is even more pleasing, with distinct enunciation, the latter being a quality seldom possessed by concert singers. Her selections consisted of an air from "Mignon," in French, and a group of three German songs, by Goldmark, Liszt and Brahms, all of which were well received.

The orchestra gives another concert at the same place tomorrow evening, when Marie Jahn will be the soloist. Miss Jahn will sing an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and a group of songs by Rubenstein, Wagner and Lassen. The orchestral selections will include Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," in four movements, and selections by Lalo and Wagner.

Date 4/29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night its last concert of the season. The works were finely performed and the director, Arthur Nikisch, was received with hearty applause. The soloist was, Mrs. Helen Hopekirk, who made a vigorous attack on Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto. It was her first appearance in Baltimore and she made a fairly good impression. So far as vigor and strength were concerned Mrs. Hopekirk's style was well enough. But there are such things as accentuation, spirit and rhythm, without pounding, and with her they were often resolved into this. Her playing was wanting in flexibility and grace, but her brilliance won her generous applause and a recall at the close of the concerto. The orchestral works were: Overture, to "Oberon," Weber; two movements from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale"—"Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock"—[illegible] major, Clipping from Courier Evanston, Ill.

Date 4-27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Among orchestral organizations in America the Boston symphony orchestra has by universal consent been given the first place. Its rendering of the masterpieces of the great composers is unequaled by that of any similar organization in this country. This superb band was brought into existence through the munificence and public spirit of a wealthy Boston gentleman, who supplied the large amount of money necessary to establish and maintain, until it was self-supporting, such a great organization. Its artistic excellence is the result of having always the very best conductor that money could procure, with very few changes in the players. Having a firm financial basis, the best musicians could be procured and maintained, which gave this orchestra an immeasurable advantage over similar organizations that were obliged to make frequent changes in their musicians. The unequaled merit of the band soon was manifested and received the warmest appreciation. Year after year in Boston and throughout the eastern towns the interest in its entertainments grew, until everywhere the band is known and its appearance is the red-letter event of the musical season. The orchestra is composed of about eighty musicians. This season it gave forty-eight concerts in the Boston music hall, embracing twenty-four evening and twenty-four afternoon performances. Every seat in the great hall for all performances was taken nearly three weeks before the first concert was given, and standing room was usually difficult to obtain, so great was the throng of people who desired to hear the excellent music even at a sacrifice of their personal convenience. A great enthusiasm was also manifested in New York, Washington, Baltimore and other large eastern cities, where the largest halls are crowded to the doors by the wealth and culture of the cities. It will please lovers of the highest class of music in and about Chicago to learn that this magnificent orchestra will give two concerts in Central music hall instead of one as heretofore, on Thurs[illegible] and Saturday evenings, May 7 and [illegible]. The orchestra is always accompani[illegible] by soloists of exceptional ability. T[illegible]se desiring seats reserved for both [illegible]certs may have the tickets sent them[illegible]y addressing Edmund W. Ballentine, [illegible] La Salle street, Chicago.

Clipping from NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 4-29

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

A Charming Chamber Concert at Haseltine's Galleries.

The Adamowski Quartet, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, gave a very enjoyable concert at Haseltine's Galleries yesterday afternoon. There were three instrumental numbers on the programme. The opening quartet was that by Haydn in D, Peters, No. 6, a bright and simple composition, lucid and melodious and agreeably concise. The other quartet was that by Schumann in E flat, op. 47, for piano and strings, which in the complexity of its structure and the emotional intensity of its themes furnished a striking and effective contrast to Haydn's graceful, genial, but somewhat primitive music. Besides the two quartets, the programme included the allegretto from Grieg's sonata for piano and violin in F. op. 8, a captivating movement, full of the poetic melancholy by which so much of Grieg's music is distinguished. In this as in the Schumann quartet Mr. Nikisch sustained the piano part, and did so in a manner which showed him to be as good a performer as he is a conductor. A very agreeable feature of the concert was the intelligent and expressive singing of Mrs. Nikisch, who was heard in Franz' "Stille Sicherheit," Schumann's "Provencalishes Lied," and "Auftraye," Bizet's "Pastorale," Godard's "Chanson de Florian," and Delibes' "Bonjour, Sazon." Mrs. Nikisch has an attractive personality and is a sympathetic and accomplished singer.

Clipping from POST, Washington, D. C.

Date 4/29

Symphony Concert To-night.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concerts always prove occasions of rare musical enjoyment, will close their series at Lincoln Music Hall this evening. The orchestra will have the assistance of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, a pianiste of high repute, and Mr. Anton Hekking, 'cellist in solo numbers. A fine programme is promised, closing with the Beethoven Eroica Symphony.

Clipping from [illegible]

Date 4/29

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Last of the Series—Works by Living Composers.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Grchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, took place last evening at the Concordia Opera House. With but one exception (Weber) the programme consisted of selections from the works of living composers (Brahms, Tschaipowsky, Benjamin Godard). Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon," the first number on the programme, is too well known to need comment. The soloist of the evening was Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianiste, of London fame. Mme. Hopekirk played Tschaipowsky's concerto for piano No. 1 in B flat minor, a work which is very much what the Germans fitly term "undankbar."

If under this disadvantage a pianist may nevertheless present the work in a more than acceptable shape, and in consequence be compelled to appear twice, much praise must be accorded to the soloist. Regularity and precision in the most rapid runs and certainly in presentation are the most conspicuous characteristics of her style of playing. The next number consisted of the third and fourth selections from the "Symphonic Orientale" of Benjamin Godard. The selections are entitled "Le Reve de la Nikia" (Persia) and "Sara la Baigneuse" (Greece). These selections together with three others, "Les Elephants" (Arabia), "Chinoiserie" (China), "Marche Turque" (Turkey), form the symphony, which is evidently an attempt to depict the national characteristics of the five representative oriental races. His style is bizarre in the extreme. He brings together all sorts of heterogeneous matter, making thereby an inconsistent mixture of all styles and lending to his works rather a cosmopolitan character than a definite, independent individuality. Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major served as the conclusion to the concert. Whereas the first is full of passion and unrest almost as clearly as Beethoven's C minor symphony, the second is remarkable for cheerfulness, repose and almost pastorial simplicity. The concert proved to be a fitting close to this most successful series. It is the intention to give six concerts next season.

Lybrand—Renner.

LEADER, Cleveland, O.

Date 5-2

The Great Concert To-Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives the closing concert of the Star Course for the season at Music Hall to-night, offers a programme of unusual excellence. It includes the Oberon overture, the Grieg suite, "Peer Gynt," the Schumann Symphony No. 1, besides songs by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and a violin solo by T. Adamowski. As is known by most of the readers of the LEADER, this great body of seventy musicians is one of the finest orchestras in the world, and brings to Cleveland the same grandeur of programme and perfection of playing which have made their Boston season of forty-eight concerts famous. This is at the same time a compliment and a great treat, which, though furnished at very great expense, will be appreciated, as usual, by a crowd limited only by the capacity of the hall. General admission tickets will be sold at the door, and those who would be admitted should be on hand early.

[illegible]

5-2

No musical event of the coming weeks will be more noteworthy or more thoroughly enjoyable than the series of concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur [illegible] embraces three concerts, upon Thursday evening, May 7, Friday evening, May 8, and Saturday afternoon, May 9. The well-known superiority of this organization and the indubitable fact that in many regards it stands without a parallel among modern orchestras insures a warm reception for the band. Mr. Nikisch brings with him as soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Miss Mary Howe, who has achieved a considerable reputation as an artiste, and Messrs. Franz Kneisel and T. Adamowski, who are members of the orchestra's violin corps. The programmes are throughout of a high class and admirably varied. That for the first concert on Thursday includes Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, the "Waldweben," from "Seigfried," and Raff's symphony, No. 3. Mr. Kneisel will play the first movement of Brahms' concerto for violin, and Mrs. Nikisch will sing an aria by Raff and three songs by Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. The box-office is now open for the sale of seats.

Clipping from COURANT, Hartford, Conn.

Date 4/29

Three vocalists, who are to be heard at the May festival, had solo parts at the Boston symphony [illegible] concerts, Marie Mielke and Messrs. Rieger and Meyn. The Advertiser said on Monday of the great German soprano: "Mme. Mielke's Lenora can be warmly commended. Purity, earnestness, depth of feeling and artistic loveliness predominated in all that the artiste had to do, and a very high value must be placed upon her musical intelligence. The eloquence of her interpretation as she sang the great aria, "Thou Monstrous Fiend," and the passion and power of her singing was as near an approach to perfection in tone, taste, knowledge, sensibility and expression as it is possible to imagine."

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.

GIVING CHICAGO A TREAT.

The Symphony Orchestra Has a Successful Opening Night.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 7.—The Central Music Hall was crowded tonight with a large and brilliant audience, which cheered to the echo the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is rarely that so enthusiastic an audience is seen in this city.

The Symphony orchestra is no stranger here, and its advent is always looked forward to with much pleasure.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here and completely captivated her audience, her husband coming in for a good share of the applause when playing her piano accompaniments.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was received as an old friend, and his rendering of the Brahms concerto was much admired.

Up to this time the tour of the orchestra has been an uninterrupted march of triumph, and the outlook is more promising.

Tonight's programme was as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto cellini, op. 23.....Berlioz
Aria, The dream king and his love.....Raff
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
First movement from concerto for violin....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Waldweben from Siegfried.....Wagner
Songs with piano.
a. Die quelle.....Goldmark
b. Am ufer des manzanares.....Jensen
c. Vergebliches staendchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch
Symphony No. 3. Im walde.....Raff
In the daytime (allegro). In the twilight (largo). Dance of the dryads (allegro assai). Night: silent breath of night in the forest; entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan; break of day (allegro).

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 10.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and The Boston Singers.

At the close of the concert given by the Boston Singers' in Music Hall, last night, Mr. George L. Osgood called his society together in Bumstead Hall and announced to them that an invitation had been extended by Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Henry L. Higginson, for the Boston Singers' Society to incorporate with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the two organizations to give, in future, their concerts together. In the course of his remarks on the meaning and scope of the movement, Mr. Osgood read from a letter received by him from Mr. Higginson, the following expression of sentiment regarding the proposed change: 'It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field and we shall try to use it well." This has the true ring. The proposition met with an enthusiastic reception on the part of the chorus, and to all intents and purposes, the proposed combination may be looked upon as accomplished. The plan will probably be to give two great choral works every season, and one concert devoted to a capella music; and we presume that works essentially orchestral will be conducted by Mr. Nikisch and works distinctively choral will be conducted by Mr. Osgood. The Singers will probably be increased to two hundred or two hundred and fifty.

This is an important move in connection with our art progress in music, and will enlarge the scope of the Symphony Orchestra and add to its usefulness as an educator. No better choice could have been made than the Boston Singers, to carry out the new scheme. This body is made up of a separately drilled male chorus and a separately drilled female chorus, each of which is wholly efficient in itself, and both in combination form one of the finest mixed choruses in the country. This versatility gives the society a scope to perform choral work of every description, whether for male, female or mixed voices. Already it stands at the head of our singing societies, and we may be certain that it will attain to still higher worth under the new conditions it will be called on to meet. The selection of the Boston Singers to become a permanent element of the Symphony orchestra is a fitting and just recognition of the position won by Mr. Osgood as a choral conductor and of his worth as a musician. He has labored unceasingly and unselfishly in the cause of that branch of musical art which he represents and with an unmistakeable desire for the advancement of art rather than for the attainment of self-glory. He has worked modestly and quietly, but the results have been none the less high and successful. He has fairly earned the honor that has come to him in recognition of his deservings and of the rank to which he has attained as a choral conductor, and we congratulate both Mr. Higginson and Mr. Osgood on the combination that has been effected. A new and important interest will attach to next season's Symphony Concerts, and our music lovers will have additional reason to pride themselves on the orchestra in the enlarged sphere of usefulness that has been conferred on it.

THE CHICAGO JOURNAL.

MAY 8.

The first of a series of three big concerts was given at Central Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in the presence of a large audience. True lovers of orchestral music must have enjoyed a rare treat, because no more perfect organization of players can be found anywhere, and it gives only the very finest compositions. For instance, last night's programme contained such selections as "Benvenuto Cellini," from Berlioz, for the overture; Wagner's Waldweben from "Siegfried," and Raff's Symphony No. 3. "Im Walde." Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing was a pleasing feature of the entertainment, and Franz Kneisel's solo playing won hearty applause. Miss Lena Little will be the vocalist tonight, and following is the programme:

Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso"
Gluck.....Aria,
"I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus,"
Miss Lena Little.
Lalo.....Concerto for Violoncello
Mr. Anton Hekking
Tschaikowsky.....Andantino
and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor
Songs with piano { a. Brahms.."Wie Bist du Meine Konigin" / b. Secchi."Love Me or Not" / c. Hiller. ...."Im Maien."
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

Too much can not be said in praise of these concerts. They come as near filling the bill of high-class music as any that have yet been offered to the people of Chicago. Every player under the swing of Conductor Nikisch's baton is an artist of unquestioned rank and ability. He has to be. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a grand name in this country for superior excellence, and that name must be sustained. This they all appreciate. Nothing, therefore, could be more perfect in the line of shading and harmony than that given to these manipulators of the stringed instruments, which, under their deftly delicate touches, seem to have souls within them. The next two concerts of this engagement ought to attract big audiences.

Chicago May 8, The Times.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

At home it is called the Symphony orchestra, but as it is the only Boston orchestra known outside of that city it is to all outsiders the Boston orchestra. By the munificence of a single citizen the Bay town has been for ten years blessed with an organization which, under different conductors, has practically retained its identity during that time, and has come to be unrivaled, in this country at least, for the breadth, delicacy, brilliancy, and musical intelligence and finish of its interpretations of the best orchestral works. When it was first brought to Chicago a few years ago it did not draw the attention it merited, but that has changed materially, and now its annual visits are regarded as at least among leading musical events.

The first of the three concerts announced for this week at Central Music hall was given last evening to probably the largest audience this organization has ever drawn in Chicago. The exclusively orchestral numbers were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, the "Voices of the Forest" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Raff's "Im Walde" symphony No. 3.

The soloists were T. Adamowski—Mr. Kneisel, who was announced, being ill—who played a Saint-Saens rondo capriccioso for violin with some advance on the artistic taste and finish of style he has often shown here before. The tone he achieves is not large, but it is exquisitely smooth and clean. His bowing is very true and his execution facile and accurate.

Mrs. Nikisch, the vocalist of the evening, sang the canzonetta and aria for the page in "The Marriage of Figaro" and a group of three German songs, two of which she sang some weeks ago at the Apollo club concerts. She appeared to better advantage last night than at her former visit, but the impression left is not materially different. She is a thoroughly trained vocalist, but not a singer in a true sense. Mr. Nikisch's piano accompaniments to the German songs were delightful, the most exquisite of performances, revelations, indeed, in the art of accompanying.

It would require more space than can be given to follow the playing of the several orchestral numbers in detail. All the qualities of excellence spoken of above were present in a marked degree, and though the force was somewhat crippled by the absence, from illness, of three among the best first violinists, one could scarcely expect anything more nearly perfect in orchestral interpretation. The playing of the Berlioz overture was remarkable for wonderful precision and striking brilliancy, the fantastic phrasing and odd modulation finding sharp and confident expression, and the knightly spirit of the whole being appreciatively brought out.

The same high degree of praise may be given to the interpretation of Raff's greatest symphony. The precision achieved was well-nigh faultless, and the unity of understanding and expression no less so. The most delicate passages and the most forcible were alike achieved without any deterioration of body or quality of tone. The poetry of the work was expressed broadly and warmly, as if felt, and the uncanny character and striking climaxes of the third part were defined with great force and effect. Mr. Nikisch is given to original, sometimes bizarre, treatment of the tempo, and of shading also, but not to the material changing of the spirit of a composition, but rather to the deepening of the emphasis thereof. Perhaps an exception to this was the treatment of Wagner's "Voices of the Forest," which was technically beautifully played, superbly shaded indeed, but something about it, apparently in the tempo used, seemed to rob it of something of the bubbling joyousness of spirit which properly belongs to it. In nearly every respect, however, he shows the qualities of a great conductor, and in nothing more than his unflagging watchfulness—scarcely as much as a drum-tap passing without his apt indication—and in his grasp and insistence on perfect proportion and finish in all the countless small details that go to make up perfect orchestral playing.

The second concert will be given this evening. Miss Lena Little, a contralto very highly praised in the east, being the vocalist, and the third tomorrow afternoon, with Miss Mary Howe, a high soprano, as vocalist and Mr. Kneisel as violin soloist. Both programs have heretofore been announced in detail.

The Inter Ocean.

CHICAGO, FRIDAY MAY, 8, 1891

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed by a large and fashionable audience last evening at Central Music Hall, and its brief series of concerts promises to furnish a fitting finale to Chicago's long and interesting musical season. The patient and persistent artistic effort of this splendid body of instrumentalists, up to within a season ago won tardy recognition in this city. The latter result was attained under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Indeed it is generally recognized that his efforts came nearer developing the artistic latent strength of the orchestra, and made a more potent appeal for public commendation than his predecessor. A New York authority this season frankly admitted the superiority of this company, stating "that in some respects the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations"—a remarkable confession to come out of Gotham. The primary idea of this orchestra as an institution was to be an educator, as well as an entertainer; the programmes excellently annotated by George Wilson, the character of the selections, as well the force and finish of their rendition, and the steady growth of the concerts in popular favor, indicate that the mission is being fulfilled in a way that must be most gratifying to all concerned. It may be interesting to glance at the composition of this organization. The instrumentalists enlisted are: Fourteen first violins, 12 second violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, 6 double bass, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 1 English horn, 2 bassoons, 1 bass clarinet, 2 clarinets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 2 trumpets, 1 tympane, 1 tuba, 1 harp, 3 percussion, or 72 in all, showing no curtailment of number to save expenses in travel. As may be observed this admirably balanced organization has an instrumental strength that would have satisfied the exactions of a Berlioz, and it is handled with a skill that would gratify Wagner himself. Director Nikisch leads without reference to the printed score, and appears to dominate the entire body with his peculiar personal magnetism. All the work of last evening seemed to be permeated with a subdued enthusiasm, showing the subtle sympathy between leader and instrumentalists. It may be recalled that the first season of this organization the strength lay in its strings; there has been no loss of power in this body, while there has been corresponding growth in the other component parts, notably the wood-wind. The programme last evening was inaugurated with the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." The overture is based upon themes from the opera, and although it might be called old in years it has the leit motive that Wagner developed to such perfection plentifully introduced. The strings open the work with a broad, swift flow of solemn melody of the cardinals, followed by the counter subject based on the Celein, a tender sentimental strain. This counter-melody is then transferred to the strings, against a gently rippling accompaniment for flute, oboe, and clarinet in semi-quavers. Its treatment in this manner, which occupies a considerable space, at length brought to a tonic full close; and, after a sudden and unexpected modulation to E-flat, the Cardinal's air is repeated in this key, but with an entirely new treatment, the melody being sustained by the violoncellos and clarinets, and richly embroidered by the violins con sordini, and flute and oboe alternately. The Celeni air again modified in scope and treatment enters the composition; and so the motives play hide and seek, coming and departing with fresh elaboration and disguises, until in the climax they gain to full force of the orchestra. The fine, splendidly sustained tone, the rich and varied modulations, the general accuracy of the rendition and the precision of finish gave the orchestra a most favorable introduction. The programme originally announced that Franz Kneisel would play Brahms' first movement from concerto for violin; instead Mr. Timothi Adamowski furnished a most acceptable substitute, playing Saint Saens' Rondo Capriccioso for violin. Seldom has a Chicago audience enjoyed a more charming musical treat. The dainty and delightful melody of Saint Saens had most magnetic and finished interpretation from the graceful bow of Mr. Adamowski, meriting the enthusiasm that it aroused. The Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried" has been given here under the direction of Anton Seidel when it had the advantages of the scenic show to enhance the music, but it had an even more rare or sympathetic interpretation last evening without any such adventitious aids. This exquisite tone poem, most ingenious in its melodic construction, showed a body of instrumentale most admirably adapted to faultless mechanical rendition, yet withal endowed with a flexibility to portray its glowing lights, its darkling shadows, the music of the whispering leaves and the carol of the birds among the branches; in fact to paint the picture through the imagery of sound. The concluding orchestral feature was Raff's Symphony No. 3, an interesting selection full of variety, rich in color, cheerfully suggestive of the exhilaration of the aromatic woodlands in spring, and was most artistically and delightfully played throughout. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the handsome wife of the director, was the vocalist of the evening, and her appearance completely dissipated the impression of her appearance made under trying circumstances in the Auditorium. It was evident that the lady was free from the nervousness that so beset her on that occasion, and with a fine accompaniment did herself justice as a finished vocalist of the German school. If anything Mme. Nikisch's work as a vocalist might be characterized as too finished for the appreciation of the general public, free from all the tricks and devices that are too frequently resorted to for effect and applause. The pages' Canzonette and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" is not particularly interesting, but she sung it extremely well. Her best work, however, was in the three songs, the piano accompaniment being furnished by Mr. Nikisch, Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The songs were most charming and finished bits of vocalism and won most enthusiastic approval.

The following programme will be given tonight: Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Gluck aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus," Miss Lena Little; "Lalo," concerto for violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking; "Tschaikowsky," andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor; songs with piano, (a) Brambs, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not," (c) Hiller, "Im Maien," Miss Lena Little; Beethoven symphony No. 5 in C minor.

THE CHICAGO EVENING POST

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

The first of the three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Central Music Hall to a large and highly appreciative audience. The concert may be marked down as a remarkable treat; one of the notable events of the season. It is hardly necessary to go into an elaborate analysis of the performance of this splendid organization. It is already known to the Chicago musical public. Mr. Nikisch is himself a study in the art of conducting. He is original in his methods and perfect in his results. For absolute correctness in execution; delicacy in tone shadings and intelligence in interpretation Mr. Nikisch's players are incomparable. With all the refinement that pervades their playing there is a vigorous comprehension and a virile strength; a sentimentality that is graceful and strong and a flesh and blood tint that makes one feel the spirit of the composer. A charming feature of the concert was the "Waldweben" from Siegfried. This lovely composition never received finer treatment. The passage representing the humming, murmuring sound of quiet but busy nature was brought out in a way that is simply indescribable. And fully equal to this was that delicious symphony by Raff, "Im Walde," wherein one with something more than a dull imagination can revel with exquisite pleasure. The different movements were played with beautiful effect, the twilight and night passages being depicted with great delicacy. Indeed Mr. Nikisch seems to excel in all that requires this delicacy of touch and mentality, but not at the sacrifice of vigor and broadness.

Mr. Adamowski played Saint-Saens' rondo capriccioso for the violin in place of Mr. Kneisel, who is overcome by the grip in Detroit. Mr. Adamowski is a finished artist, and, while not noted for largeness of tone, his performance was characterized by exceeding grace.

The vocal numbers were sung by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the page's canzonetta and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" and three songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her on the piano in a most charming way. Mrs. Nikisch sang here at one of this season's Apollo Club concerts. Her timbre is not clear and her enunciation is imperfect. But she has a sympathetic quality in her voice and an earnest manner that partially compensate for these defects.

The programme for to-night's concert will include orchestral compositions by Liszt, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven. The soloists will be Anton Hekking and Miss Lena Little.

The Saturday concert will be the last. It will include three orchestral numbers by Wagner and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. Mr. Adamowski and Miss Mary Howe will be the soloists at this matinee performance.

THE DAILY NEWS.

Chicago.

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As was to have been expected, the first of the series of three concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra drew out a large and brilliant audience last evening. There was a notable proportion of professional musicians in attendance, while the entire assemblage was appreciative and responsive from the first. Mr. Nikisch's band, which has been heard in this city but once before during the last year and a half, is without question the most perfectly disciplined organization of its kind in America. Whatever may be responsible for its technical perfection is not material. The leader has had abundant opportunity to make his band unsurpassable in its peculiar way, and he has availed himself of it to the best possible purpose. The orchestra is a large one, and in the main evenly balanced, though the strings are so very strong that it would seem the brasses might be strengthened a little without danger of destroying the instrumental equation. The work of which the organization is capable is well and widely known. Delicacy of phrasing and nuance, precision of attack, and a Meissonier-like neatness and finish in handling all kinds of compositions, are chief among the characteristics upon which its reputation rests. The excessive finish is not superficial or trivial, however, and Mr. Nikisch last night again demonstrated that he can give broad and intelligent readings of complete works as well as dainty performances of isolated movements and phrases. His method of leading is admirable, his bearing reserved and his baton firm, precise and energetic. The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," the 'Forest Voices" from "Siegfried" and Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde." None of these works is a bagatelle, but each one was produced, nevertheless, with a real and complete mastery of the whole subject. The symphony was handled for the best that is in it. It is a rambling composition, classical in form and veritable "programme music" in spirit. Those passages in it which are beautiful are beautiful enough to justify a more frequent performance of the whole work. The other movements are musicianly and at the least clever. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sung a canzonette and aria from "Figaro" and some songs of Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. She was warmly received and evidently made a favorable impression upon her audience. Her work is pleasing and she sings intelligently, and it must be because her voice is utterly lacking in individual character that she cannot magnetize nor charm. She sings fairly well, but one feels that her voice is impersonal and unsympathetic. It might belong to any one else. Mr. Adamowski triumphed with his rendition of the Saint-Saens rondo, as he had a right to do. It was given with a facility, a dash and a feathery lightness that recalled Sarasate, who played it here some time ago. To-night the orchestra will render Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's great C minor symphony. Miss Lena Little will sing an aria from "Orpheus" and three little songs and Mr. Anton Hekking will play Lalo's concerto for the 'cello.

[140]

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.

GIVING CHICAGO A TREAT.

The Symphony Orchestra Has a Successful Opening Night.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 7.—The Central Music Hall was crowded tonight with a large and brilliant audience, which cheered to the echo the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It is rarely that so enthusiastic an audience is seen in this city.

The Symphony orchestra is no stranger here, and its advent is always looked forward to with much pleasure.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here and completely captivated her audience, her husband coming in for a good share of the applause when playing her piano accompaniments.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was received as an old friend, and his rendering of the Brahms concerto was much admired.

Up to this time the tour of the orchestra has been an uninterrupted march of triumph, and the outlook is more promising.

Tonight's programme was as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto cellini, op. 23.....Berlioz
Aria, The dream king and his love.....Raff
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
First movement from concerto for violin....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Waldweben from Siegfried.....Wagner
Songs with piano.
a. Die quelle.....Goldmark
b. Am ufer des manzanares.....Jensen
c. Vergebliches staendchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch
Symphony No. 3. Im walde.....Raff
In the daytime (allegro). In the twilight (largo). Dance of the dryads (allegro assai). Night: silent breath of night in the forest; entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan; break of day (allegro).

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 10.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and The Boston Singers.

At the close of the concert given by the Boston Singers' in Music Hall, last night, Mr. George L. Osgood called his society together in Bumstead Hall and announced to them that an invitation had been extended by Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Henry L. Higginson, for the Boston Singers' Society to incorporate with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the two organizations to give, in future, their concerts together. In the course of his remarks on the meaning and scope of the movement, Mr. Osgood read from a letter received by him from Mr. Higginson, the following expression of sentiment regarding the proposed change: "It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field and we shall try to use it well." This has the true ring. The proposition met with an enthusiastic reception on the part of the chorus, and to all intents and purposes, the proposed combination may be looked upon as accomplished. The plan will probably be to give two great choral works every season, and one concert devoted to a capella music; and we presume that works essentially orchestral will be conducted by Mr. Nikisch and works distinctively choral will be conducted by Mr. Osgood. The Singers will probably be increased to two hundred or two hundred and fifty.

This is an important move in connection with our art progress in music, and will enlarge the scope of the Symphony Orchestra and add to its usefulness as an educator. No better choice could have been made than the Boston Singers, to carry out the new scheme. This body is made up of a separately drilled male chorus and a separately drilled female chorus, each of which is wholly efficient in itself, and both in combination form one of the finest mixed choruses in the country. This versatility gives the society a scope to perform choral work of every description, whether for male, female or mixed voices. Already it stands at the head of our singing societies, and we may be certain that it will attain to still higher worth under the new conditions it will be called on to meet. The selection of the Boston Singers to become a permanent element of the Symphony orchestra is a fitting and just recognition of the position won by Mr. Osgood as a choral conductor and of his worth as a musician. He has labored unceasingly and unselfishly in the cause of that branch of musical art which he represents and with an unmistakeable desire for the advancement of art rather than for the attainment of self-glory. He has worked modestly and quietly, but the results have been none the less high and successful. He has fairly earned the honor that has come to him in recognition of his deservings and of the rank to which he has attained as a choral conductor, and we congratulate both Mr. Higginson and Mr. Osgood on the combination that has been effected. A new and important interest will attach to next season's Symphony Concerts, and our music lovers will have additional reason to pride themselves on the orchestra in the enlarged sphere of usefulness that has been conferred on it.

THE CHICAGO JOURNAL.

FRIDAY, MAY 8.

The first of a series of three big concerts was given at Central Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in the presence of a large audience. True lovers of orchestral music must have enjoyed a rare treat, because no more perfect organization of players can be found anywhere, and it gives only the very finest compositions. For instance, last night's programme contained such selections as "Benvenuto Cellini," from Berlioz, for the overture; Wagner's Waldweben from "Siegfried," and Raff's Symphony No. 3. "Im Walde." Mrs. Arthur Nikisch's singing was a pleasing feature of the entertainment, and Franz Kneisel's solo playing won hearty applause. Miss Lena Little will be the vocalist tonight, and following is the programme:

Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso"
Gluck.....Aria,
"I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus,"
Miss Lena Little.
Lalo.....Concerto for Violoncello
Mr. Anton Hekking
Tschaikowsky.....Andantino
and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4. in F minor
Songs with piano { a. Brahms.. "Wie Bist du Meine Konigin" / b. Secchi. "Love Me or Not" / c. Hiller.... "Im Maien."
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

Too much can not be said in praise of these concerts. They come as near filling the bill of high-class music as any that have yet been offered to the people of Chicago. Every player under the swing of Conductor Nikisch's baton is an artist of unquestioned rank and ability. He has to be. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a grand name in this country for superior excellence, and that name must be sustained. This they all appreciate. Nothing, therefore, could be more perfect in the line of shading and harmony than that given to these manipulators of the stringed instruments, which, under their deftly delicate touches, seem to have souls within them. The next two concerts of this engagement ought to attract big audiences.

***

Chicago May 8,

The Times.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

At home it is called the Symphony orchestra, but as it is the only Boston orchestra known outside of that city it is to all outsiders the Boston orchestra. By the munificence of a single citizen the Bay town has been for ten years blessed with an organization which, under different conductors, has practically retained its identity during that time, and has come to be unrivaled, in this country at least, for the breadth, delicacy, brilliancy, and musical intelligence and finish of its interpretations of the best orchestral works. When it was first brought to Chicago a few years ago it did not draw the attention it merited, but that has changed materially, and now its annual visits are regarded as at least among leading musical events.

The first of the three concerts announced for this week at Central Music hall was given last evening to probably the largest audience this organization has ever drawn in Chicago. The exclusively orchestral numbers were the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, the "Voices of the Forest" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Raff's "Im Walde" symphony No. 3.

The soloists were T. Adamowski—Mr. Kneisel, who was announced, being ill—who played a Saint-Saens rondo capriccioso for violin with some advance on the artistic taste and finish of style he has often shown here before. The tone he achieves is not large, but it is exquisitely smooth and clean. His bowing is very true and his execution facile and accurate.

Mrs. Nikisch, the vocalist of the evening, sang the canzonetta and aria for the page in "The Marriage of Figaro" and a group of three German songs, two of which she sang some weeks ago at the Apollo club concerts. She appeared to better advantage last night than at her former visit, but the impression left is not materially different. She is a thoroughly trained vocalist, but not a singer in a true sense. Mr. Nikisch's piano accompaniments to the German songs were delightful, the most exquisite of performances, revelations, indeed, in the art of accompanying.

It would require more space than can be given to follow the playing of the several orchestra numbers in detail. All the qualities of excellence spoken of above were present in a marked degree, and though the force was somewhat crippled by the absence, from illness, of three among the best first violinists, one could scarcely expect anything more nearly perfect in orchestral interpretation. The playing of the Berlioz overture was remarkable for wonderful precision and striking brilliancy, the fantastic phrasing and odd modulation finding sharp and confident expression, and the knightly spirit of the whole being appreciatively brought out.

The same high degree of praise may be given to the interpretation of Raff's greatest symphony. The precision achieved was well-nigh faultless, and the unity of understanding and expression no less so. The most delicate passages and the most forcible were alike achieved without any deterioration of body or quality of tone. The poetry of the work was expressed broadly and warmly, as if felt, and the uncanny character and striking climaxes of the third part were defined with great force and effect. Mr. Nikisch is given to original, sometimes bizarre, treatment of the tempo, and of shading also, but not to the material changing of the spirit of a composition, but rather to the deepening of the emphasis thereof. Perhaps an exception to this was the treatment of Wagner's "Voices of the Forest," which was technically beautifully played, superbly shaded indeed, but something about it, apparently in the tempo used, seemed to rob it of something of the bubbling joyousness of spirit which properly belongs to it. In nearly every respect, however, he shows the qualities of a great conductor, and in nothing more than his unflagging watchfulness—scarcely as much as a drum-tap passing without his apt indication—and in his grasp and insistence on perfect proportion and finish in all the countless small details that go to make up perfect orchestal playing.

The second concert will be given this evening, Miss Lena Little, a contralto very highly praised in the east, being the vocalist, and the third tomorrow afternoon, with Miss Mary Howe, a high soprano, as vocalist and Mr. Kneisel as violin soloist. Both programs have heretofore been announced in detail.

The Inter Ocean.

CHICAGO, FRIDAY MAY, 8, 1891

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed by a large and fashionable audience last evening at Central Music Hall, and its brief series of concerts promises to furnish a fitting finale to Chicago's long and interesting musical season. The patient and persistent artistic effort of this splendid body of instrumentalists, up to within a season ago won tardy recognition in this city. The latter result was attained under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Indeed it is generally recognized that his efforts came nearer developing the artistic latent strength of the orchestra, and made a more potent appeal for public commendation than his predecessor. A New York authority this season frankly admitted the superiority of this company, stating "that in some respects the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations"—a remarkable confession to come out of Gotham. The primary idea of this orchestra as an institution was to be an educator, as well as an entertainer; the programmes excellently annotated by George Wilson, the character of the selections, as well the force and finish of their rendition, and the steady growth of the concerts in popular favor, indicate that the mission is being fulfilled in a way that must be most gratifying to all concerned. It may be interesting to glance at the composition of this organization. The instrumentalists enlisted are: Fourteen first violins, 12 second violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, 6 double bass, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 1 English horn, 2 bassoons, 1 bass clarinet, 2 clarinets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 2 trumpets, 1 tympane, 1 tuba, 1 harp, 3 percussion, or 72 in all, showing no curtailment of number to save expenses in travel. As may be observed this admirably balanced organization has an instrumental strength that would have satisfied the exactions of a Berlioz, and it is handled with a skill that would gratify Wagner himself. Director Nikisch leads without reference to the printed score, and appears to dominate the entire body with his peculiar personal magnetism. All the work of last evening seemed to be permeated with a subdued enthusiasm, showing the subtle sympathy between leader and instrumentalists. It may be recalled that the first season of this organization the strength lay in its strings; there has been no loss of power in this body, while there has been corresponding growth in the other component parts, notably the wood-wind. The programme last evening was inaugurated with the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." The overture is based upon themes from the opera, and although it might be called old in years it has the leit motive that Wagner developed to such perfection plentifully introduced. The strings open the work with a broad, swift flow of solemn melody of the cardinals, followed by the counter subject based on the Celein, a tender sentimental strain. This counter-melody is then transferred to the strings, against a gently rippling accompaniment for flute, oboe, and clarinet in semi-quavers. Its treatment in this manner, which occupies a considerable space, is at length brought to a tonic full close; and, after a sudden and unexpected modulation to E-flat, the Cardinal's air is repeated in this key, but with an entirely new treatment, the melody being sustained by the violoncellos and clarinets, and richly embroidered by the violins con sordini, and flute and oboe alternately. The Celeni air again modified in scope and treatment enters the composition; and so the motives play hide and seek, coming and departing with fresh elaboration and disguises, until in the climax they gain to full force of the orchestra. The fine, splendidly sustained tone, the rich and varied modulations, the general accuracy of the rendition and the precision of finish gave the orchestra a most favorable introduction. The programme originally announced that Franz Kneisel would play Brahms' first movement from concerto for violin; instead Mr. Timothi Adamowski furnished a most acceptable substitute, playing Saint Saens' Rondo Capriccioso for violin. Seldom has a Chicago audience enjoyed a more charming musical treat. The dainty and delightful melody of Saint Saens had most magnetic and finished interpretation from the graceful bow of Mr. Adamowski, meriting the enthusiasm that it aroused. The Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried" has been given here under the direction of Anton Seidel when it had the advantages of the scenic show to enhance the music, but it had an even more rare or sympathetic interpretation last evening without any such adventitious aids. This exquisite tone poem, most ingenious in its melodic construction, showed a body of instrumentale most admirably adapted to faultless mechanical rendition, yet withal endowed with a flexibility to portray its glowing lights, its darkling shadows, the music of the whispering leaves and the carol of the birds among the branches; in fact to paint the picture through the imagery of sound. The concluding orchestral feature was Raff's Symphony No. 3, an interesting selection full of variety, rich in color, cheerfully suggestive of the exhilaration of the aromatic woodlands in spring, and was most artistically and delightfully played throughout. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the handsome wife of the director, was the vocalist of the evening, and her appearance completely dissipated the impression of her appearance made under trying circumstances in the Auditorium. It was evident that the lady was free from the nervousness that so beset her on that occasion, and with a fine accompaniment did herself justice as a finished vocalist of the German school. If anything Mme. Nikisch's work as a vocalist might be characterized as too finished for the appreciation of the general public, free from all the tricks and devices that are too frequently resorted to for effect and applause. The pages' Canzonette and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" is not particularly interesting, but she sung it extremely well. Her best work, however, was in the three songs, the piano accompaniment being furnished by Mr. Nikisch, Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The songs were most charming and finished bits of vocalism and won most enthusiastic approval.

The following programme will be given tonight: Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Gluck aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus," Miss Lena Little; "Lalo," concerto for violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking; "Tschaikowsky," andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor; songs with piano, (a) Brambs, "Wie bist dū meine Koenigin," (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not," (c) Hiller, "Im Maien," Miss Lena Little; Beethoven symphony No. 5 in C minor.

THE CHICAGO EVENING POST

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

The first of the three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Central Music Hall to a large and highly appreciative audience. The concert may be marked down as a remarkable treat; one of the notable events of the season. It is hardly necessary to go into an elaborate analysis of the performance of this splendid organization. It is already known to the Chicago musical public. Mr. Nikisch is himself a study in the art of conducting. He is original in his methods and perfect in his results. For absolute correctness in execution, delicacy in tone shadings and intelligence in interpretation Mr. Nikisch's players are incomparable. With all the refinement that pervades their playing there is a vigorous comprehension and a virile strength: a sentimentality that is graceful and strong and a flesh and blood tint that makes one feel the spirit of the composer. A charming feature of the concert was the "Waldweben" from Siegfried. This lovely composition never received finer treatment. The passage representing the humming, murmuring sound of quiet but busy nature was brought out in a way that is simply indescribable. And fully equal to this was that delicious symphony by Raff, "Im Walde," wherein one with something more than a dull imagination can revel with exquisite pleasure. The different movements were played with beautiful effect, the twilight and night passages being depicted with great delicacy. Indeed Mr. Nikisch seems to excel in all that requires this delicacy of touch and mentality, but not at the sacrifice of vigor and broadness.

Mr. Adamowski played Saint-Saens' rondo capriccioso for the violin in place of Mr. Kneisel, who is overcome by the grip in Detroit. Mr. Adamowski is a finished artist, and, while not noted for largeness of tone, his performance was characterized by exceeding grace.

The vocal numbers were sung by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the page's canzonetta and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" and three songs by Goldmark, Jensen and Brahms. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her on the piano in a most charming way. Mrs. Nikisch sang here at one of this season's Apollo Club concerts. Her timbre is not clear and her enunciation is imperfect. But she has a sympathetic quality in her voice and an earnest manner that partially compensate for these defects.

The programme for to-night's concert will include orchestral compositions by Liszt, Tschaikowsky and Beethoven. The soloists will be Anton Hekking and Miss Lena Little.

The Saturday concert will be the last. It will include three orchestral numbers by Wagner and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. Mr. Adamowski and Miss Mary Howe will be the soloists at this matinee performance.

THE DAILY NEWS.

Chicago.

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

As was to have been expected, the first of the series of three concerts to be given at Central Music hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra drew out a large and brilliant audience last evening. There was a notable proportion of professional musicians in attendance, while the entire assemblage was appreciative and responsive from the first. Mr. Nikisch's band, which has been heard in this city but once before during the last year and a half, is without question the most perfectly disciplined organization of its kind in America. Whatever may be responsible for its technical perfection is not material. The leader has had abundant opportunity to make his band unsurpassable in its pecular way, and he has availed himself of it to the best possible purpose. The orchestra is a large one, and in the main evenly balanced, though the strings are so very strong that it would seem the brasses might be strengthened a little without danger of destroying the instrumental equation. The work of which the organization is capable is well and widely known. Delicacy of phrasing and nuance, precision of attack, and a Meissonier-like neatness and finish in handling all kinds of compositions are chief among the characteristics upon which its reputation rests. The excessive finish is not superficial or trivial, however, and Mr. Nikisch last night again demonstrated that he can give broad and intelligent readings of complete works as well as dainty performances of isolated movements and phrases. His method of leading is admirable, his bearing reserved and his baton firm, precise and energetic. The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," the 'Forest Voices" from "Siegfried" and Raff's symphony No. 3. "Im Walde." None of these works is a bagatelle, but each one was produced, nevertheless, with a real and complete mastery of the whole subject. The symphony was handled for the best that is in it. It is a rambling composition, classical in form and veritable "programme music" in spirit. Those passages in it which are beautiful are beautiful enough to justify a more frequent performance of the whole work. The other movements are musicianly and at the least clever. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sung a canzonette and aria from "Figaro" and some songs of Goldmarck, Jensen and Brahms. She was warmly received and evidently made a favorable impression upon her audience. Her work is pleasing and she sings intelligently, and it must be because her voice is utterly lacking in individual character that she cannot magnetize nor charm. She sings fairly well, but one feels that her voice is impersonal and unsympathetic. It might belong to any one else. Mr. Adamowski triumphed with his rendition of the Saint-Saens rondo, as he had a right to do. It was given with a facility, a dash and a feathery lightness that recalled Sarasate, who played it here some time ago. To-night the orchestra will render Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony and Beethoven's great C minor symphony. Miss Lena Little will sing an aria from "Orpheus" and three little songs and Mr. Anton Hekking will play Lala's concerto for the 'cello.

[140]

THE CHICAGO HERALD

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of a series of three concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Central Music Hall. That Chicagoans bore this magnificent musical organization in kindliest remembrance was attested by the very large audience which attended the concert. The lower portions of the hall were completely filled and each number on the fine programme was applauded with enthusiasm. Since its last appearance in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, if possible, improved in its technical excellence, and the numbers given last evening were all of such high merit as to justify the opinion that the organization is the equal, if not the superior, of any similar musical body on this side of the Atlantic.

Director Arthur Nikisch is an interesting man. Rather below the medium height, slender in form, and of a nervous, high-strung temperament, he would not impress one at a glance that he could be the possessor of great ability as an orchestral leader, yet he has the most perfect control over his musicians and, under the magic of his baton, the phrasing and execution of the different instrumentalists is almost absolutely perfect. Especially did this seem the case in the opening number, Berlioz's overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and in the superb rendition of the "Waldweben" ("Voices of the Forest"), from "Siegfried," by Wagner. The exquisite tempo fully as much as the delicious melodies in the finale of the "Benvenuto" overture and the weird charm of Wagner's inspired music delighted the great audience, which clamored in vain for encores.

An orchestra of this character is necessarily most excellent in its stringed instruments, and Mr. Nikisch is especially fortunate in having violinists who seem to be thoroughly en rapport with him; the slightest signal from the director is heeded instantaneously, and the harmony is a source of delight to an audience.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is no stranger in Chicago, was welcomed in a most cordial manner. She sang charmingly the Page's Canzonetta and an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of rare quality and knows well how to use it. She does not attempt any dizzy pyrotechnic vocal flights, but sings in an easy, natural way that cannot fail to please lovers of real music. She was recalled several times, but did not respond to the encores. T. Adamowski, a violinist of fine ability, who has frequently been heard in Chicago, was the other soloist of the evening. His selection, Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriccioso, was played in brilliant and effective style, which won for the artist enthusiastic plaudits.

Wagner's "Waldweben," as given, was the concert arrangement by H. Zumpe. In its rearrangement from the opera to the concert stage it naturally underwent many changes, by the omission of dialogue, etc., so as to make it in effect an independent composition. But the scenes depicted remain the same, and it bears the impression of the master's hand and spirit. The musical arrangement is almost as picturesque as the operatic, and it shows most effectively Wagner's marvelous power to depict nature by means of musical tones. As rendered last evening, the number was the gem of the programme, and the audience fairly clamored for a repetition, which was, however, not granted.

Mrs. Nikisch sang three dainty ballads to her husband's accompaniment on the piano. They were Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Brahm's "Vergebliches Staendchen." Each was of a light, airy character, and all were pleasingly sung. Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," was the concluding number. This was the greatest of the composer's twelve symphonies, and won for Joachim Raff the rank, in the opinion of many critics, of being next after Beethoven in the treatment of themes, though he was wholly different in style from Beethoven. The symphony is a long one and is in four movements, an allegro, representing the forest in the daytime; a largo, "In the Twilight"; an allegro assai, "Dance of the Dryads," and an allegro, "The Break of Day." The symphony was given with fine effect.

The programme for to-night's concert is as follows:

Liszt, symphonic poem.....“Tasso”
Gluck, Aria, “I Have Lost My Eurydice,” from “Orpheus”.....
Lalo, concerto for violoncello.....Miss Lena Little
Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
Secchi.....Love Me or Not
Hiller.....Im Maien
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1891.

WANT TO HEAR THEM AGAIN.

Symphony Orchestra Closes an Unprecedented Engagement.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra closed their brief engagement in this city with a grand concert this afternoon, which partook much of the character of Friday afternoon rehearsals in Boston.

The majority of the audience was composed of ladies and young girls, and Central Music Hall presented a pretty sight.

The orchestra was at its best.

Miss Mary Howe and Mr. Timothee Adamowski were the soloists.

Miss Howe is so well known in Boston that it is unnecessary to say she was received here with expressions of the greatest approval.

Mr. Adamowski is a favorite wherever he goes and the solo allotted to him was played with ease and grace.

This season has been one of unprecedented success, and the return engagement next fall is already looked forward to.

The programme this afternoon was as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from Tannhaeuser (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell song from Lakme.....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Concerto, variations—Moderato molto.....
Allegro.....Saint-Saens
T. Adamowski.
Aria from Les Perles de Bresil.....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—Lohengrin.....Wagner
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey, from Siegfried and Die Goetterdaemmerung.....Wagner

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 11, 1891.

A STRONG COMBINATION.

For some time there have been rumors of a proposed consolidation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Singers, but it was not until last Saturday that Mr. George L. Osgood, the director of the latter society, announced to his singers that Mr. Henry L. Higginson had invited them to unite with the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Osgood read the following extract from a letter received from Mr. Higginson in regard to the proposed scheme: "It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field, and we shall try to use it well." The proposition was welcomed by the chorus, and the consolidation is practically an accomplished fact.

There are peculiar reasons why the Boston Singers should have been chosen for this purpose. The male chorus and the female chorus have been drilled separately, and each is capable of most excellent work. The society, under its skilled and enthusiastic leader, has made a specialty of the study of the ancient schools of all countries, and it is proposed to give every year at least one concert devoted to unaccompanied works of the great masters. While, of course, the programmes for next season have not yet been arranged, it is understood that Mr. Nikisch will conduct the orchestral works and Mr. Osgood will lead all compositions that are distinctively choral. It is rumored that the Singers will be increased to 200 or 250: but whether it would be judicious to enlarge this admirable body is a question. Quality is better than quantity.

Now that such a society as the Singers has been added to the Symphony Orchestra, the programmes of next season will be anticipated with even keener interest. The concerts given for years by the orchestra and chorus of the Paris Conservatory are a proof of what can be achieved when directors and players and singers work together in unity.

Mr. Osgood is to be congratulated, for he has now received the just reward of his labors and his high aims. He has been most faithful and untiring in work that to many would seem but drudgery. He has devoted his time and his attainments to his art, careless, apparently, of popular applause, and seeking only to nourish in his singers a love for that which is best in vocal music.

CHICAGO

The Tribune.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience last evening elegant in quality and of sufficient size to comfortably fill the best portions of Central Music Hall. Two soloists—Miss Lena Little and Mr. Anton Hekking—were heard for the first time in Chicago. Miss Little is a contralto of fine ability, who possesses a voice rich and full of warmth and feeling. She sings with an ease that is as admirable as it is rare, and enunciates the text with a clearness which makes every word, be it English, German, or Italian, perfectly distinct and intelligible. The splendid method which makes her teacher, Mr. George Henschel, one of the foremost English concert singers of today, is revealed in every tone she produces and every phrase she sings. She is a singer who for artistic method, excellent expression, and perfect control of all her powers in singing has not been surpassed by any vocalist heard in Chicago this season. Her numbers last evening were Orpheus' beautiful aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," "I have lost my Eurydice," Brahm's "Wie bist du Meine Koenigin," "Love me or not," a charming ballad by Secchi, and Hiller's joyous "Im Maien." The aria was finely given, but it was in the ballads that Miss Little appeared to finest advantage. A simplicity and entire freedom from all striving for effect made her work the perfection of ballad-singing.

Mr. Hekking's 'cello playing proved another delightful feature of the concert. He chose Lalo's D minor Concerto for 'cello, a composition full of a coloring chiefly Spanish, but at times suggestive of Hungary. The first movement is of great beauty; the second seems at times forced, and its broken, peculiar rhythms extend through the entire movement, "robbing it" of the charm it would possess if more varied in style. Mr. Hekking makes his instrument fairly sing, the tone he wins from it possessing a mellow velvety quality comparable only to the rich tones of a contralto voice. His playing is characterized by great refinement and high artistic finish. The orchestral numbers were Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Tasso," the Andantino and the Scherzo from Tschaikowski's fourth Symphony, and the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The Liszt Poem, a long and not very especially attractive piece of "program-music," was played with the technical accuracy and the firmness and strength which characterize everything the Symphony Orchestra gives. The Ferrara episode was especially praiseworthy. The Tschaikowski selections are unusually attractive and good proofs of the great Russian's genius. The Scherzo, with its ever-present pizzicato, is one of the most original "bits" he has given the world, and as played last evening was charming. Beethoven's famous Symphony was read with great vigor and spirit. The first movement gained somewhat by this dramatic style, for it is a movement troubled almost to the verge of madness, and will stand such impassioned reading, but the sad andante loses its color of pensive melancholy by the slightly faster tempo Mr. Nikisch employs, and the Scherzo is robbed of the mysterious character, which produces the emotion Berlioz has so aptly compared to that produced by the gaze of a magnetizer, by being given with too free use of the fortissimo. The magnificent march which closes the great work was triumphantly given and well expressed the feeling of superhuman joy Beethoven intended.

The last concert occurs this afternoon with the following program:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell Song from "Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—"Rustic Wedding," op. 26.....Goldmark
First movement from concerto for violin.....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil."".....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—"Lohengrin."".....Wagner
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Götterdämmerung."".....Wagner

The Times.

BY THE CHICAGO TIMES CO.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

TRIPLE-SHEET.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its three concerts at Central Music hall last evening to another large and closely attentive audience. It is well to commend these programs not only for their high musical character, but for their variety of musical significance and their balance, and as much as anything else for not being so long as to weary anybody. One goes away rather disposed to wish there were more.

The orchestral numbers last night were Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5 in C minor. One is not disposed to add much to the points of commendation made of the playing the preceding evening, its precision, its breadth and power of shading, the absolute unity of conception and purpose obvious in all the players, the revelation through apt emphasis and superb finish of the height and depth of every composition. The controlling sympathy between conductor and players is always obvious, and his watchfulness over every detail, heretofore noted, is no more conspicuous than their unswerving vigilance in catching every minute leading in his expression. He who believes that the same fundamental feeling lies at the bottom of both music and poetry will rarely find anything to enlist his sympathy, however much he may admire its ingenius technic, in Liszt's compositions. His "Tasso" is about as much like the lofty poetry of Byron, which he said inspired it, as it is like Tupper, but all that it is possible for anybody to make of it was made last night. In the fantastic pizzicato scherzo, with its curious melodic form twisted through it in almost grotesque but graceful arabesque fashion, afforded the band fresh opportunity for the display of wonderful precision and sympathetic shading. Of the interpretation of the colossal symphony of Beethoven it would be impracticable to speak adequately in detail. Its striking transitions, its bursts of passion, its passages of profound melancholy—almost despair—and the breadth and power of the tremendous climax at its close were all brought out with one insight, a grasp of its depths of meaning, an impressive alternation of delicacy and passionate energy that must have been in the nature of a revelation to many hearers. The exquisite andante especially was given bolder emphasis and a deeper, more Rembrandtesque shading than is remembered to have ever been given it here by any other director, but it served to illuminate its spirit superbly, and it was played throughout with wonderful delicacy, firmness, and poetic feeling. When it is remembered that neither Kneisel nor Adamowski were among the first violins, and that the force was short half a dozen more from illness, the finish and effectiveness of the performance throughout were extraordinary.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Lena Little, a contralto new to Chicago, who sang the great aria from the "Orpheus" of Gluck and a group of three songs—Brahms' "Wie bist du," etc., Secchi's "Love Me or Not," and Hiller's "Im Maien," and Anton Hekking, who played a solo concerto for 'cello. Miss Little challenged a rather hazardous comparison in trying the "Orpheus" aria before Chicago concert and opera goers, who have by no means forgotten Mme. Lena Hastreiter's magnificent interpretation. And she fell far short of sustaining the challenge. She sang the aria well, phrasing well and shading quite well, but she lacked the magnificent breadth of style and the splendid fire and passion of the Chicago singer. She appeared to better advantage in the songs named, though why she, an American woman, should sing to an American audience in Italian and German is inexplicable, and, one may just as well say, inexcusable. She is little only in name. She is a tall blonde of rather pleasing presence, a medium contralto voice of not very musical quality and, in its upper tones especially, badly placed, and marred by some of the vibrato noticeable in nearly all of Henschel's pupils. But she has been thoroughly trained, phrases excellently, and sings with fine artistic taste and finish. The Secchi song, the only one she sang in the American tongue, was exquisitely sung as to style, and there was the touch, if not always the feeling, of the trained artist in all she did.

The 'cello solo by Mr. Hekking hasn't much in it but execution, but he showed the qualities of the artistic player. His tone is not large nor very resonant—less so because his instrument rested on an extension of the stage resting on loose trestles, something the hall management ought to abolish—but it is singularly sweet, liquid, and mellow, his execution very facile and true, and his whole style intelligent and musicianly.

One may say in passing that another thing for which these concerts are to be warmly commended is the inflexible refusal to respond to recalls with anything more than courteous acknowledgment.

The third and last concert will be given this afternoon, with Miss Mary Howe, a high soprano, as the vocalist.

The Inter Ocean.

CHICAGO, SATURDAY MAY 9, 1891.

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Central Music Hall attracted a large and enthusiastic audience, and in point of musical interest was the equal of, possibly an advance over, its brilliant predecessor. Singers are peculiarly susceptible to climatic changes, but it appears that robust instrumentalists have their share of the ills of life from this source. The absentees last evening numbered six first violinists, one second, two cellists, and one oboe player. This would have made a most marked change in an ordinary orchestra, but this excellent organization appears to be proof against emergency, and perhaps the audience did not miss the absent ones, although the director did. Mr. Nikisch did not allow the deficit to disconcert him in the least to all outward appearance, and his magnetic personality appeared to be more potent than ever in inspiring his players to join and and guard what each desired to gain in almost perfect unity of harmony. The programme opened with the beautiful symphonic poem of Liszt, "Tasso's Lament," that the Thomas Orchestra has given here several times. The first movement was given with rare grace and artistic taste, the gondoliers melody in C minor being particularly praiseworthy. One orchestration is full of the startling effects peculiar to Liszt, and the pauses that so strongly accentuate the work showed the fine drill of this organization. The contrast between the lament and the triumph and its marked coloration, had strong and admirable treatment. Mr. Anton Hekking played Lalo's concerto for violoncello in very smooth and acceptable style without gaining particularly large or sympathetic tone. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony 4, in F minor, perhaps was in its entirety the best-played selection of the evening, the pizzicato of the violins being wonderfully well done, the harmonies of the complex movement being defined and sustained with an accuracy and beauty that won most enthusiastic approval. The feature de resistance of the programme was Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony." This was remarkably well given within the limitations, but it must be confessed that the debilitation of the orchestra strings told somewhat in the effectiveness that might otherwise have been attained. The soloist of the evening was Miss Lena Little, a contralto new to this public. She sings in excellent method, has a voice of considerable range and smoothness, free from vibrato, but inclined to be a little throaty in upper tones. Her first selection, an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," was given with considerable dramatic power and feeling. Her songs with piano accompaniment were: Brahms, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," Secchi, "Love Me or Not;" Hiller, "Im Maien." In these her phrasing was excellent, her enunciation praiseworthy. The English song was delightfully given, and won heartily applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra give the concluding concert of their engagement this afternoon. Miss Mary Howe will be the soloist, and the following programme is announced: Wagner, overture and bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" (Paris version); Delibes, Bell song from "Lakme," Miss Mary Howe; Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26; Saint-Saens, Rondo Capriccioso, for violin, Mr. T. Adamowski; David, aria from "Les Perles de Bresil," Miss Mary Howe; Wagner, prelude, 'Lohengrin;" Wagner, "Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Arranged by Hans Richter.

THE CHICAGO HERALD

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Central Music Hall last evening before a large and brilliant audience of music-lovers. The programme offered was fully equal in character to that of the opening night and the audience was in no wise disappointed in its anticipation of a rare treat.

The first number was Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," which was charmingly rendered with that perfection of detail which characterizes all of Director Nikisch's productions. In harmony, nicety of balance in instrumentation and phrasing this fine organization is probably unequaled in America. Miss Lena Little, the vocal soloist of the evening, followed with the aria, "I Have Lost My Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Miss Little has a sweet, even, well modulated and well cultivated voice, but in the "Orpheus" aria she failed to arouse much enthusiasm. She appeared to much better advantage in the pretty ballads of her subsequent number—Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Koenigen;" Secchi's "Love Me or Not," and Hiller's "Im Maien"—all three of which she sang in exquisite style.

Lalo's concerto for violoncello, as played by Anton Hekking, was the gem of the evening. Mr. Hekking is certainly one of the most thorough artists on this instrument who has appeared in Chicago. His playing was enthusiastically applauded Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor, were the other instrumental numbers. Both were interpreted in superb style, the wonderful Fifth Symphony being particularly charming.

The programme for to-day's matinee, the last of the series of concerts by this organization, is as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhæuser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell song from "Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—"Rustic Wedding," op. 26....Goldmark
Rondo capriccioso, for violin.....Saint-Seans
T. Adamowski.
Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil".....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—"Lohengrin".....Wagner
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)

[141]

THE CHICAGO HERALD

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1891.

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of a series of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Central Music Hall. That Chicagoans bore this magnificent musical organization in kindliest remembrance was attested by the very large audience which attended the concert. The lower portions of the hall were completely filled and each number on the fine programme was applauded with enthusiasm. Since its last appearance in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, if possible, improved in its technical excellence, and the numbers given last evening were all of such high merit as to justify the opinion that the organization is the equal, if not the superior, of any similar musical body on this side of the Atlantic.

Director Arthur Nikisch is an interesting man. Rather below the medium height, slender in form, and of a nervous, high-strung temperament, he would not impress one at a glance that he could be the possessor of great ability as an orchestral leader, yet he has the most perfect control over his musicians and, under the magic of his baton, the phrasing and execution of the different instrumentalists is almost absolutely perfect. Especially did this seem the case in the opening number, Berlioz's overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and in the superb rendition of the "Waldweben" ("Voices of the Forest"), from "Siegfried," by Wagner. The exquisite tempo fully as much as the delicious melodies in the finale of the "Benvenuto" overture and the weird charm of Wagner's inspired music delighted the great audience, which clamored in vain for encores.

An orchestra of this character is necessarily most excellent in its stringed instruments, and Mr. Nikisch is especially fortunate in having violinists who seem to be thoroughly en rapport with him; the slightest signal from the director is heeded instantaneously, and the harmony is a source of delight to an audience.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is no stranger in Chicago, was welcomed in a most cordial manner. She sang charmingly the Page's Canzonetta and an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of rare quality and knows well how to use it. She does not attempt any dizzy pyrotechnic vocal flights, but sings in an easy, natural way that cannot fail to please lovers of real music. She was recalled several times, but did not respond to the encores. T. Adamowski, a violinist of fine ability, who has frequently been heard in Chicago, was the other soloist of the evening. His selection, Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriccioso, was played in brilliant and effective style, which won for the artist enthusiastic plaudits.

Wagner's "Waldweben," as given, was the concert arrangement by H. Zumpe. In its rearrangement from the opera to the concert stage it naturally underwent many changes, by the omission of dialogue, etc., so as to make it in effect an independent composition. But the scenes depicted remain the same, and it bears the impression of the master's hand and spirit. The musical arrangement is almost as picturesque as the operatic, and it shows most effectively Wagner's marvelous power to depict nature by means of musical tones. As rendered last evening, the number was the gem of the programme, and the audience fairly clamored for a repetition, which was, however, not granted.

Mrs. Nikisch sang three dainty ballads to her husband's accompaniment on the piano. They were Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Brahm's "Vergebliches Staendchen." Each was of a light, airy character, and all were pleasingly sung. Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," was the concluding number. This was the greatest of the composer's twelve symphonies, and won for Joachim Raff the rank, in the opinion of many critics, of being next after Beethoven in the treatment of themes, though he was wholly different in style from Beethoven. The symphony is a long one and is in four movements, an allegro, representing the forest in the daytime; a largo, "In the Twilight"; an allegro assai, "Dance of the Dryads," and an allegro, "The Break of Day." The symphony was given with fine effect.

The programme for to-night's concert is as follows:

Liszt, symphonic poem.....“Tasso”
Gluck, Aria, “I Have Lost My Eurydice,” from “Orpheus”.....Miss Lena Little
Lalo, concerto for violoncello.....Anton Hekking
Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
Secchi.....Love Me or Not
Hiller.....Im Maien
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 10, 1891.

WANT TO HEAR THEM AGAIN.

Symphony Orchestra Close an Unprecedented Engagement.

CHICAGO, Ill., May 9.—The Boston Symphony orchestra closed their brief engagement in this city with a grand concert this afternoon, which partook much of the character of Friday afternoon rehearsals in Boston.

The majority of the audience was composed of ladies and young girls, and Central Music Hall presented a pretty sight.

The orchestra was at its best.

Miss Mary Howe and Mr. Timothee Adamowski were the soloists.

Miss Howe is so well known in Boston that it is unnecessary to say she was received here with expressions of the greatest approval.

Mr. Adamowski is a favorite wherever he goes and the solo allotted to him was played with ease and grace.

The season has been one of unprecedented success and the return engagement next fall is already looked forward to.

The programme this afternoon was as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from Tannhaeuser (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell song from Lakme.....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony, Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations—Moderato molto.
Rydal song—Allegretto.
[illegible] garden—Andantio.
[illegible]—Finale, allegro molto.
Rondo capriccioso, for violin.....Saint-Saens
T. Adamowski.
Aria from “Les Perles de Bresil”.....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—“Lohengrin.”.....Wagner
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 11, 1891.

A STRONG COMBINATION.

For some time there have been rumors of a proposed consolidation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Singers, but it was not until last Saturday that Mr. George L. Osgood, the director of the latter society, announced to his singers that Mr. Henry L. Higginson had invited them to unite with the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Osgood read the following extract from a letter received from Mr. Higginson in regard to the proposed scheme: “It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field, and we shall try to use it well.” The proposition was welcomed by the chorus, and the consolidation is practically an accomplished fact.

There are peculiar reasons why the Boston Singers should have been chosen for this purpose. The male chorus and the female chorus have been drilled separately, and each is capable of most excellent work. The society, under its skilled and enthusiastic leader, has made a specialty of the study of the ancient schools of all countries, and it is proposed to give every year at least one concert devoted to unaccompanied works of the great masters. While, of course, the programmes for next season have not yet been arranged, it is understood that Mr. Nikisch will conduct the orchestral works and Mr. Osgood will lead all compositions that are distinctively choral. It is rumored that the Singers will be increased to 200 or 250; but whether it would be judicious to enlarge this admirable body is a question. Quality is better than quantity.

Now that such a society as the Singers has been added to the Symphony Orchestra, the programmes of next season will be anticipated with even keener interest. The concerts given for years by the orchestra and chorus of the Paris Conservatory are a proof of what can be achieved when directors and players and singers work together in unity.

Mr. Osgood is to be congratulated, for he has now received the just reward of his labors and his high aims. He has been most faithful and untiring in work that to many would seem but drudgery. He has devoted his time and his attainments to his art, careless, apparently, of popular applause, and seeking only to nourish in his singers a love for that which is best in vocal music.

4 CHICAGO The Tribune.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience last evening elegant in quality and of sufficient size to comfortably fill the best portions of Central Music Hall. Two soloists—Miss Lena Little and Mr. Anton Hekking—were heard for the first time in Chicago. Miss Little is a contralto of fine ability, who possesses a voice rich and full of warmth and feeling. She sings with an ease that is as admirable as it is rare, and enunciates the text with a clearness which makes every word, be it English, German, or Italian, perfectly distinct and intelligible. The splendid method which makes her teacher, Mr. George Henschel, one of the foremost English concert singers of today, is revealed in every tone she produces and every phrase she sings. She is a singer who for artistic method, excellent expression, and perfect control of all her powers in singing has not been surpassed by any vocalist heard in Chicago this season. Her numbers last evening were Orpheus' beautiful aria from Gluck's “Orpheus,” “I have lost my Eurydice,” Brahm's “Wie bist du Meine Koenigin,” “Love me or not,” a charming ballad by Secchi, and Hiller's joyous “Im Maien.” The aria was finely given, but it was in the ballads that Miss Little appeared to finest advantage. A simplicity and entire freedom from all striving for effect made her work the perfection of ballad-singing.

Mr. Hekking's 'cello playing proved another delightful feature of the concert. He chose Lalo's D minor Concerto for 'cello, a composition full of a coloring chiefly Spanish, but at times suggestive of Hungary. The first movement is of great beauty; the second seems at times forced, and its broken, peculiar rhythms extend through the entire movement, “robbing it” of the charm it would possess if more varied in style. Mr. Hekking makes his instrument fairly sing, the tone he wins from it possessing a mellow velvety quality comparable only to the rich tones of a contralto voice. His playing is characterized by great refinement and high artistic finish. The orchestral numbers were Liszt's Symphonic Poem “Tasso,” the Andantino and the Scherzo from Tschaikowski's fourth Symphony, and the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The Liszt Poem, a long and not very especially attractive piece of “program-music,” was played with the technical accuracy and the firmness and strength which characterize everything the Symphony Orchestra gives. The Ferrara episode was especially praiseworthy. The Tschaikowski selections are unusually attractive and good proofs of the great Russian's genius. The Scherzo, with its ever-present pizzicato, is one of the most original “bits” he has given the world, and as played last evening was charming. Beethoven's famous Symphony was read with great vigor and spirit. The first movement gained somewhat by this dramatic style, for it is a movement troubled almost to the verge of madness, and will stand such impassioned reading, but the sad andante loses its color of pensive melancholy by the slightly faster tempo Mr. Nikisch employs, and the Scherzo is robbed of the mysterious character, which produces the emotion Berlioz has so aptly compared to that produced by the gaze of a magnetizer, by being given with too free use of the fortissimo. The magnificent march which closes the great work was triumphantly given and well expressed the feeling of superhuman joy Beethoven intended.

The last concert occurs this afternoon with the following program:

Overture and Bacchanale from “Tannhauser” (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell Song from “Lakme”.....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—“Rustic Wedding,” op. 26.....Goldmark
First movement from concerto for violin.....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Aria from “Les Perles de Bresil.”.....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—“Lohengrin.”.....Wagner
“Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey,” from “Siegfried” and “Die Götterdammerung.”.....Wagner

The Times.

BY THE CHICAGO TIMES CO.

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

TRIPLE-SHEET

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the second of its three concerts at Central Music hall last evening to another large and closely attentive audience. It is well to commend these programs not only for their high musical character, but for their variety of musical significance and their balance, and as much as anything else for not being so long as to weary anybody. One goes away rather disposed to wish there were more.

The orchestral numbers last night were Liszt's symphonic poem, “Tasso,” two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5 in C minor. One is not disposed to add much to the points of commendation made of the playing the preceding evening, its precision, its breadth and power of shading, the absolute unity of conception and purpose obvious in all the players, the revelation through apt emphasis and superb finish of the height and depth of every composition. The controlling sympathy between conductor and players is always obvious, and his watchfulness over every detail, heretofore noted, is no more conspicuous than their unswerving vigilance in catching every minute leading in his expression. He who believes that the same fundamental feeling lies at the bottom of both music and poetry will rarely find anything to enlist his sympathy, however much he may admire its ingenius technic, in Liszt's compositions. His “Tasso” is about as much like the lofty poetry of Byron, which he said inspired it, as it is like Tupper, but all that it is possible for anybody to make of it was made last night. In the fantastic pizzicato scherzo, with its curious melodic form twisted through it in almost grotesque but graceful arabesque fashion, afforded the band fresh opportunity for the display of wonderful precision and sympathetic shading. Of the interpretation of the colossal symphony of Beethoven it would be impracticable to speak adequately in detail. Its striking transitions, its bursts of passion, its passages of profound melancholy—almost despair—and the breadth and power of the tremendous climax at its close were all brought out with one insight, a grasp of its depths of meaning, an impressive alternation of delicacy and passionate energy that must have been in the nature of a revelation to many hearers. The exquisite andante especially was given bolder emphasis and a deeper, more Rembrandtesque shading than is remembered to have ever been given it here by any other director, but it served to illuminate its spirit superbly, and it was played throughout with wonderful delicacy, firmness, and poetic feeling. When it is remembered that neither Kneisel nor Adamowski were among the first violins, and that the force was short half a dozen more from illness, the finish and effectiveness of the performance throughout were extraordinary.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Lena Little, a contralto new to Chicago, who sang the great aria from the “Orpheus” of Gluck and a group of three songs—Brahms' “Wie bist du,” etc., Secchi's “Love Me or Not,” and Hiller's “Im Maien,” and Anton Hekking, who played a solo concerto for 'cello. Miss Little challenged a rather hazardous comparison in trying the “Orpheus” aria before Chicago concert and opera goers, who have by no means forgotten Mme. Lena Hastreiter's magnificent interpretation. And she fell far short of sustaining the challenge. She sang the aria well, phrasing well and shading quite well, but she lacked the magnificent breadth of style and the splendid fire and passion of the Chicago singer. She appeared to better advantage in the songs named, though why she, an American woman, should sing to an American audience in Italian and German is inexplicable, and, one may just as well say, inexcusable. She is little only in name. She is a tall blonde of rather pleasing presence, a medium contralto voice of not very musical quality and, in its upper tones especially, badly placed, and marred by some of the vibrato noticeable in nearly all of Henschel's pupils. But she has been thoroughly trained, phrases excellently, and sings with fine artistic taste and finish. The Secchi song, the only one she sang in the American tongue, was exquisitely sung as to style, and there was the touch, if not always the feeling, of the trained artist in all she did.

The 'cello solo by Mr. Hekking hasn't much in it but execution, but he showed the qualities of the artistic player. His tone is not large nor very resonant—less so because his instrument rested on an extension of the stage resting on loose trestles, something the hall management ought to abolish—but it is singularly sweet, liquid, and mellow, his execution very facile and true, and his whole style intelligent and musicianly.

One may say in passing that another thing for which these concerts are to be warmly commended is the inflexible refusal to respond to recalls with anything more than courteous acknowledgment.

The third and last concert will be given this afternoon, with Miss Mary Howe, a high soprano, as the vocalist.

The Inter Ocean.

CHICAGO, SATURDAY MAY, 9, 1891

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Central Music Hall attracted a large and enthusiastic audience, and in point of musical interest was the equal of, possibly an advance over, its brilliant predecessor. Singers are peculiarly susceptible to climatic changes, but it appears that robust instrumentalists have their share of the ills of life from this source. The absentees last evening numbered six first violinists, one second, two cellists, and one oboe player. This would have made a most marked change in an ordinary orchestra, but this excellent organization appears to be proof against emergency, and perhaps the audience did not miss the absent ones, although the director did. Mr. Nikisch did not allow the deficit to disconcert him in the least to all outward appearance, and his magnetic personality appeared to be more potent than ever in inspiring his players to join and and guard what each desired to gain in almost perfect unity of harmony. The programme opened with the beautiful symphonic poem of Liszt, “Tasso's Lament,” that the Thomas Orchestra has given here several times. The first movement was given with rare grace and artistic taste, the gondoliers melody in C minor being particularly praiseworthy. One orchestration is full of the startling effects peculiar to Liszt, and the pauses that so strongly accentuate the work showed the fine drill of this organization. The contrast between the lament and the triumph and its marked coloration, had strong and admirable treatment. Mr. Anton Hekking played Lalo's concerto for violoncello in very smooth and acceptable style without gaining particularly large or sympathetic tone. The two movements from Tschaikowsky's symphony 4, in F minor, perhaps was in its entirety the best-played selection of the evening, the pizzicato of the violins being wonderfully well done, the harmonies of the complex movement being defined and sustained with an accuracy and beauty that won most enthusiastic approval. The feature de resistance of the programme was Beethoven's “Fifth Symphony.” This was remarkably well given within the limitations, but it must be confessed that the debilitation of the orchestra strings told somewhat in the effectiveness that might otherwise have been attained. The soloist of the evening was Miss Lena Little, a contralto new to this public. She sings in excellent method, has a voice of considerable range and smoothness, free from vibrato, but inclined to be a little throaty in upper tones. Her first selection, an aria from Gluck's “Orpheus,” was given with considerable dramatic power and feeling. Her songs with piano accompaniment were: Brahms, “Wie bist du meine Koenigin,” Secchi, “Love Me or Not;” Hiller, “Im Maien.” In these her phrasing was excellent, her enunciation praiseworthy. The English song was delightfully given, and won heartily applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra give the concluding concert of their engagement this afternoon. Miss Mary Howe will be the soloist, and the following programme is announced: Wagner, overture and bacchanale from “Tannhaeuser” (Paris version); Delibes, Bell song from “Lakme,” Miss Mary Howe; Goldmark, symphony, “Rustic Wedding,” op. 26; Saint-Saens, Rondo Capriccioso, for violin, Mr. T. Adamowski; David, aria from “Les Perles de Bresil,” Miss Mary Howe; Wagner, prelude, ‘Lohengrin;” Wagner, “Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey,” from “Siegfried” and “Die Goetterdaemmerung.” Arranged by Hans Richter.

THE CHICAGO HERALD

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Central Music Hall last evening before a large and brilliant audience of music-lovers. The programme offered was fully equal in character to that of the opening night and the audience was in no wise disappointed in its anticipation of a rare treat.

The first number was Liszt's symphonic poem, “Tasso,” which was charmingly rendered with that perfection of detail which characterizes all of Director Nikisch's productions. In harmony, nicety of balance in instrumentation and phrasing this fine organization is probably unequaled in America. Miss Lena Little, the vocal soloist of the evening, followed with the aria, “I Have Lost My Eurydice,” from Gluck's “Orpheus.” Miss Little has a sweet, even, well modulated and well cultivated voice, but in the “Orpheus” aria she failed to arouse much enthusiasm. She appeared to much better advantage in the pretty ballads of her subsequent number—Brahms' “Wie bist du meine Koenigen;” Secchi's “Love Me or Not,” and Hiller's “Im Maien”—all three of which she sang in exquisite style.

Lalo's concerto for violoncello, as played by Anton Hekking, was the gem of the evening. Mr. Hekking is certainly one of the most thorough artists on this instrument who has appeared in Chicago. His playing was enthusiastically applauded Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo, from Symphony No. 4, in F minor, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor, were the other instrumental numbers. Both were interpreted in superb style, the wonderful Fifth Symphony being particularly charming.

The programme for to-day's matinee, the last of the series of concerts by this organization, is as follows:

Overture and Bacchanale from “Tannhæuser” (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell song from “Lakme”.....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—“Rustic Wedding,” op. 26.....Goldmark
Rondo capriccioso, for violin.....Saint-Seans
T. Adamowski.
Aria from “Les Perles de Bresil”.....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—“Lohengrin”.....Wagner
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)

[141]

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MAY 12.

ON THEIR WAY HOME.

The Symphony Orchestra Stops Over in Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI, O., May 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared here this evening at the Odeon, and repeated their success of last year.

Although laboring under some disadvantage, some of the members being ill, the performance was an excellent one.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist, and her first appearance here was a great success.

The programme was as follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, B flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Mozart..Canzonetta, and Page's Aria, from the Marriage of Figaro.
Tschaikowsky..Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano.
a. Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
b. Secchi.....Love me or not
c. Hiller.....Im Maien
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Wagner.....Prelude, Lohengrin
Wagner.....Prelude, Tristan and Isolde
Wagner.....Prelude, Die Meistersinger

Clipping from
TIMES, New York, N. Y.
Date 5-11

BOSTON MUSICAL COMBINATION.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND THE SINGERS.

BOSTON, May 10.—For some time there have been rumors of a proposed consolidation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Singers, but it was not until Saturday that Mr. George L. Osgood the director of the latter society, announced to his singers that Mr. Henry I. Higginson had invited them to unite with the Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Osgood read the following extract from a letter received from Mr. Higginson in regard to the proposed scheme:

"It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra, and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field, and we shall try to use it well."

The proposition was welcomed by the chorus, and the consolidation is practically an accomplished fact. There are peculiar reasons why the Boston Singers should have been chosen for this purpose. The male chorus and the female chorus have been drilled separately, and each is capable of most excellent work. The society, under its skilled and enthusiastic leader, has made a specialty of the study of the ancient schools of all countries, and it is proposed to give every year, at least, one concert devoted to unaccompanied works of the great masters. While, of course, the programmes for next season have not yet been arranged, it is understood that Mr. Nikisch will conduct the orchestral works, and Mr. Osgood will lead all compositions that are distinctively choral.

It is rumored that the Singers will be increased to 200 or 250; but whether it would be judicious to enlarge this admirable body is a question. Quality is better than quantity. Now that such a society as the Singers has been added to the Symphony Orchestra, the programmes of next season will be anticipated with even keener interest. The concerts given for years by the orchestra and chorus of the Paris Conservatory are a proof of what can be achieved when directors and players and singers work together in unity. Mr. Osgood is to be congratulated, for he has now received the best reward of his labors and his high aims.

Clipping from
EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/7

Arthur Nikisch, the young Hungarian conductor under whose direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra has reached its present eminence, is a striking and interesting figure in the musical world. After several unsuccessful efforts the management of the orchestra induced him to come to America to assume the position made vacant by the retirement of Mr. Gericke two years ago. Though but thirty-five years of age, his brilliant career had already won for him a high place among the leading European conductors. In early childhood he showed extraordinary talent, which decided his parents to give him a thorough musical education. He soon mastered the violin and at an unusually early age he was accepted as a pupil in the Royal Conservatory at Vienna. After eight years' hard work under the best instructors he graduated with high honors, being awarded the first prize for violin playing and composition. He then secured a position as first violin in the Royal Opera, where, under such magnificent instructors as Richter and Jahn, he received the best possible practical instruction in conducting. Leaving the orchestra in 1878, he was engaged by the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, as conductor of the opera at Leipzic, where he remained until his departure for America.

Under his direction the orchestra of the Leipzic Opera gained a reputation which entitles it to an equal if not superior place to the Gewandhaus Orchestra. Nikisch also distinguished himself by giving many successful concerts in Leipzic, more especially in those of the famous Liszt Society. His European successes have been more than duplicated since his arrival in this country. His present position gives him the fullest opportunity for the display of his rare abilities unhampered by any considerations save those of reaching the highest artistic excellence. His interpretations of standard works, while not always strictly according to tradition, are always strikingly interesting and effective. He represents the progressive element in the best sense and his programmes are always open to the worthiest music of whatever school.

Clipping from
Free Press Detroit, Mich.
Date May 10

Musical Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Ann Arbor Tuesday evening drew an audience of 2,500. Competent musical authorities speak in the highest terms of the work of the orchestra

Clipping from
NEWS, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

The second of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts called a large and demonstrative audience to Central Music hall last evening. All the numbers rendered were received with a cordiality and approval rather uncommon in concert audiences. The programme was varied and, on the whole, satisfactory, both in selection and in arrangement. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with which it opened, is a somber work, with a leaden melancholy oppressing the first movements and one sonorous clash of triumph at the end. It was last produced here by Mr. Thomas' orchestra several seasons ago. The Tschaikowsky symphony No. 4, two movements of which were brilliantly rendered last night, is a pleasanter order of music. The themes in the andantino especially are worked out with wonderful delicacy. The scherzo, which is a pizzicato movement for the strings with a staccato accompaniment throughout the rest of the orchestra, was given last night with extraordinary neatness, the strings picking out the melody with incredible deftness, and—what is much more remarkable—with true intonation and a good quality of tone. The work of the evening, Beethoven's great C minor symphony, was handled as Mr. Nikisch handles all his productions—with artistic taste and care. In view of the very recent production of the same work here by the Thomas orchestra the production had a curious interest for those who care to draw comparisons. A verdict in favor of one or the other performances, however, would be largely a matter of individual taste. Both were great productions, and that is enough for the music-lover. In certain respects of precision and refinement Mr. Nikisch's reading is, of course, unsurpassable. He leads—as he plays accompaniments—like a virtuoso, and, so far as refinement may go, the result is perfection. Last night he did not see fit to depart radically from conventional standards, although the tempo taken in one or two of the movements was not that usually adopted. Mr. Anton Hekking gave Lalo's beautiful violoncello concerto—a work new to Chicago audiences—delightfully. Miss Lena Little, a lady with a pleasing sonorous voice and an artistic method, sung the time-honored aria "I Have Lost My Eurydice" very well, and three little songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller very much better. The programme for the third and last concert to be given this afternoon is, for variety and popular interest, the best of the series. It embraces the overture and bacchanale (Paris version) from "Tannhaeuser," Goldmarck's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, recently played here by the Thomas orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Richter's arrangement of "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Miss Mary Howe, a vocalist of some repute, will sing the "Bell Song" from Delibes' "Lakme" and an an aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." Mr. Adamowski will give Saint-Saens' rondo for violin

Clipping from JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

The second symphony concert at Central Music Hall last night was well attended by people who fully enjoyed the fine music. In addition to the orchestra's splendid work there was great pleasure in listening to the vocal efforts of Miss Lena Little, a singer never before heard in Chicago, and the cello playing of Mr. Anton Kekking. Miss Little is possessed of a pleasing contralto voice, and makes an attractive appearance. Her rendition of such selections as "Orpheus," an aria from Gluck; "Love Me or Not," a ballad, and numbers in German, were warmly received. It is not necessary to repeat what has already been said about the orchestra's playing, and what all lovers of orchestral music know so well. A matinee this afternoon, at which Miss Mary Howe was the soloist, closed the series. Following is the programme that was given:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell Song from "Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—"Rustic Wedding," op. 26.....Goldmark
First movement from concerto for violin.....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil".....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—"Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung".....Wagner

Clipping from Mail Chicago Ill.
Date 5/8

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Central Music hall last night attracted a large and musically cultivated audience. The orchestra is well known in Chicago, its annual visits for the last few years having familiarized it to the music-lovers of the city.

The program last night was changed in some slight degree from that originally announced. Mr. Kneisel being ill T. Adamowski took his place, rendering St. Saens' rondo capriccioso for the violin. Page's canzonetta and an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" was sung by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch instead of Raff's aria "The Dream King and His Love." Mrs. Nikisch's voice is sweet and possesses notably sympathetic qualities. Both in the number just quoted and in a group of three German songs she delighted the audience. Mr. Adamowski showed admirable technique in a brilliant composition of St. Saens. The purely orchestral numbers were Berlioz' overture to Benvenuto Cellini, "The Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde." In all the orchestra showed a high degree of excellence, indicating a lofty standard of individual excellence among the musicians, reenforced by careful and artistic orchestral discipline. The program for tonight will be:

Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso"
Gluck.....Aria from "Orpheus"
"I Have Lost My Eurydice."
Miss Lena Little.
Lalo.....Concerto for violoncello
Anton Hekking.
Tschaikowsky.....Andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor
Songs with piano
a. Brahms....."Wie Bist Du, Meine Koenigin"
b. Secchi..."Love Me or Not"
c. Hiller....."Im Maien"
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5 in C minor

Clipping from
HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/8

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of a series of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Central Music Hall. That Chicagoans bore this magnificent musical organization in kindliest remembrance was attested by the very large audience which attended the concert. The lower portions of the hall were completely filled and each number on the fine programme was applauded with enthusiasm. Since its last appearance in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, if possible, improved in its technical excellence, and the numbers given last evening were all of such high merit as to justify the opinion that the organization is the equal, if not the superior, of any similar musical body on this side of the Atlantic.

Director Arthur Nikisch is an interesting man. Rather below the medium height, slender in form, and of a nervous, high-strung temperament, he would not impress one at a glance that he could be the possessor of great ability as an orchestral leader, yet he has the most perfect control over his musicians and, under the magic of his baton, the phrasing and execution of the different instrumentalists is almost absolutely perfect. Especially did this seem the case in the opening number, Berlioz's overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and in the superb rendition of the "Waldweben" ("Voices of the Forest"), from "Siegfried," by Wagner. The exquisite tempo fully as much as the delicious melodies in the finale of the "Benvenuto" overture and the weird charm of Wagner's inspired music delighted the great audience, which clamored in vain for encores.

An orchestra of this character is necessarily most excellent in its stringed instruments, and Mr. Nikisch is especially fortunate in having violinists who seem to be thoroughly en rapport with him; the slightest signal from the director is heeded instantaneously, and the harmony is a source of delight to an audience.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is no stranger in Chicago, was welcomed in a most cordial manner. She sang charmingly the Page's Canzonetta and an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of rare quality and knows well how to use it. She does not attempt any dizzy pyrotechnic vocal flights, but sings in an easy, natural way that cannot fail to please lovers of real music. She was recalled several times, but did not respond to the encores. T. Adamowski, a violinist of fine ability, who has frequently been heard in Chicago, was the other soloist of the evening. His selection, Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriccioso, was played in brilliant and effective style, which won for the artist enthusiastic plaudits.

Wagner's "Waldweben," as given, was the concert arrangement by H. Zumpe. In its rearrangement from the opera to the concert stage it naturally underwent many changes, by the omission of dialogue, etc., so as to make it in effect an independent composition. But the scenes depicted remain the same, and it bears the impression of the master's hand and spirit. The musical arrangement is almost as picturesque as the operatic, and it shows most effectively Wagner's marvelous power to depict nature by means of musical tones. As rendered last evening, the number was the gem of the programme, and the audience fairly clamored for a repetition, which was, however, not granted.

Mrs. Nikisch sang three dainty ballads to her husband's accompaniment on the piano. They were Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Brahm's "Vergebliches Staendchen." Each was of a light, airy character, and all were pleasingly sung. Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," was the concluding number. This was the greatest of the composer's twelve symphonies, and won for Joachim Raff the rank, in the opinion of many critics, of being next after Beethoven in the treatment of themes, though he was wholly different in style from Beethoven. The symphony is a long one and is in four movements, an allegro, representing the forest in the daytime; a largo, "In the Twilight"; an allegro assai, "Dance of the Dryads," and an allegro, "The Break of Day." The symphony was given with fine effect.

The programme for to-night's concert is as follows:

Liszt, symphonic poem.....Tasso
Gluck, Aria, "I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus".....Miss Lena Little
Lalo, concerto for violoncello.....Anton Hekking
Tschaikowsky. Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
Secchi.....Love Me or Not
Hiller.....Im Maien
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

Clipping from GLOBE, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/10

Auditorium---Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Chicago season of the Boston Symphony orchestra came to an end yesterday afternoon with a very fully attended matinee. The program was mostly from Wagner. Besides these selections there were the long and on the whole rather tiresome Goldmark "Country Wedding," and two songs by Miss Mary Howe, the vocalist, kept in reserve until this concert. To dispose of her first, she has a clear voice and a wide range, carefully cultivated by Mme. Marchesi. Her tone color is not displeasing, but it is wholly devoid of expression. Her high coloratur sounds as if belonging to a different organ from the low voice. The effect is pleasing to all who do not care for expression and soul in singing. Considered merely as coloratur, the execution is not up to the highest standard. She has been well taught, and no doubt has practiced diligently; but expression is not in her art. The playing of the orchestra was excellent, but the limitations very apparent. The program had little in it and was not well arranged. It is sincerely to be hoped that when this excellent Boston orchestra next visits Chicago we may have here a better company of players and better programs in which to illustrate their work.

W. S. B. MATHEWS.

[142]

Clipping from
Free Press Detroit, Mich.
Date May 11

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at the Lyceum theater last evening to an audience not quite so large as that of Monday evening, and it must also be confessed, not so enthusiastic. The program rendered by the orchestra was one of conspicuous excellence, including Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, Lalo's Rhapsody for orchestra in A, and two Wagner selections—the Waldweben from "Siegfried" and the prelude to the Meistersinger. Nearly all of the work of the orchestra was heartily applauded, as it deserved to be, but the audience was decidedly considerate and appeared to be satisfied with Conductor Nikisch's dignified bow in lieu of repetition of the magnificent strains of his wonderful orchestra. Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist of the evening, and her first song, the Aria from Freischutz's "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" was rendered brilliantly and enthusiastically received. Miss Jahn bowed her acknowledgements, and her songs with the piano were not redemanded. They included Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen selections, the most popular being Wagner's "Wiegenlied."

A pale little gentleman with coal-black eyes, hair and beard, and "artist" stamped on every feature sat in the Russell house parlor last night and talked enthusiastically of the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was Arthur Nikisch, the gifted Hungarian who has been at the head of the famous organization during the past two years. His English has wonderfully improved since his arrival from Leipzig in 1889, when, as he now humorously and fluently declares he had taken but 10 hurried lessons in the language previous to sailing for this country.

"The orchestra is now on a paying basis," said Mr. Nikisch; "that is, it pays expenses. It is not intended to make money. We shall be on tour only three weeks longer. We go to Louisville May 12 to give five concerts during the musical festival there, and the next week we shall be in Buffalo for another festival. That will wind up our season, and in the early days of June I shall go to Europe to look over the field for fresh talent. Damrosch is organizing an orchestra in New York and Thomas another in Chicago, so that the supply of really first-class musicians on this side is now hardly equal to the demand. There are 85 men in the orchestra in all, but only 72 of them are with us on this Western tour."

Clipping from
NEWS, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite counter musical attractions the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Central Music hall attracted a large and highly appreciative audience. Miss Lena Little, heard for the first time in Chicago, sung the exquisite aria "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus," Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Koenigen," Secchi's charming ballad, "Love Me or Not" and Hiller's rapturous "Im Maien."

Miss Little possesses a mellow contralto voice that is heard to better advantage in the ballads, which she sings with rare simplicity. Mr. Anton Hekking, the other soloist of the evening, played Lelo's concerto for violoncello. The composition is monotonous and unattractive, but Mr. Hekking proved himself the admirable artist. He was recalled repeatedly.

The orchestra numbers were rendered with the finish and power that characterizes the work of this orchestra. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with the strange dissonant plaints of the first movement, careless heedlessness of the Ferrara episode, its vivid touch of local color, and the last dominant theme of fame and honor to Tasso, received the appreciation it deserved.

Tschaikowski's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 are strangely uncharacteristic of the author; they are marked by the most ingenuous simplicity.

During the entire musical season nothing has created more interest than Mr. Nikisch's reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony. Mr. Nikisch abandons the cool conception of tradition and imparts to this work the impassioned vigor that it demands. The lofty and triumphal finales in the hands of Mr. Nikisch become titantic in effect.

The last concert, this afternoon, contains selections from Wagner, Delibes, Goldmark, Saint-Saens and David.

Clipping from Beacon Dorchester Mass.
Date 5-9

Poco a Poco (who is understood to be Mr. George Wilson, music critic, also of the Boston Traveller, and editor of the symphony programmes), in a few words of retrospect anent the symphony season just ended, says in the Boston Commonwealth. In the matter of programmes, Mr. Nikisch has made an advance over his first year; he has got bravely beyond the borders of the Rhine, and his ken includes an occasional Russian, Slav, Englishman and American. The proportion of new music performed was greater this season than last, and the novelties were generally worthy. Toward native composers, Mr. Nikisch's [illegible] was friendly, yet he has not

[illegible] ness for business integrity, o[illegible] within a certain territory, for bus[illegible] ness ability than the firm of Strang

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MAY 12.

ON THEIR WAY HOME.

The Symphony Orchestra Stops Over in Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI, O., May 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared here this evening at the Odeon, and repeated their success of last year.

Although laboring under some disadvantage, some of the members being ill, the performance was an excellent one.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch was the soloist, and her first appearance here was a great success.

The programme was as follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, B flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Mozart..Canzonetta, and Page's Aria, from the Marriage of Figaro.
Tschaikowsky..Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano.
a. Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
b. Secchi.....Love me or not
c. Hiller.....Im Maien
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Wagner.....Prelude, Lohengrin
Wagner.....Prelude. Tristan and Isolde
Wagner.....Prelude, Die Meistersinger

Clipping from
TIMES, New York, N. Y.
Date 5-11

BOSTON MUSICAL COMBINATION.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND THE SINGERS.

BOSTON, May 10.—For some time there have been rumors of a proposed consolidation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Singers, but it was not until Saturday that Mr. George L. Osgood the director of the latter society, announced to his singers that Mr. Henry I. Higginson had invited them to unite with the Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Osgood read the following extract from a letter received from Mr. Higginson in regard to the proposed scheme:

"It calls for work and devotion and forgetfulness of self on the part of the chorus, orchestra, and conductors. There is but one way in art as in any good work—a single eye to the best results. It is a great field, and we shall try to use it well."

The proposition was welcomed by the chorus, and the consolidation is practically an accomplished fact. There are peculiar reasons why the Boston Singers should have been chosen for this purpose. The male chorus and the female chorus have been drilled separately, and each is capable of most excellent work. The society, under its skilled and enthusiastic leader, has made a specialty of the study of the ancient schools of all countries, and it is proposed to give every year, at least, one concert devoted to unaccompanied works of the great masters. While, of course, the programmes for next season have not yet been arranged, it is understood that Mr. Nikisch will conduct the orchestral works, and Mr. Osgood will lead all compositions that are distinctively choral.

It is rumored that the Singers will be increased to 200 or 250; but whether it would be judicious to enlarge this admirable body is a question. Quality is better than quantity. Now that such a society as the Singers has been added to the Symphony Orchestra, the programmes of next season will be anticipated with even keener interest. The concerts given for years by the orchestra and chorus of the Paris Conservatory are a proof of what can be achieved when directors and players and singers work together in unity. Mr. Osgood is to be congratulated, for he has now received the first reward of his labors and his high aims.

Clipping from
EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/7

Arthur Nikisch, the young Hungarian conductor under whose direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra has reached its present eminence, is a striking and interesting figure in the musical world. After several unsuccessful efforts the management of the orchestra induced him to come to America to assume the position made vacant by the retirement of Mr. Gericke two years ago. Though but thirty-five years of age, his brilliant career had already won for him a high place among the leading European conductors. In early childhood he showed extraordinary talent, which decided his parents to give him a thorough musical education. He soon mastered the violin and at an unusually early age he was accepted as a pupil in the Royal Conservatory at Vienna. After eight years' hard work under the best instructors he graduated with high honors, being awarded the first prize for violin playing and composition. He then secured a position as first violin in the Royal Opera, where, under such magnificent instructors as Richter and Jahn, he received the best possible practical instruction in conducting. Leaving the orchestra in 1878, he was engaged by the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, as conductor of the opera at Leipzic, where he remained until his departure for America.

Under his direction the orchestra of the Leipzic Opera gained a reputation which entitles it to an equal if not superior place to the Gewandhaus Orchestra. Nikisch also distinguished himself by giving many successful concerts in Leipzic, more especially in those of the famous Liszt Society. His European successes have been more than duplicated since his arrival in this country. His present position gives him the fullest opportunity for the display of his rare abilities unhampered by any considerations save those of reaching the highest artistic excellence. His interpretations of standard works, while not always strictly according to tradition, are always strikingly interesting and effective. He represents the progressive element in its best sense and his programmes are always open to the worthiest music of whatever school.

Clipping from Detroit, Mich.
Date 5/10

Musical Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Ann Arbor Tuesday evening drew an audience of 2,500. Competent musical authorities speak in the highest terms of the work of the orchestra on that occasion.

NEWS, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

The second of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts called a large and delighted audience to Central Music hall last evening. All the numbers rendered were received with a cordiality and approval rather uncommon in concert audiences. The programme was varied and, on the whole, satisfactory, both in selection and in arrangement. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with which it opened, is a somber work, with a leaden melancholy oppressing the first movements and one sonorous clash of triumph at the end. It was last produced here by Mr. Thomas' orchestra several seasons ago. The Tschaikowsky symphony No. 4, two movements of which were brilliantly rendered last night, is a pleasanter order of music. The themes in the andantino especially are worked out with wonderful delicacy. The scherzo, which is a pizzicato movement for the strings with a staccato accompaniment throughout the rest of the orchestra, was given last night with extraordinary neatness, the strings picking out the melody with incredible deftness, and—what is much more remarkable—with true intonation and a good quality of tone. The work of the evening, Beethoven's great C minor symphony, was handled as Mr. Nikisch handles all his productions—with artistic taste and care. In view of the very recent production of the same work here by the Thomas orchestra the production had a curious interest for those who care to draw comparisons. A verdict in favor of one or the other performances, however, would be largely a matter of individual taste. Both were great productions, and that is enough for the music-lover. In certain respects of precision and refinement Mr. Nikisch's reading is, of course, unsurpassable. He leads—as he plays accompaniments—like a virtuoso, and, so far as refinement may go, the result is perfection. Last night he did not see fit to depart radically from conventional standards, although the tempo taken in one or two of the movements was not that usually adopted. Mr. Anton Hekking gave Lalo's beautiful violoncello concerto—a work new to Chicago audiences—delightfully. Miss Lena Little, a lady with a pleasing sonorous voice and an artistic method, sung the time-honored aria "I Have Lost My Eurydice" very well, and three little songs by Brahms, Secchi and Hiller very much better. The programme for the third and last concert to be given this afternoon is, for variety and popular interest, the best of the series. It embraces the overture and bacchanale (Paris version) from "Tannhaeuser," Goldmarck's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, recently played here by the Thomas orchestra, the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Richter's arrangement of "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." Miss Mary Howe, a vocalist of some repute, will sing the "Bell Song" from Delibes' "Lakme" and an an aria from "Les Perles de Bresil." Mr. Adamowski will give Saint-Saens' rondo for violin again.

Clipping from JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

The second symphony concert at Central Music Hall last night was well attended by people who fully enjoyed the fine music. In addition to the orchestra's splendid work there was great pleasure in listening to the vocal efforts of Miss Lena Little, a singer never before heard in Chicago, and the cello playing of Mr. Anton Kekking. Miss Little is possessed of a pleasing contralto voice, and makes an attractive appearance. Her rendition of such selections as "Orpheus," an aria from Gluck; "Love Me or Not," a ballad, and numbers in German, were warmly received. It is not necessary to repeat what has already been said about the orchestra's playing, and what all lovers of orchestral music know so well. A matinee this afternoon, at which Miss Mary Howe was the soloist, closed the series. Following is the programme that was given:

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Bell Song from "Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony—"Rustic Wedding," op. 26 Goldmark
First movement from concerto for violin.....Brahms
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Aria from "Les Perles de Bresil".....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Prelude—"Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung".....Wagner

Mail Chicago Ill.
Date 5/8

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Central Music hall last night attracted a large and musically cultivated audience. The orchestra is well known in Chicago, its annual visits for the last few years having familiarized it to the music-lovers of the city.

The program last night was changed in some slight degree from that originally announced. Mr. Kneisel being ill T. Adamowski took his place, rendering St. Saens' rondo capriccioso for the violin. Page's canzenetta and an aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" was sung by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch instead of Raff's aria "The Dream King and His Love." Mrs. Nikisch's voice is sweet and possesses notably sympathetic qualities. Both in the number just quoted and in a group of three German songs she delighted the audience. Mr. Adamowski showed admirable technique in a brilliant composition of St. Saens. The purely orchestral numbers were Berlioz' overture to Benvenuto Cellini, "The Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde." In all the orchestra showed a high degree of excellence, indicating a lofty standard of individual excellence among the musicians, reenforced by careful and artistic orchestral discipline. The program for tonight will be:

Liszt.....Symphonic poem, "Tasso"
Gluck.....Aria from "Orpheus"
"I Have Lost My Eurydice."
Miss Lena Little.
Lalo.....Concerto for violoncello
Anton Hekking.
Tschaikowsky.....Andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor
Songs with piano
a. Brahms....."Wie Bist Du, Meine Koenigin"
b. Secchi..."Love Me or Not"
c. Hiller....."Im Maien"
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4 in C minor

HERALD, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/8

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of a series of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Central Music Hall. That Chicagoans bore this magnificent musical organization in kindliest remembrance was attested by the very large audience which attended the concert. The lower portions of the hall were completely filled and each number on the fine programme was applauded with enthusiasm. Since its last appearance in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra has, if possible, improved in its technical excellence, and the numbers given last evening were all of such high merit as to justify the opinion that the organization is the equal, if not the superior, of any similar musical body on this side of the Atlantic.

Director Arthur Nikisch is an interesting man. Rather below the medium height, slender in form, and of a nervous, high-strung temperament, he would not impress one at a glance that he could be the possessor of great ability as an orchestral leader, yet he has the most perfect control over his musicians and, under the magic of his baton, the phrasing and execution of the different instrumentalists is almost absolutely perfect. Especially did this seem the case in the opening number, Berlioz's overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and in the superb rendition of the "Waldweben" ("Voices of the Forest"), from "Siegfried," by Wagner. The exquisite tempo fully as much as the delicious melodies in the finale of the "Benvenuto" overture and the weird charm of Wagner's inspired music delighted the great audience, which clamored in vain for encores.

An orchestra of this character is necessarily most excellent in its stringed instruments, and Mr. Nikisch is especially fortunate in having violinists who seem to be thoroughly en rapport with him; the slightest signal from the director is heeded instantaneously, and the harmony is a source of delight to an audience.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who is no stranger in Chicago, was welcomed in a most cordial manner. She sang charmingly the Page's Canzonetta and an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo soprano voice of rare quality and knows well how to use it. She does not attempt any dizzy pyrotechnic vocal flights, but sings in an easy, natural way that cannot fail to please lovers of real music. She was recalled several times, but did not respond to the encores. T. Adamowski, a violinist of fine ability, who has frequently been heard in Chicago, was the other soloist of the evening. His selection, Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriccioso, was played in brilliant and effective style, which won for the artist enthusiastic plaudits.

Wagner's "Waldweben," as given, was the concert arrangement by H. Zumpe. In its rearrangement from the opera to the concert stage it naturally underwent many changes, by the omission of dialogue, etc., so as to make it in effect an independent composition. But the scenes depicted remain the same, and it bears the impression of the master's hand and spirit. The musical arrangement is almost as picturesque as the operatic, and it shows most effectively Wagner's marvelous power to depict nature by means of musical tones. As rendered last evening, the number was the gem of the programme, and the audience fairly clamored for a repetition, which was, however, not granted.

Mrs. Nikisch sang three dainty ballads to her husband's accompaniment on the piano. They were Goldmark's "Die Quelle," Jensen's "Am Ufer des Manzanares," and Brahm's "Vergebliches Staendchen." Each was of a light, airy character, and all were pleasingly sung. Raff's symphony No. 3, "Im Walde," was the concluding number. This was the greatest of the composer's twelve symphonies, and won for Joachim Raff the rank, in the opinion of many critics, of being next after Beethoven in the treatment of themes, though he was wholly different in style from Beethoven. The symphony is a long one and is in four movements, an allegro, representing the forest in the daytime; a largo, "In the Twilight"; an allegro assai, "Dance of the Dryads," and an allegro, "The Break of Day." The symphony was given with fine effect.

The programme for to-night's concert is as follows:

Liszt, symphonic poem.....Tasso"
Gluck, Aria, "I Have Lost My Eurydice," from "Orpheus".....Miss Lena Little
Lalo, concerto for violoncello.....Anton Hekking
Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo, from symphony No. 4, in F minor.
Songs with Piano:
Brahms.....Wie bist du meine Koenigin
Secchi.....Love Me or Not
Hiller.....Im Maien
Miss Lena Little.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor

GLOBE, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/10

Auditorium---Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Chicago season of the Boston Symphony orchestra came to an end yesterday afternoon with a very fully attended matinee. The program was mostly from Wagner. Besides these selections there were the long and on the whole rather tiresome Goldmark "Country Wedding," and two songs by Miss Mary Howe, the vocalist, kept in reserve until this concert. To dispose of her first, she has a clear voice and a wide range, carefully cultivated by Mme. Marchesi. Her tone color is not displeasing, but it is wholly devoid of expression. Her high coloratur sounds as if belonging to a different organ from the low voice. The effect is pleasing to all who do not care for expression and soul in singing. Considered merely as coloratur, the execution is not up to the highest standard. She has been well taught, and no doubt has practiced diligently; but expression is not in her art. The playing of the orchestra was excellent, but the limitations very apparent. The program had little in it and was not well arranged. It is sincerely to be hoped that when this excellent Boston orchestra next visits Chicago we may have here a better company of players and better programs in which to illustrate their work.

W. S. B. MATHEWS.

[142]

Tribune, Detroit, Mich.
Date 5/7

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at the Lyceum theater last evening to an audience not quite so large as that of Monday evening, and it must also be confessed, not so enthusiastic. The program rendered by the orchestra was one of conspicuous excellence, including Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, Lalo's Rhapsody for orchestra in A, and two Wagner selections—the Waldweben from "Siegfried" and the prelude to the Meistersinger. Nearly all of the work of the orchestra was heartily applauded, as it deserved to be, but the audience was decidedly considerate and appeared to be satisfied with Conductor Nikisch's dignified bow in lieu of repetition of the magnificent strains of his wonderful orchestra. Miss Marie Jahn was the soloist of the evening, and her first song, the Aria from Freischutz's "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" was rendered brilliantly and enthusiastically received. Miss Jahn bowed her acknowledgements, and her songs with the piano were not redemanded. They included Rubinstein, Wagner and Lassen selections, the most popular being Wagner's "Wiegenlied."

A pale little gentleman with coal-black eyes, hair and beard, and "artist" stamped on every feature sat in the Russell house parlor last night and talked enthusiastically of the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was Arthur Nikisch, the gifted Hungarian who has been at the head of the famous organization during the past two years. His English has wonderfully improved since his arrival from Leipzig in 1889, when, as he now humorously and fluently declares he had taken but 10 hurried lessons in the language previous to sailing for this country.

"The orchestra is now on a paying basis," said Mr. Nikisch; "that is, it pays expenses. It is not intended to make money. We shall be on tour only three weeks longer. We go to Louisville May 12 to give five concerts during the musical festival there, and the next week we shall be in Buffalo for another festival. That will wind up our season, and in the early days of June I shall go to Europe to look over the field for fresh talent. Damrosch is organizing an orchestra in New York and Thomas another in Chicago, so that the supply of really first-class musicians on this side is now hardly equal to the demand. There are 85 men in the orchestra in all, but only 72 of them are with us on this Western tour."

NEWS, Chicago, Ill.
Date 5/9

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite counter musical attractions the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Central Music hall attracted a large and highly appreciative audience. Miss Lena Little, heard for the first time in Chicago, sung the exquisite aria "I have lost my Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orpheus," Brahms' "Wie bist du meine Koenigen," Secchi's charming ballad, "Love Me or Not" and Hiller's rapturous "Im Maien."

Miss Little possesses a mellow contralto voice that is heard to better advantage in the ballads, which she sings with rare simplicity. Mr. Anton Hekking, the other soloist of the evening, played Lalo's concerto for violoncello. The composition is monotonous and unattractive, but Mr. Hekking proved himself the admirable artist. He was recalled repeatedly.

The orchestra numbers were rendered with the finish and power that characterizes the work of this orchestra. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with the strange dissonant plaints of the first movement, careless heedlessness of the Ferrara episode, its vivid touch of local color, and the last dominant theme of fame and honor to Tasso, received the appreciation it deserved.

Tschaikowski's andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 are strangely uncharacteristic of the author; they are marked by the most ingenuous simplicity.

During the entire musical season nothing has created more interest than Mr. Nikisch's reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony. Mr. Nikisch abandons the cool conception of tradition and imparts to this work the impassioned vigor that it demands. The lofty and triumphal finales in the hands of Mr. Nikisch become titantic in effect.

The last concert, this afternoon, contains selections from Wagner, Delibes, Goldmark, Saint-Saens and David.

Clipping from Beacon
Rochester Mass
Date 5-9

Poco a Poco (who is understood to be Mr. George Wilson, music critic, also of the Boston Traveller, and editor of the symphony programmes), in a few words of retrospect anent the symphony season just ended, says in the Boston Commonwealth. In the matter of programmes, Mr. Nikisch has made an advance over his first year; he has got bravely beyond the borders of the Rhine, and his ken includes an occasional Russian, Slav, Englishman and American. The proportion of new music performed was greater this season than last, and the novelties were generally worthy. Toward native composers, Mr. Nikisch's [illegible] was friendly, yet he has not

[illegible] manner for business integrity, q[illegible] within a certain territory, for business ability than the firm of Strang

...DAY OF THE FESTIVAL.

...the Appreciative Efforts of the Boston Symphonists.

...VILLE, KY., May 13.—The second ... the annual music festival, under ... auspices of the Commercial Club, as... by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ...ened in by a young people's popular ... at the Amphitheatre this afternoon, ...ramme was as follows:

... Mignon.....Ambroise Thomas
...from Symphonie Orientale..B. Godard
(a) Nikia's Dream
(b) In the Hammock.
...solos,
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
...Norwegian Rhapsodie, for orchestra in A....Lalo
...Andantino; Allegretto Presto.
...symphonic poem, Tasso, Lament and ..... Liszt
...to Allegro for violin, Perpetual Mo-.....Paganini
(By all the violins in the orchestra.)
...Tannhäuser.....Wagner
(Paris edition.)

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first ap...here, and scored a great success, ...and, the director, coming in for a ...the applause in his piano accom-...

...evening there was an open rehearsal ...selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat ..." and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" by the ...chestra and grand festival ...

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1891.

Monday evening, June 1, has been set for the first of this summer's Promenades in Music Hall. It is to be hoped that some means will be taken to give more light to the room, which has never been cheerful and clear enough for such gatherings.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, MAY 16.

BOSTONIANS IN HIGH FAVOR.

Phenomenal Success of Symphony Orchestra at Louisville.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 15.—The musical festival is now nearing its end, but its season has been phenomenal.

The Commercial Club are to be congratulated on having obtained the co-operation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as this organization has won laurels for its work. Tonight's programme was divided into two parts. The orchestra first rendered the overture "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23, Berlioz, and Beethoven's Seventh symphony. For the second part Antonin Dvorak's Stabat Mater, op. 58, was sung, with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass. A great chorus assisted. The affair was most successful.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
—A WEEKLY PAPER—
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 13, 1891.

Buffalo May Festival.

THE following are the programs for the great May festival:

Wednesday Evening, May 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor.
Soloists.
Miss Clementina de Vere,
Mrs. Julie L. Wyman,
Mr. W. H. Rieger,
Mr. Francis Fischer Powers.

PART I.

Overture, "Lenore No. 3".....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.
Aria, "O tu Palermo," "Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Mr. Powers.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt.")
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mad scene from "Hamlet"..... A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.
Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps..... / Dance of Sylphs..... / Hungarian march..... } "Damnation of Faust"...Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs with piano:
"Enchantment"..... Massenet
"Dormez-vous?"..... Wekertin
"Heart Fancies"..... A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

PART II.

"Eve"..... Massenet
A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.
Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival chorus of 500 voices, John Lund conductor.

Thursday Afternoon, May 21.

Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. Franz Rummel, solo pianist.
Grande Polonaise..... Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, "Les Dragons de Villars"..... Maillard
Mrs. Nikisch.
"Nikra's Dream"... / "In the Hammock". } from "Symphonie Orientale," op. 84.....Godard
Scherzo Capriccioso..... Dvorák
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat major..... Liszt
Mr. Rummel.
Songs with piano. / "Die Quelle"..... Goldmark / Florian's song..... Godard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march..... } "Midsummer Night's Dream"..Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thursday Evening, May 21.

Soloists, Miss Mary M. Howe, Mrs. Mielke, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Overture, "Oberon"..... Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon"..... Weber
Mrs. Mielke.
"The March to Battle"..... John Lund
Mrs. Mielke, Mr. Bushnell and male chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra..... Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell Song, "Lakmé"..... Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony ("Rustic Wedding"), op. 26..... Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song, "The Nightingale"..... Alibeff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried"..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
"Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde"..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Meistersinger"..... Wagner
Festival chorus.

Friday Evening, May 22.

Soloists, Miss Mary Howe, Miss Mary E. Fox, Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Symphony poem, "Lancelot and Elaine"..... McDowell
Overture—Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet"..... Tschaikowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs..... / "Loveliest Flower"..... Price / "In the East"..... Mulligan
Mr. Rieger.
Solo—"Bird Song," "Pearl of Brazil"..... David
Miss Howe.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brünhilde's Rock," "Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung"..Wagner
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs..... / "The Arabian Slave"..... Shelley / "Ah! 'Tis a Dream"..... Hawkey
Miss Fox.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5..... Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo, "Echo Song"..... Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus, "To Thee, O Country"..... Eichberg

Saturday Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Campbell, Mr. W. H. Rieger, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Overture and finale, from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version)..... Wagner
Chorus (Children's).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Choral, "Our Father, 'tis to Thee"..... / Part song, "Sweet Spring Evening"..... } Gluck / Solo, duet and chorus, "Sigh, Gentle Gales"..... N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.

Songs, with piano:
"In Liebeslust"..... Liszt
"Bon Jour, Susanne"..... Delibés
"Frühlingsnacht"..... Schumann
Mrs. Nikisch.
Solo for flute, fantaisie on themes from "Oberon"..... Demersseman
Ch. Mole.
Anthem, "Who is Like Unto Thee"..... E. L. Baker
Soloists, Miss Margaret E. Campbell, Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Songs... / "The Old Stone Wall"..... P. A. Schnecker / "The Two Grenadiers"..... Schumann
Mr. Bushnell.
Largo..... Händel
For all the violins.
Songs.... / "Favorite Eyes"..... Newcomb / "Double Loss"..... Helmund
Mr. Rieger.

Songs.... / Solo and chorus, "My Dear Old Home"..... Alfred Beirly / Chorus, "The Banner of the Free"..... Brinley Richards
Part song, "Good Night"..... Franz Abts
Children's chorus.
Overture, "Euryanthe," Boston Symphony Orchestra..... Weber

Saturday Evening, May 23.

Soloists—Mrs. Mielke, Miss DeVere, Mr. Dippel, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Symphony poem, "Tasso," Boston Symphony Orchestra..... Liszt
"Lohengrin's Narrative," from "Lohengrin"..... Wagner
Mr. Dippel.
Aria, "O Lovely Halls," from "Die Götterdämmerung"..... Wagner
Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"King Rother," a cantata..... J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere and Mr. Bushnell.
Festival chorus of 500 voices, John Lund conductor.

[1413]

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MAY 14.

SECOND DAY OF THE FESTIVAL.

Louisville Appreciates Efforts of the Boston Symphonists.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 13.—The second day of the annual music festival, under the auspices of the Commercial Club, assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was ushered in by a young people's popular concert at the Amphitheatre this afternoon. The programme was as follows:

1. Overture, Mignon.....Ambroise Thomas
2. Selection, from Symphonie Orientale..B. Godard
   (a) Nikla's Dream
   (b) In the Hammock.
3. Vocal solos, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
4. Norwegian Rhapsodie, for orchestra in A....Lalo
   Andantino; Allegretto Presto.
5. Symphonic poem, Tasso, Lament and Triumph.....Liszt
6. Concerto Allegro for violin, Perpetual Motion.....Paganini
   (By all the violins in the orchestra.)
7. Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner
   (Paris edition.)

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance here, and scored a great success, her husband, the director, coming in for a share of the applause in his piano accompaniments.

This evening there was an open rehearsal of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" by the symphony orchestra and grand festival chorus.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1891.

Monday evening, June 1, has been set for the first of this summer's Promenades in Music Hall. It is to be hoped that some means will be taken to give more light to the room, which has never been cheerful and clear enough for such gatherings.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, MAY 16.

BOSTONIANS IN HIGH FAVOR.

Phenomenal Success of Symphony Orchestra at Louisville.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 15.—The musical festival is now nearing its end, but its season has been phenomenal.

The Commercial Club are to be congratulated on having obtained the co-operation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as this organization has won laurels for its work.

Tonight's programme was divided into two parts. The orchestra first rendered the overture "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23, Berlioz, and Beethoven's Seventh symphony. For the second part Antonin Dvorak's Stabat Mater, op. 58, was sung, with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass. A great chorus assisted. The affair was most successful.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

—A WEEKLY PAPER—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 13, 1891.

Buffalo May Festival.

THE following are the programs for the great May festival:

Wednesday Evening, May 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor.
Soloists.
Miss Clementina de Vere,
Mrs. Julie L. Wyman,
Mr. W. H. Rieger,
Mr. Francis Fischer Powers.

PART I.

Overture, "Lenore No. 3".....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.
Aria, "O tu Palermo," "Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Mr. Powers.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase."
"Anitra's Dance."
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing "Peer Gynt.")
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mad scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.
Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of Sylphs, Hungarian march. } "Damnation of Faust"...Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs with piano:
"Enchantment".....Massenet
"Dormez-vous?".....Wekertin
"Heart Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

PART II.

"Eve".....Massenet
A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.
Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival chorus of 500 voices, John Lund conductor.

Thursday Afternoon, May 21.

Soloist, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. Franz Rummel, solo pianist.
Grande Polonaise.....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, "Les Dragons de Villars".....Maillard
Mrs. Nikisch.
"Nikra's Dream," "In the Hammock." } from "Symphonie Orientale," op. 84.....Godard
Scherzo Capriccioso.....Dvorák
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Mr. Rummel.
Songs with piano. "Die Quelle".....Goldmark; Florian's song.....Godard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march. } "Midsummer Night's Dream"..Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thursday Evening, May 21.

Soloists, Miss Mary M. Howe, Mrs. Mielke, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon".....Weber
Mrs. Mielke.
"The March to Battle".....John Lund
Mrs. Mielke, Mr. Bushnell and male chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra.....Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell Song, "Lakmé".....Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony ("Rustic Wedding"), op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song, "The Nightingale".....Alibeff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
"Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Meistersinger".....Wagner
Festival chorus.

Friday Evening, May 22.

Soloists, Miss Mary Howe, Miss Mary E. Fox, Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Symphony poem, "Lancelot and Elaine".....McDowell
Overture—Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs. "Loveliest Flower".....Price; "In the East".....Mulligan
Mr. Rieger.
Solo—"Bird Song," "Pearl of Brazil".....David
Miss Howe.
"Siegfried's Passage to Brünhilde's Rock," "Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung"..Wagner
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs. "The Arabian Slave".....Shelley; "Ah! 'Tis a Dream".....Hawkey
Miss Fox.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo, "Echo Song".....Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus, "To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg

Saturday Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Campbell, Mr. W. H. Rieger, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Overture and finale, from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Chorus (Children's).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Choral, "Our Father, 'tis to Thee"..... } .....Gluck Part song, "Sweet Spring Evening"..... }
Solo, duet and chorus, "Sigh, Gentle Gales"..... .....N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.

Songs, with piano:
"In Liebeslust".....Liszt
"Bon Jour, Susanne".....Delibés
"Fruhlingsnacht".....Schumann
Mrs. Nikisch.
Solo for flute, fantaisie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman
Ch. Mole.
Anthem, "Who is Like Unto Thee".....E. L. Baker
Soloists, Miss Margaret E. Campbell, Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Songs. "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schnecker; "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. Bushnell.
Largo.....Händel
For all the violins.
Songs. "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb; "Double Loss".....Helmund
Mr. Rieger.
Songs. Solo and chorus, "My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly; Chorus, "The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
Part song, "Good Night".....Franz Abts
Children's chorus.
Overture, "Euryanthe," Boston Symphony Orchestra.....Weber

Saturday Evening, May 23.

Soloists—Mrs. Mielke, Miss DeVere, Mr. Dippel, Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Symphony poem, "Tasso," Boston Symphony Orchestra.....Liszt
"Lohengrin's Narrative," from "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Mr. Dippel.
Aria, "O Lovely Halls," from "Die Götterdämmerung".....Wagner
Mrs. Mielke and Mr. Dippel.
"King Rother," a cantata.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere and Mr. Bushnell.
Festival chorus of 500 voices, John Lund conductor.

Courier-Journal.
LOUISVILLE,
EDNESDAY.....MAY 18, 1891

MAY MUSIC.

The Festival At the Amphitheater Auditorium Formally Opened.

Splendid Audience and An Evening of Delightful Entertainment.

Selections By the Orchestra and Soli By Miss Marie Jahn.

Mr. Shackleton's Chorus To Make Its Appearance This Evening.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH.

The May Music Festival opened last evening at the Auditorium with a grand concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the whole can be judged by the opening night the festival is to be a grand success. Never before has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Auditorium than the one last evening, which greeted Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, as he stepped upon the stage. The hopes of the most sanguine were realized by the reception accorded the orchestra and the chorus talent of this city.

The parquette and dress circle were crowded, and the stage presented a glittering effect. The scenery was so arranged as to from an octagon shaped hall, with portals at the rear of the stage opening upon mountain scenery and lakes. The ceiling was handsomely frescoed scenery, of a dome-shaped appearance, and was dazzling with myriads of incandescent lights

The orchestra was placed in the front of the stage, with Mr. Nikisch in the center with his back turned to the audience. The members of the chorus, who will sing Friday and Saturday, were seated immediately in the rear of the orchestra, on tiers, rising one above the other. The female members of the chorus were dressed in white, the men, wearing full dress suits.

The audience showed its appreciation for classical music from the opening overture to the close. During the rendition of the selections, absolute quiet was observed.

Conspicuous in one of the boxes was Mrs Nikisch, who will take the leading vocal part this afternoon and evening.

THE CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Finished and Satisfactory Performance.

The concert was a highly satisfactory one in all respects; the programme was interesting; the orchestra in good condition, and the audience in an excellent humor. Even the failure of Mr. Kneisel, the violinist, to appear as announced, did not cast a gloom over the occasion. The gap in the programme was so acceptably filled by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, that the change did not take the color of disappointment. The orchestra, both in the high order of the music presented as well as in the execution of the numbers, was fully up to the stanadrd of excellence that has left such favorable impression behind on the previous visits of the organization to this city, and the enthusiasm of the audience, while it lacked the unreasoning persistence in the demand for encores that is sometimes exhibited, was warmly and intelligently appreciative.

The orchestra is finely balanced, and the work, which was excellent all through, was most impressive in the Raff Symphony, and the prelude to the Meistersinger, which was added to the origina, programme, though the charming Greig Suite, which is evidently a favorite with the orchestra, and is always given by them with keen appreciation of its good points, was admirably done.

The programme opened with Golmark's overture to Sakuntala, which was given here last year by the Boston Orchestra. This is more properly a symphonic poem, full of the color and sentiment of the Oriental subject, and with a sufficient Hungarian flavor to indicate the nationality of the composer. It was the Sakuntala overture that made Golmark's reputation, and it is plain that he had in the Eastern legend a theme well suited to his style. The story of Sakuntala is one of the most poetic and attractive to be found in Hindo mythology and its motive is of the broad and simple character that lends itself readily to musical treatment. Sakuntala, the daughter of the giant Viswamitre and the water nymph Menaka, being abandoned by her parents is adopted by the saint Kanwa. The King Dushyanta goes hunting in the forest, falls in love with Sakuntala, and persuades her to marry him according to the rites of the Gandharva marriage, promising to make her queen in the royal city and her son heir to the throne. The King, however, forgot his promise, and Sakuntala, after waiting for him to send for her until the boy is six years old, goes to seek him at his palace, but is repudiated by the King until a voice from heaven proclaims the boy his lawful son.

The composition opens with a slow introduction, followed by a movement in quicker tempo, in which the violoncellos and clarionets give out the principal theme which recurs frequently through the work. It is a broad, rich melody, broken in upon at intervals during the first part of the overture by the trumpet call that suggests the hunting party. All the instruments in turn take up the melody, which is variously treated and relieved by an ingenious instrumentation that gives effective touches of color and variety. There is a second theme which is taken up by the violins and oboes, and later by the flutes accompanied by the figure of the preceding subject, until a new and more prominent theme given out by the brass gradually absorbs the whole orchestra. A harp accompaniment is used with very fine effect where the original theme is brought in by the full orchestra in a new and slightly accelerated tempo. The finale rises in a splendid crescendo toward the close, and the chief feature of the latter part is the gorgeous instrumentation by which it is worked up.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, though not so celebrated as the "Lenore," is a finer and far more attractive composition. It lacks the gruesome suggestiveness of the more familiar work, and while the introduction of the wild hunt would seem to offer an opportunity for the weird and fantastic, the movement devoted to that episode is more romantic and mysterious than terrible.

The first two movements giving the "impressions and sensations" of daytime and twilight in the woods are instinct with a reposeful and poetic beauty, which, without being in the least imitative, or even similar in treatment, suggests Beethoven's Pastoral symphony. None of the composers from Schumann down have recorded their impressions of the woods in a more poetic vein, or with more seriousness of purpose. The attitude of the composer is announced in the solemn opening chord of the allegro. The first theme is uttered by the strings, and the second is reached through a singular and striking modulation from G to Bb. A salient feature of the first movement is the passage of the horn very full and melodious. The entire movement is beautifully expressive of the idyllic surroundings and full of poetic suggestiveness.

There are two movements in the second part; the first finally suggests the deepening twilight and the hum of insect voices. There is a short prelude which leads into the principal theme, which, after slight digression, is repeated, the horn and violas taking the melody, while the remaining strings accompany them pizzicato with a very charming effect. A fresh feature is introduced with a change of key and temps, into which the principal theme of the movement is brought by one violincello, while the flutes and muted strings keep up a chirping and fluttering that suggest a similar episode in Seigfried. The scherzo of the second part, which represents the Dryads Dance, ushers in a lively theme for the flutes, supported by a pizzicato accompaniment for all the strings, which is repeated several times, ending always in a different key from that in which it started. The orchestration of this part is a striking feature, and the effects were very beautifully brought out by the orchestra. The work in both the first and second parts of the symphony was especially fine in shading and finish, affording a striking contrast to the brilliancy and vigor of execution with which the final movement was carried through.

In the third part the solemn hush, which is at first broken only by the myriad chirping night-voices of the woods, is presently invaded by the mysterious harmonies that give intimation of the approaching hunt, and the movement gradually becomes more agitated in character and the theme is strengthened by the successive addition of all the instruments, the whole firmly held together by the pedal point on F, which is sustained by the bass viols, until a splendid burst of full instrumentation ushers in the hunt, which moves forward in an impressive crescendo, and with a sort of tramp-like rythm that gives a distinctive character to this part of the movement. There is an exquisite bit of melody beautifully instrumentated just where the sound of the hunt dies away, and an exhilarating suggestion of the cool, invigorating breath of morning, and the awakening life of the woods in the passages that immediately precede the close.

Instead of movement from the Brahms concerto for violin, which was to have been played by Mr. Kneisel, a Rondo Coppreceeoso, by Roff, a composition full of melody and an airy grace and daintiness, was given by Mr. Admanowski, with marvelous finish and delicacy of touch. His phrasing was so clean, his tone so clear, and there was such etherial lightness of touch in his execution that his solo furnished a most charming diversion in the midst of the more serious work of the orchestra.

The impression made by Miss Marie Jahn was in the highest degree favorable. Her first selection was an air from Tanhauser, "O, Lovely Hall," which she sang with much spirit and effectiveness. Her voice is a soprano of more than ordinary power, with a strong dramatic equality, which found an opportunity for force and breadth of expression in the [illegible] which she sang with feeling and artistic discrimination. The three songs of lighter character, which came later in the evening, were also admirably sung.

The Greig Suite Peer was given by the orchestra here last year. The music was originally written for a stage production of Ibsen's drama of the same name, and the suite is but a small part of the voluminous music written for that occasion. In its present shape it consists of a very beautiful allegro, pastoral in character, representing daybreak; a funeral march entitled the "Death of Aase," which is most beautifully expressive of departing life, fainting away at the close like a lost sigh; a charmingly graceful mazurka and a final movement, very grotesque and in march time which represents the experience of Peer Gynt in the Hall of the Mountain King, where he falls in love with the King's daughter and is punished for his presumption by being turned over to the Imps, who torment him to their satisfaction, and finally turn him out of the palace. The first three movements are melodious, quiet and graceful, requiring great delicacy of execution, while the third, in strong constrst to these, is single crescendo rising toward the close with a steadily increasing tempo, that presents a wonderfully grotesque effect and the performance of it as given by the Boston Orchestra is a feat in execution. Mr. Nikisch added the prelude to Wagner's Meistersinger to the programme as originally published. This number furnished an impressive close for the concert. The Orchestra gave it with all the pomp of instrumentation and orchestral color for which Wagner is distinguished, even in what is called his "early period."

A number not to be passed over was the symphonic poem of Saint Saens, the Youth of Hercules. It was based upon a legend to the effect that Hercules in his youth was beset by the Nymphs and Bauhontes, who sought to entice him from the path of glory, in spite of which he chose struggle and combat. The piece is developed from two themes that follow the idea conveyed in the legend, and are worked up toward the close in a fine crescendo. It was an interesting number and was given a characteristic interpretation by the Orchestra. The programme for this afternoon is as follows:

Overture—Mignon—Ambroise Thomas.
Selection—From "Symphonie Orientale"—B. Godard. (A) "Nikia's Dream." (B) "In the Hammock."
Songs with Piano: (A) "Florian's Song"—Godard. (B) Vergebliches Standchen—Brahms. (C) "Fruhlingsnacht"—Schumann. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Rhapsodie—For Orchestra, in A—Lalo. Andantino · Allegretto Presto.
Symphonic Poem—"Tasso, Lament and Triumph"—Liszt.
Cavatina—From "Faust"—Gounod.
Concerto Allegro for Violin—"Perpetual Motion"—Paganini.
Overture—Tannhauser—Wagner.

The programme for to-night will consist of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelsshon's "Elijah," together with some of the solos in both works. The choruses in the "Stabat Mater" are wonderfully scored for orchestra in the modern style, and there is probablp nothing in the whole range of music by a living composer that has been so well received by connoiseurs. The performance tonight will be preparatory to the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will afford an opportunity to study the peculiar beauties of the composition.

The "Elijah" choruses are always effective, and they will be given with the recitatives so as to preserve the dramatic connection, and enable the audience to understand the motive of the work.

The incidental solo parts in both works will be sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Something About Its Personnel—A Talk With Conductor Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of musicians from all the great cities of Europe and includes a number from the most famous musical oganizations on the continent. Of those who are better known in this country is Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist. He was originally a member of the celebrated Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, but afterward played with Emma Thursby and later with the Clara Louise Kellogg Concert Company.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist, has a national reputation. Mr. Charles Molo, first flute, and Mr. A. Sautel, the first oboe, are among the latest and most valued acquisitions to the orchestra, having been secured after the destruction by fire of the Opera Comique in Paris. Mr. A. Hackebrath, first horn, was formerly with Thomas' Orchestra. Pierre Muller, first trumpet, was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra, Paris. The following violinists, who are now members of the Boston Orchestra, were formerly of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna: Otto Roth, L. Snecenski, A. Moldauer, E. Fieldler, and E. Grunberg.

Mr. Nikisch is the youngest leader ever at the head of the orchestra. He is not yet thirty-five years of age, but looks older. He is the third leader of the orchestra, the other two having been George Henschel, who occupied the position for three years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who was conductor for the next five. Since Mr. Nikisch assumed charge, two years ago, the organization has advanced in every way. Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian. His voice is soft, and though he does not pose as a singer, yet when he attempts a part for the instruction of others, his tones show remarkable qualities of sweetness and expression. As soon as the chorus was placed at the rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr. Nikisch was introduced to the members by Mr. Shackleton. He apologized for his inability to speak pure English, but added that he would be understood, as there was one language common to musicians, that of the heart. The chorus and members of the orchestra applauded his graceful speech, which he acknowledged in a few words.

At the close of the rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch was seen by a reporter. Speaking of the local talent displayed in the chorus, he said: "Louisville must be a great musical center judging from the quantity and quality of the chorus I have been conducting this afternoon. When I heard that the members had been rehearsing for only three months I was astonished, for the promptness in which the members make their entrance and the modulations of their tones is marvelous. It is the best chorus I have yet found upon a first rehearsal. I had to correct them but twice, and made them repeat only a few more times. Their training has been excellent."

"I have noticed one thing peculiar to the American people. They have a wonderful amount of musical energy. They accomplish much more in a short period than Europeans can do. They take hold of a part with a vim and never stop until it is mastered.

"I have been greatly satisfied with my reception at every place I have been. I find that the average American audience is far more appreciative of classical music than a European, and especially a German audience. It is a common thing to hear musicians abroad speak in slighting terms of American music, and, in fact, before coming here I was imbued with the same idea. Now I would much prefer to play classical music before an American audience than before a European."

Mr. Nikisch added that he considered Boston the ideal music city.

Courier-Journal.

PUBLISHED DAILY, SUNDAY AND WEEKLY
Office: Cor. Fourth Avenue and Green Street, LOUISVILLE.

THURSDAY.....MAY 14, 1891

THE MAY FESTIVAL.

Two concerts were given at the Auditorium yesterday, in one of which the local chorus took a highly creditable part. It is probable that the chorus was a surprise to most of those who have been hearing of it for the past three months, both in the volume of the tone and in the progress made in the brief space that has elapsed since it was organized. The open rehearsal last night was sufficient evidence that Director Nikisch's commendation of the work of the chorus was something more than an empty compliment, and both Mr. Shackelton and the members of the chorus are entitled to much patting on the back for the amount of hard work done in the short time they have been acting together. There are passages here and there that are not as smooth as they might be, nor as smooth as they will be upon the next appearance of the chorus, but in general the work is careful, intelligent and spirited, and the choruses selected for the rehearsal last night were given in a manner that must have been altogether unexpected to many who heard them. It was a compliment to the chorus that the house was almost as well filled last night as on the previous evening, and this is no slight tribute when it is remembered that there were no numbers by the orchestra, and no solos except those incidental to the selections from the two oratorios. The concert began with the selections from Dvorak's Stabat Mater, which is to be given entire Friday night, and all of the numbers except two were sung. The Stabat Mater is as fine an example of that class of music as could have been chosen for the occasion; full of melody, beautifully scored, and at the same time within easy reach of those who are to sing it. There is a very beautiful prelude for the orchestra, in which the horns carry the air of the old Latin hymn which furnishes the theme for the first quartette and chorus, "Stabat Mater Doloroso," which is worked out with considerable elaboration and has a fine climax for it. The quartette was composed of Miss Katie Elliot, Mrs. Shackelton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Louis Williams, who sang the music admirably, sustaining the principal parts effectively against the full volume of orchestra and chorus. This was the most impressive number of the Stabat Mater given last night, though the other numbers went smoothly.

The somber and massive Elijah of Mendelssohn is more of an undertaking than the Stabat Mater, but here also the progress of the chorus has been surprising in view of the time spent upon it. All of the more important choruses were rehearsed last night, with the recitative, which serves to link them together, Mr. Louis Williams' delivery of he recitative and his work in the concerted numbers was highly meritorious. The audience was only reminded of the fact that they were attending a rehearsal at one or two points at which Director Nikisch paused to insist upon a little more or a little less vigor of expression; in the main the choruses went with great smoothness and were marked by intelligent phrasing and the careful shading that is always to be looked for in a body that has been under Mr. Shackleton's direction. The splendid stirring chorus, "Thanks be to God," as well as the first Baal chorus were given with great spirit and confidence, and judging from the preliminary effort the presentation of the oratorio on Saturday evening will be an event upon which all concerned in it may be congratulated. The concert in the afternoon was an exceedingly pleasing one; it was addressed to the popular taste and seemed to reach its destination with satisfactory directness.

The audience was much larger than was to be expected, considering the rival attractions with which the matinee had to compete. It was composed almost entirely of ladies, but made a brave showing, both in point of numbers and in the interest manifested in the music. The features of the programme were the rhapsodie of Lalo and the prelude of Liszt, both of which are striking compositions, notwithstanding the fact that they merit the epithet "popular," and were incorporated in what is described in the printed programme as the "Young People's Popular Concert." The overture to Mignon, which was the opening number, was beautifully given by the orchestra, and a charming novelty was introduced in the selections from Godard's "Symphonic Orientale," "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock," both of which were full of melody and rich in orchestral color. In the rhapsodie by Lalo the audience was introduced to a new composer, a Spaniard, who is identified with the modern French school, of which Massenet, Godard and Saint Saens are representatives.

It is original in the treatment and all the possibilities of the modern orchestra are brought into play, with effects that are often odd and piquant. Next to the Rhapsodie the Liszt prelude was the most interesting number of the programme. It is the symphonic poem, entitled the "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," constructed upon the poems of Byron and Goethe, upon the same subject. The composer has taken for the chief motive of the work a fragment of a Venetian Gondolier's song, a broad, flowing melody full of pathos that is admirably adapted to the expression of the deep sadness of Tasso's life, and has developed it elaborately, carrying it on and bringing it into the scene of triumph with fine effect. Mrs. Nikisch, who was announced for three songs, did not appear, and instead of her number, three short 'cello solos were given, a nocturne by Chopin, an air by Massenet and a gavotte by Popper, and the selections were so artistically played as to propitiate the audience, which was at first inclined to resent the change.

The sensation of the afternoon was the barytone solo of Signor Campanari, who sang Valentine's "Farewell" from Faust so admirably as to precipitate an ovation. He was recalled again and again, and only the rigid rule of no encores prevented his being recalled indefinitely.

ourier-Journal.
LOUISVILLE,
EDNESDAY.....MAY 13, 1891

MAY MUSIC.

The Festival At the Amphitheater Auditorium Formally Opened.

Splendid Audience and An Evening of Delightful Entertainment.

Selections By the Orchestra and Soli By Miss Marie Jahn.

Mr. Shackleton's Chorus To Make Its Appearance This Evening.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH.

The May Music Festival opened last evening at the Auditorium with a grand concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the whole can be judged by the opening night the festival is to be a grand success. Never before has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Auditorium than the one last evening, which greeted Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, as he stepped upon the stage. The hopes of the most sanguine were realized by the reception accorded the orchestra and the chorus talent of this city.

The parquette and dress circle were crowded, and the stage presented a glittering effect. The scenery was so arranged as to from an octagon shaped hall, with portals at the rear of the stage opening upon mountain scenery and lakes. The ceiling was handsomely frescoed scenery, of a dome-shaped appearance, and was dazzling with myriads of incandescent lights

The orchestra was placed in the front of the stage, with Mr. Nikisch in the center with his back turned to the audience. The members of the chorus, who will sing Friday and Saturday, were seated immediately in the rear of the orchestra, on tiers, rising one above the other. The female members of the chorus were dressed in white, the men, wearing full dress suits.

The audience showed its appreciation for classical music from the opening overture to the close. During the rendition of the selections, absolute quiet was observed.

Conspicuous in one of the boxes was Mrs Nikisch, who will take the leading vocal part this afternoon and evening.

THE CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Finished and Satisfactory Performance.

The concert was a highly satisfactory one in all respects; the programme was interesting; the orchestra in good condition, and the audience in an excellent humor. Even the failure of Mr. Kueisel, the violinist, to appear as announced, did not cast a gloom over the occasion. The gap in the programme was so acceptably filled by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, that the change did not take the color of disappointment. The orchestra, both in the high order of the music presented as well as in the execution of the numbers, was fully up to the stanadrd of excellence that has left such favorable impression behind on the previous visits of the organization to this city, and the enthusiasm of the audience, while it lacked the unreasoning persistence in the demand for encores that is sometimes exhibited, was warmly and intelligently appreciative.

The orchestra is finely balanced, and the work, which was excellent all through, was most impressive in the Raff Symphony, and the prelude to the Meistersinger, which was added to the origina, programme, though the charming Greig Suite, which is evidently a favorite with the orchestra, and is always given by them with keen appreciation of its good points, was admirably done.

The programme opened with Golmark's overture to Sakuntala, which was given here last year by the Boston Orchestra. This is more properly a symphonic poem, full of the color and sentiment of the Oriental subject, and with a sufficient Hungarian flavor to indicate the nationality of the composer. It was the Sakuntala overture that made Golmark's reputation, and it is plain that he had in the Eastern legend a theme well suited to his style. The story of Sakuntala is one of the most poetic and attractive to be found in Hindo mythology, and its motive is of the broad and simple character that lends itself readily to musical treatment. Sakuntala, the daughter of the giant Viswamitre and the water nymph Menaka, being abandoned by her parents is adopted by the saint Kanwa. The King Dushyanta goes hunting in the forest, falls in love with Sakuntala, and persuades her to marry him according to the rites of the Gandharva marriage, promising to make her queen in the royal city and her son heir to the throne. The King, however, forgot his promise, and Sakuntala, after waiting for him to send for her until the boy is six years old, goes to seek him at his palace, but is repudiated by the King until a voice from heaven proclaims the boy his lawful son.

The composition opens with a slow introduction, followed by a movement in quicker tempo, in which the violoncellos and clarionets give out the principal theme which recurs frequently through the work. It is a broad, rich melody, broken in upon at intervals during the first part of the overture by the trumpet call that suggests the hunting party. All the instruments in turn take up the melody, which is variously treated and relieved by an ingenious instrumentation that gives effective touches of color and variety. There is a second theme which is taken up by the violins and oboes, and later by the flutes accompanied by the figure of the preceding subject, until a new and more prominent theme given out by the brass gradually absorbs the whole orchestra. A harp accompaniment is used with very fine effect where the original theme is brought in by the full orchestra in a new and slightly accelerated tempo. The finale rises in a splendid crescendo toward the close, and the chief feature of the latter part is the gorgeous instrumentation by which it is worked up.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, though not so celebrated as the "Lenore," is a finer and far more attractive composition. It lacks the gruesome suggestiveness of the more familiar work, and while the introduction of the wild hunt would seem to offer an opportunity for the weird and fantastic, the movement devoted to that episode is more romantic and mysterious than terrible.

The first two movements giving the "impressions and sensations" of daytime and twilight in the woods are instinct with a reposeful and poetic beauty, which, without being in the least imitative, or even similar in treatment, suggests Beethhoven's Pastoral symphony. None of the composers from Schumann down have recorded their impressions of the woods in a more poetic vein, or with more seriousness of purpose. The attitude of the composer is announced in the solemn opening chord of the allegro. The first theme is uttered by the strings, and the second is reached through a singular and striking modulation from G to Bb. A salient feature of the first movement is the passage of the horn very full and melodious. The entire movement is beautifully expressive of the idyllic surroundings and full of poetic suggestiveness.

There are two movements in the second part; the first finally suggests the deepening twilight and the hum of insect voices. There is a short prelude which leads into the principal theme, which, after slight digression, is repeated, the horn and violas taking the melody, while the remaining strings accompany them pizzicato with a very charming effect. A fresh feature is introduced with a change of key and temps, into which the principal theme of the movement is brought by one violincello, while the flutes and muted strings keep up a chirping and fluttering that suggest a similar episode in Seigfried. The scherzo of the second part, which represents the Dryads Dance, ushers in a lively theme for the flutes, supported by a pizzicato accompaniment for all the strings, which is repeated several times, ending always in a different key from that in which it started. The orchestration of this part is a striking feature, and the effects were very beautifully brought out by the orchestra. The work in both the first and second parts of the symphony was especially fine in shading and finish, affording a striking contrast to the brilliancy and vigor of execution with which the final movement was carried through.

In the third part the solemn hush, which is at first broken only by the myriad chirping night-voices of the woods, is presently invaded by the mysterious harmonics that give intimation of the approaching hunt, and the movement gradually becomes more agitated in character and the theme is strengthened by the successive addition of all the instruments, the whole firmly held together by the pedal point on F, which is sustained by the bass viols, until a splendid burst of full instrumentation ushers in the hunt, which moves forward in an impressive crescendo, and with a sort of tramp-like rythm that gives a distinctive character to this part of the movement. There is an exquisite bit of melody beautifully instrumentated just where the sound of the hunt dies away, and an exhilarating suggestion of the cool, invigorating breath of morning, and the awakening life of the woods in the passages that immediately precede the close.

Instead of movement from the Brahms concerto for violin, which was to have been played by Mr. Kueisel, a Rondo Coppreccecoso, by Roff, a composition full of melody and an airy grace and daintiness, was given by Mr. Admanowski, with marvelous finish and delicacy of touch. His phrasing was so clean, his tone so clear, and there was such etherial his solo furnished a most charming div lightness of touch in his execution that his solo furnished a most charming diversion in the midst of the more serious work of the orchestra.

The impression made by Miss Marie Jahn was in the highest degree favorable. Her first selection was an air from Tanhauser, "O, Lovely Hall," which she sang with much spirit and effectiveness. Her voice is a soprano of more than ordinary power, with a strong dramatic equality, which found an opportunity for force and breadth of expression in the air which she sang with feeling and artistic discrimination. The three songs of lighter character, which came later in the evening, were also admirably sung.

The Greig Suite Peer was given by the orchestra here last year. The music was originally written for a stage production of Ibsen's drama of the same name, and the suite is but a small part of the voluminous music written for that occasion. In its present shape it consists of a very beautiful allegro, pastoral in character, representing daybreak; a funeral march entitled the "Death of Aase," which is most beautifully expressive of departing life, fainting away at the close like a lost sigh; a charmingly graceful mazurka and a final movement, very grotesque and in march time which represents the experience of Peer Gynt in the Hall of the Mountain King, where he falls in love with the King's daughter and is punished for his presumption by being turned over to the Imps, who torment him to their satisfaction, and finally turn him out of the palace. The first three movements are melodious, quiet and graceful, requiring great delicacy of execution, while the third, in strong constrst to these, is single crescendo rising toward the close with a steadily increasing tempo, that presents a wonderfully grotesque effect and the performance of it as given by the Boston Orchestra is a feat in execution. Mr. Nikisch added the prelude to Wagner's Meistersinger to the programme as originally published. This number furnished an impressive close for the concert. The Orchestra gave it with all the pomp of instrumentation and orchestral color for which Wagner is distinguished, even in what is called his "early period."

A number not to be passed over was the symphonic poem of Saint Saens, the Youth of Hercules. It was based upon a legend to the effect that Hercules in his youth was beset by the Nymphs and Bauhontes, who sought to entice him from the path of glory, in spite of which he chose struggle and combat. The piece is developed from two themes that follow the idea conveyed in the legend, and are worked up toward the close in a fine crescendo. It was an interesting number and was given a characteristic interpretation by the Orchestra. The programme for this afternoon is as follows:

Overture—Mignon—Ambroise Thomas.
Selection—From "Symphonie Orientale"—B. Godard. (A) "Nikia's Dream." (B) "In the Hammock."
Songs with Piano: (A) "Florian's Song"—Godard. (B) Vergebliches Standchen—Brahms. (C) "Fruhlingsnacht"—Schumann. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Rhapsodie—For Orchestra, in A—Lalo. Andantino · Allegretto Presto.
Symphonic Poem—"Tasso, Lament and Triumph"—Liszt.
Cavatina—From "Faust"—Gounod.
Concerto Allegro for Violin—"Perpetual Motion"—Paganini.
Overture—Tannhauser—Wagner.

The programme for to-night will consist of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelsshon's "Elijah," together with some of the solos in both works. The choruses in the "Stabat Mater" are wonderfully scored for orchestra in the modern style, and there is probablp nothing in the whole range of music by a living composer that has been so well received by connoiseurs. The performance tonight will be preparatory to the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will afford an opportunity to study the peculiar beauties of the composition.

The "Elijah" choruses are always effective, and they will be given with the recitatives so as to preserve the dramatic connection, and enable the audience to understand the motive of the work.

The incidental solo parts in both works will be sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Something About Its Personnel—A Talk With Conductor Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of musicians from all the great cities of Europe and includes a number from the most famous musical oganizations on the continent. Of those who are better known in this country is Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist. He was originally a member of the celebrated Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, but afterward played with Emma Thursby and later with the Clara Louise Kellogg Concert Company.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist, has a national reputation. Mr. Charles Molo, first flute, and Mr. A. Sautel, the first oboe, are among the latest and most valued acquisitions to the orchestra, having been secured after the destruction by fire of the Opera Comique in Paris. Mr. A. Hackebrath, first horn, was formerly with Thomas' Orchestra. Pierre Muller, first trumpet, was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra, Paris. The following violinists, who are now members of the Boston Orchestra, were formerly of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna: Otto Roth, L. Snecenski, A. Moldauer, E. Fieldler, and E. Grunberg.

Mr. Nikisch is the youngest leader ever at the head of the orchestra. He is not yet thirty-five years of age, but looks older. He is the third leader of the orchestra, the other two having been George Henschel, who occupied the position for three years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who was conductor for the next five. Since Mr. Nikisch assumed charge, two years ago, the organization has advanced in every way. Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian. His voice is soft, and though he does not pose as a singer, yet when he attempts a part for the instruction of others, his tones show remarkable qualities of sweetness and expression. As soon as the chorus was placed at the rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr. Nikisch was introduced to the members by Mr. Shackleton. He apologized for his inability to speak pure English, but added that he would be understood, as there was one language common to musicians, that of the heart. The chorus and members of the orchestra applauded his graceful speech, which he acknowledged in a few words.

At the close of the rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch was seen by a reporter. Speaking of the local talent displayed in the chorus, he said: "Louisville must be a great musical center judging each from the quantity and quality of the chorus I have been conducting this afternoon. When I heard that the members had been rehearsing for only three months I was astonished, for the promptness in which the members make their entrance and the modulations of their tones is marvelous. It is the best chorus I have yet found upon a first rehearsal. I had to correct them but twice, and made them repeat only a few more times. Their training has been excellent."

"I have noticed one thing peculiar to the American people. They have a wonderful amount of musical energy. They accomplish much more in a short period than Europeans can do. They take hold of a part with a vim and never stop until it is mastered.

"I have been greatly satisfied with my reception at every place I have been. I find that the average American audience is far more appreciative of classical music than a European, and especially a German audience. It is a common thing to hear musicians abroad speak in slighting terms of American music, and, in fact, before coming here I was imbued with the same idea. Now I would much prefer to play classical music before an American audience than before a European."

Mr. Nikisch added that he considered Boston the ideal music city.

Courier-Journal.
PUBLISHED DAILY, SUNDAY AND WEEKLY
Office: Cor. Fourth Avenue and Green Street, LOUISVILLE.
THURSDAY.....MAY 14, 1891

THE MAY FESTIVAL.

Two concerts were given at the Auditorium yesterday, in one of which the local chorus took a highly creditable part. It is probable that the chorus was a surprise to most of those who have been hearing of it for the past three months, both in the volume of the tone and in the progress made in the brief space that has elapsed since it was organized. The open rehearsal last night was sufficient evidence that Director Nikisch's commendation of the work of the chorus was something more than an empty compliment, and both Mr. Shackelton and the members of the chorus are entitled to much patting on the back for the amount of hard work done in the short time they have been acting together. There are passages here and there that are not as smooth as they might be, nor as smooth as they will be upon the next appearance of the chorus, but in general the work is careful, intelligent and spirited, and the choruses selected for the rehearsal last night were given in a manner that must have been altogether unexpected to many who heard them. It was a compliment to the chorus that the house was almost as well filled last night as on the previous evening, and this is no slight tribute when it is remembered that there were no numbers by the orchestra, and no solos except those incidental to the selections from the two oratorios. The concert began with the selections from Dvorak's Stabat Mater, which is to be given entire Friday night, and all of the numbers except two were sung. The Stabat Mater is as fine an example of that class of music as could have been chosen for the occasion; full of melody, beautifully scored, and at the same time within easy reach of those who are to sing it. There is a very beautiful prelude for the orchestra, in which the horns carry the air of the old Latin hymn which furnishes the theme for the first quartette and chorus, "Stabat Mater Doloroso," which is worked out with considerable elaboration and has a fine climax for it. The quartette was composed of Miss Katie Elliot, Mrs. Shackelton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Louis Williams, who sang the music admirably, sustaining the principal parts effectively against the full volume of orchestra and chorus. This was the most impressive number of the Stabat Mater given last night, though the other numbers went smoothly.

The somber and massive Elijah of Mendelssohn is more of an undertaking than the Stabat Mater, but here also the progress of the chorus has been surprising in view of the time spent upon it. All of the more important choruses were rehearsed last night, with the recitative, which serves to link them together, Mr. Louis Williams' delivery of he recitative and his work in the concerted numbers was highly meritorious. The audience was only reminded of the fact that they were attending a rehearsal at one or two points at which Director Nikisch paused to insist upon a little more or a little less vigor of expression; in the main the choruses went with great smoothness and were marked by intelligent phrasing and the careful shading that is always to be looked for in a body that has been under Mr. Shackleton's direction. The splendid stirring chorus, "Thanks be to God," as well as the first Baal chorus were given with great spirit and confidence, and judging from the preliminary effort the presentation of the oratorio on Saturday evening will be an event upon which all concerned in it may be congratulated. The concert in the afternoon was an exceedingly pleasing one; it was addressed to the popular taste and seemed to reach its destination with satisfactory directness.

The audience was much larger than was to be expected, considering the rival attractions with which the matinee had to compete. It was composed almost entirely of ladies, but made a brave showing, both in point of numbers and in the interest manifested in the music. The features of the programme were the rhapsodie of Lalo and the prelude of Liszt, both of which are striking compositions, notwithstanding the fact that they merit the epithet "popular," and were incorporated in what is described in the printed programme as the "Young People's Popular Concert." The overture to Mignon, which was the opening number, was beautifully given by the orchestra, and a charming novelty was introduced in the selections from Godard's "Symphonie Orientale," "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock," both of which were full of melody and rich in orchestral color. In the rhapsodie by Lalo the audience was introduced to a new composer, a Spaniard, who is identified with the modern French school, of which Massenet, Godard and Saint Saens are representatives.

It is original in the treatment and all the possibilities of the modern orchestra are brought into play, with effects that are often odd and piquant. Next to the Rhapsodie the Liszt prelude was the most interesting number of the programme. It is the symphonic poem, entitled the "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," constructed upon the poems of Byron and Goethe, upon the same subject. The composer has taken for the chief motive of the work a fragment of a Venetian Gondolier's song, a broad, flowing melody full of pathos that is admirably adapted to the expression of the deep sadness of Tasso's life, and has developed it elaborately, carrying it on and bringing it into the scene of triumph with fine effect. Mrs. Nikisch, who was announced for three songs, did not appear, and instead of her number, three short 'cello solos were given, a nocturne by Chopin, an air by Massenet and a gavotte by Popper, and the selections were so artistically played as to propitiate the audience, which was at first inclined to resent the change.

The sensation of the afternoon was the barytone solo of Signor Campanari, who sang Valentine's "Farewell" from Faust so admirably as to precipitate an ovation. He was recalled again and again, and only the rigid rule of no encores prevented his being recalled indefinitely.

[illegible] Louisville, May 14, 1891.

OPEN REHEARSAL.

Novel Concert In the May Music Festival Series.

Magnificent Vocal Work of Mr. Shackleton's Big Mixed Chorus.

Gossip About Nikisch's Debut In Oratorio and Other Matters.

SOME NOTABLES PRESENT.

The second evening of the May Music Festival under the auspices of the Commercial Club, while the singing was of a higher, or, at least, of a more severe order than that of the night before, was a grand success. The crowd, in spite of the fact that the concert was in the nature of an open rehearsal for the music of Friday and Saturday nights, contained not only all the music lovers and music connoisseurs of the city, but many of those who simply affect music and who expect to hear the complete performance on those respective nights. And all those capable of giving the nicest critical opinion, not only gave Mr. Nikisch great praise for his magnificently facile leadership, but also pronounced the chorus the finest they had ever heard. Naturally, the programme seemed somewhat tedious last night to many of those who had never had an entire evening of the severe oratorio music before, and perhaps never an entire evening of anything more severe than comic opera or the marine band.

* * *

In the "Elijah" music the greatest strength and self-confidence was noticed, both in the orchestra and among the choristers. The music was given with magnificent strength, rich coloring and exquisite phrasing that is unfamiliar to Louisville musicians outside of the old Oratorio Society circles. And all the old Oratorio Society members who could be there were present, and some, of course, were in th chorus.

Perhaps the best individual piece of the evening, however, was No. 8 of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," and it had the approval, at least, of all the choicest music lovers of the city present. Rev. Charles E. Craik, who is accustomed to the magnificent music of his own Christ Church choir, has been an attentive listener to all the concerts. Last night he sat well back in the dress circle, where he could have the rich blending of voices and instruments, and he bestowed unstinted praise upon the closing number of the Dvorak music. With the exception of that number, the Elijah music was generally given the preference, which is natural, as the music is altogether more familiar.

The incidental solos by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mrs. Slaughter and Mr. Williams showed how well off Louisville is in the way of fine voices. Miss Katie Elliott was in especially fine voice. Her singing blended with, yet rose supreme above, orchestra and chorus at times in bursts of sweet harmony.

* * *

The social features of the evening were not as conspicuous as on Tuesday night, because the society people had all enjoyed the light and most pleasing matinee programme and did not want to destroy the impression with the heavy classical music of last night, especially as the concert was in the nature of an open rehearsal of the Friday and Saturday night music. The open rehearsal idea, in fact, did not seem to take well, in spite of the fact of its novelty and that a Louisville audience all run after the novel. They prefer to hear the complete final programme. But it must be remembered that last night's "open rehearsal" was only an imitation rehearsal, after all. Several times Mr. Nikisch audibly directed the singers and his musicians to change the tempo, the coloring, phrasing or what not to suit his own exquisite taste. But it is to be noticed that this was rather to keep up the idea of an informal open rehearsal than for any technical reason. The open rehearsals proved a most attractive feature of the concerts [illegible] during the regular [illegible] orchestra there [illegible]

Nikisch never conducted such heavy music [illegible] somewhat previous. He conducted the greater part of the time last night with his little willow stick in his left hand. It is wonderful how such a light wand can sustain the weight of such a ponderous orchestra and chorus, and it is really very little matter whether he conducts right handed or left-handed, just so he conducts at all. Besides, last night's informal open rehearsal may have had something to do with it, and at any rate it requires some very nice thinking to discern why one shouldn't just as properly conduct with his baton in one hand as in the other.

* * *

It was noticeable that many of the connoisseurs left their proper seats and lingered on the outskirts of the dress circle, where both the best view of the stage and the best combined effects of the singing and the orchestra were obtainable. Many people went in the gallery, which was found to be really the best place in the house for hearing. The view of the stage and the value of the stage sittings was also surprisingly much finer, as a whole, than could be had from much nearer seats down stair. Mr. Fernald, the musical critic of the Boston Journal, accompanied by his wife and several other musical people of Boston, who are making the tour with the orchestra, or are financially interested in it, sat in the gallery all the evening from choice.

* * *

Mr. Fernald pronounced the chorus, not part of the finest, but, perhaps, the finest that he ever heard. He also stated that last night possessed a fictitious interest on account of the fact that it was Mr. Nikisch's debut in oratorio music in America, though he frequently has conduted oratorio on the other side. Considering last night's concert only an open rehearsal, Friday night will witness his formal debut as a conductor of oratorio in America.

* * *

In Mr. Daniel Quilp's private box last night were seated Mr. and Mrs. Toomey, of St. Louis. Accompanying them was Miss Augusta Savage.

Mr. Toomey is the famous scenic artist, and he is here to arrange for the Bernhardt production next fall, Bernhardt being now on her way to Australia. In fact, the work of designing the scenery is already well in hand, and men are actually at work on the big paint frame at the back of the stage while the concerts are going on.

The other boxes were not occupied.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch did not appear at the popular-classic matinee yesterday. It was announced that she was indisposed. More interest had been awakened in the singing of Mrs. Nikisch than in any other single feature of the Music Festival, and it was a serious disappointment which many of the matinee-goers are inclined to resent, whether deservedly or not. It is to be hoped that when she does appear to-night she will not be greeted with a chill, for singers, like other human beings, are always very human.

* * *

The concert was a little inclined to the long-drawn-out sort last night. Many left during the rendering of the closing numbers of the "Elijah" music.

* * *

The number of preachers in attendance is something remarkable, as the Auditorium is not generally a preachers' resort during drama or opera seasons. The class known to theater-goers as "churchy" people is also numerous.

* * *

Miss Clementine de Vere, who sings Friday and Saturday nights, was the principal singer the first night of the Pittsburgh Musical Festival, which began last Tuesday night. She arrived to-day.

* * *

Among the prominent gentlemen present, most of whom were accompanied by ladies, were Judge Goodloe, John L. Dodd, Prof. Burcke, S. P. Graham, Dr. Cottell, Dr. Coleman Rogers, Thomas Speed, Charles H. Gibson, Thomas B. Morton, B. M. Creel, John F. Downing, Mr. Fonda, William Gordon, Rev. Charles F. Craik, J. W. Nichols, Dr Mandeville Thum, A. R. Almond, William Semple, A. G. Munn, Dr. B. Oscar Doyle, Hon. Attilla Cox, George W. Newman and others.

The Louisville Post.

THURSDAY, - - - MAY 14, 1891

IN OPEN REHEARSAL.

The Festival Shows Its Mettle at the Night Concert.

Popular Music Given by the Orchestra in the Afternoon—A Brahms and Wagner Program Announced for This Evening.

A magnificent audience, largely composed of ladies, was present at the Nikisch matinee at the Auditorium, yesterday afternoon. The program was headed "Young People's Popular Concert," but the music was of that high order characteristic of the Nikisch programs. There was great disappointment that Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to appear in the three songs announced for her. In their stead three 'cello solos were given, and so artistically that the audience were disposed to be lenient with the sick list. The orchestra was in fine trim and the music was up to its always high standard of excellence, there being but one number which did not merit the hearty encore given it, and that was "Perpetual Motion," by the violins and piano, Mrs. Nikisch being the accompanist. The composition is perhaps intended to show some of the usually unperceived difficulties of the violin, but it cannot claim the possession of any other virtue, save brevity. It was unique without being pretty. The opening number was the "Overture to Mignon," a superb thing and superbly rendered. A rhapsodie by Lalo was a sample of Spanish music which captured all honors, the quaint effects of the peculiar orchestration being full of melody and novelty. The "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" is a grand musical poem, full of pathos and overflowing with melody and emotion. To many it was the most enjoyable selection of the concert.

Signor Campanari captured the audience with his great voice in Valentine's "Farewell," from "Faust." He is a modest, unpretentious looking man, but as soon as he opened his mouth it was plain that he knew how to sing. His voice is a fine baritone and he uses it to the best advantage. As he closed there was the most rapturous applause yet heard at the Festival, and the singer was recalled five or six times, but no encores are allowed, and the audience reluctantly let him go.

THE OPEN REHEARSAL.

At night there was an "open rehearsal" and an audience of more than two thousand people heard the great festival chorus sing for the first time in public. The program embraced copious selections both from the "Stabat Mater" and the "Elijah." The stage was completely filled by the 250 singers and the orchestra, and presented a striking appearance. The sopranos were ranged in front to the left of the conductor, the contraltos to his right, while the tenors and bassos were seated to the rear. The members of the chorus were in evening dress and were seated and arranged in a methodical manner which insured unity of action. The "rehearsal" demonstrated the fact that Louisville has the largest, best balanced and best drilled chorus ever organized here. Considering the time for preparation and the circumstances under which it was formed, the results attained have been truly remarkable and reflect credit on their leader, Mr. Shackleton, and all who assisted him. In many of the choruses last night the shading was exquisite and called forth the earnest commendation of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. At the preliminary rehearsal on Tuesday afternoon Mr. Nikisch stated that he had never known a large chorus to do so well on singing for the first time with orchestral accompaniment. The chorus is well balanced, although, probably from the arrangement of the stage, the female voices were at times unduly predominant. The great choir contains some excellent readers, otherwise they could scarcely have followed so accurately the baton of Mr. Nikisch, to whose methods of conducting they were entirely unaccustomed. There was plenty of strength and power when needed and also a proper regard for the dramatic requirements of the music. Fine results may be expected from such an organization and it is to be hoped it will become permanent.

As last night was the first time, excepting the few selections sung on Tuesday afternoon, that the chorus and the orchestra had gone over the music together Director Nikisch made an "open rehearsal" of it in fact as well as name. He is confident that the chorus will do great work in "Elijah" on Saturday and he was careful to impress upon them his ideas of how it should be sung to secure the best effect. Half a dozen times he stopped the proceedings in order to make a suggestion or insist upon a particular form of rendition. On three occasions the flaw was in the orchestra, which did accompany to suit him. At another time he stopped the chorus while singing "Lord, Hear and Answer," in order to suggest a climax from piano to fortissimo, and kept them singing the passage till the desired effect was attained, when Nikisch cried "Bravo." Once some confusion was caused by a misunderstanding as to what page the chorus was to begin on. The audience was a little puzzled at these proceedings and began to fear that maybe the distinguished director was dissatisfied. The fact was the contrary. The chorus, on the whole, did work of surprising excellence, and at no time was there any break or flaw on their part which would have been noticed by the audience.

The choruses were given with most perfect shading, and in the selections from the "Stabat Mater" especially the crescendoes and diminuendoes were marvelously well done. The pianissimo effects were better brought out by the chorus than by the orchestra, which played too loud at times. The closing chorus, "Quando Corpus Morietur," with the "Amen," is very difficult, and the way it was given was evidence of superior training. Dvorak's beautiful but melancholy composition is full of strange intervals and close harmonies, and will test the capacity of any company of singers. It is as different as possible from Rossini's setting of the same famous hymn. The incidental quartets were acceptably sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

In the "Elijah" choruses, most of which were given, the singers were given more opportunity for dramatic expression and in most of the selections their performance was beyond criticism. Their attack was generally firm and decisive, there was no lagging or tardiness, the quality of tone was good and the phrasing satisfactory. There was an artistic finish to their work that was scarcely expected. In the chorals, "He, Watching Over Israel," and "God the Lord Passed By," the qualities mentioned were especially conspicuous, and in the "Baal" choruses there were a good deal of fire and vigor. Mr. Lewis Williams sang the recitatives which fall to the part of "Elijah." Although his position was a trying one, he sang with that robustness and resonance for which he is noted. Mr. Williams always sings as if he meant it, and his performance last night was very creditable. Nothing better was done during the evening than his solo "Fac ut Ardeat," with chorus, in the Stabat Mater. Mr. Slaughter was entirely satisfactory in the small part of "Ahab."

A mistake was made in preparing so long a program and a good many of the audience, owing to the lateness of the hour and to the lack of variety in the music (it being almost entirely choral), left before the conclusion. One thing is certain from the experience of last night: We may exect on Friday and Saturday evenings the finest choral performances ever given in this city.

Tonight is devoted to music of the modern school:

GRAND CLASSICAL CONCERT.

Program.

Overture—"Prometheus Bound"..Goldmark
Symphony—"No. 2 in D Op. 73".....Brahms
Allegro ma non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso: presto
Allegro con spirito
Cavatina—From Samson and Delilah....
..... Saint-Saens
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Waldweben—From Siegfried" .....Wagner
(Voices of the Forest.)
Prelude and Liebestod—"Tristan and Isoide"..... Wagner

The Labor Movement.

The labor organizations of Louisville have

The Louisville Post.

FRIDAY, - - - - - MAY 15, 1891

MODERN MUSIC.

The Fourth Concert of the Musical Festival.

One of the Most Perfect Orchestra Performances Ever Listened to by a Louisville Audience—Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" Tonight.

The concert last night at the Auditorium was as near the perfection of orchestra music this city has ever enjoyed. The program, which looked somewhat trying to those unfamiliar with the numbers, proved the most interesting of the week so far, and the warmth and evident sincerity of the applause showed that it was appreciated. The selections were all from the modern school, and included Goldmark, Brahms and Wagner. The first named composer's overture, "Prometheus Bound," opened the evening and the orchestra, which appeared in unusually good form, gave it in a way that brought out all the variety of tone color which Goldmark is fond of using. The strings have some melodious work and there are also charming passages for the 'cellos and wood wind.

The Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D., had, we believe, never before been given here. It proved decidedly effective and, in spite of the elaboration with which it is worked out, was intelligible and entertaining. Its melodic beauty was a surprise. It contains enough melodies to stock fifty ordinary ballads or dance tunes. The third movement, the scherzo, was very daintily given and met with liberal applause. The first movement, allegro non troppo, and the second, adagio non troppo, are full of graceful themes ingeniously interwoven. The former is of a bright, cheerful character, the latter more pensive and mysterious. The melody flows about amid a dozen keys, sometimes prominent, sometimes lost, like a streamlet hidden by excess of flowers. Then a new theme is heard and mingles with the old, like the "meeting of the waters." The fourth and closing movement of the symphony leads up to a fitting climax. The music of Brahms is said by the critics to resemble that of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schumann rather than the modern school. Certainly there is no touch of Wagnerism, and his symphonies show a careful attention to form and to the old traditions of the masters. The audience was agreeably surprised at the character of the composition.

[illegible] illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, [illegible] Katie Elliott was substituted, singing an aria from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba." Her great popularity was attested by the approbation with which she was received. However, she has suffered from recent illness, and was scarcely in her best voice. Nevertheless, her singing was very creditable. Later on Signor Campanari, the baritone, gave the cavatina from "Faust," which took so well at the matinee. He was called out three or four times after singing.

Three numbers on the program were by Wagner and they were given an encore by director and orchestra. Those who have a vague idea that Wagner means an incomprehensible blare of horns and banging of drums should have heard the performance of the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." The musical portrayal of the sounds and influences of the forest is one of the finest passages in Wagner. It was played with unsurpassable sweetness and beauty. The man who could not enjoy such a performance, musical though it was, "hath no music in his soul"—at any rate, he need never expect to enjoy descriptive music. The prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the opera in which Wagner depicts in the richest tone-colors the passion of love, is a selection tolerably familiar to us by this time. Its rendition was another triumph for the orchestra.

The closing number was a novelty here, "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey" from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." The scene depicted begins at the moment when Siegfried turns to seek the fire-encircled rock and Brunhilde. The first motive heard is the Walsungen motive, symbolical of Siegfried's love for his parents. Joined to this are four others: "Siegfried the Walsung" (first horn), the "Rhinegold Song" (horns), "Glow of the Brightening Glare" (flute and clarinet), the "Voice of the Bird" (oboe). These ideas suggest Siegfried, the hero, the treasure he holds as possessor of the magic ring, the flames he is approaching and the bird which guide him. Soon is heard the fire motive in the strings in conjunction with Siegfried's horn. Interrupted by Siegfried's heroic motive, this idea is worked out at considerable length. The flames rise higher, then subside, and the slumber motive sounds. Siegfried has gained the rock, sees Brunhilde and the orchestra pictures his impressions.

The violins play the "wandering passage" as Siegfried nears Brunhilde. The orchestra now enters upon the "morning dawn" motive from "The Gotterdammerung." As day broadens and the sun rises high the horns give out the motive of "Siegfried, Son of the Forest," followed by another indicating Brunhilde's love for Siegfried, which the strings take to a fine climax. The section, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," begins with horn-calls, and a second time the hero passes through the fire. On reaching the Rhine, the wave-like motive sways the whole orchestra. Then comes the song of the Rhine daughters, interrupted by the "Rhinegold" motive, the symbol of desire and the motive of the ring. The arrangement closes with the Walhalla theme. Though torn from its proper environment of gorgeous stage-setting and appropriate acting, nevertheless, the orchestra made a very effective number of it.

Tonight we are to have orchestral and choral music both. Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" will be given entire with the distinguished soloists who have been so extensively advertised. The following is the program:

Part I.

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" Op 23..
.....Berlioz
Symphony—No. 7.....Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

Part II.

Stabat Mater—Op 58.....Antonin Dvorak
Miss Clementine De Vere, Soprano.
Miss Gertrude Edmands, Contralto.
Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Tenor.
Mr. William Ludwig, Bass.
Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 17, 1891.

CLOSING THE FESTIVAL.

Louisville's Enterprising Citizens Enjoy an Exceptional Treat.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 16.—The annual musical festival closed tonight, and the Commercial Club of Louisville are to be congratulated on the great success of the season.

Had it not been for the untiring zeal of this club in arranging this festival, Louisville would have lost a great deal.

The club enjoyed an orchestra which is known the country over, the Boston Symphony orchestra; they engaged as soloists the best talent in the East, and they obtained a grand chorus of 300 persons.

As all the people were guaranteed their expenses, the Commercial Club took upon its shoulders no little task. But the end justified the means, and the members of the club are tonight in their glory.

The season was brought to a close by a magnificent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass.

[145]

LOUISVILLE TIMES

Thursday Evening, May 14, 1891.

AN OPEN REHEARSAL.

Novel Concert In the May Music Festival Series.

Magnificent Vocal Work of Mr. Shackleton's Big Mixed Chorus.

Gossip About Nikisch's Debut In Oratorio and Other Matters.

SOME NOTABLES PRESENT.

The second evening of the May Music Festival under the auspices of the Commercial Club, while the singing was of a higher, or, at least, of a more severe order than that of the night before, was a grand success. The crowd, in spite of the fact that the concert was in the nature of an open rehearsal for the music of Friday and Saturday nights, contained not only all the music lovers and music connoisseurs of the city, but many of those who simply affect music and who expect to hear the complete performance on those respective nights. And all those capable of giving the nicest critical opinion, not only gave Mr. Nikisch great praise for his magnificently facile leadership, but also pronounced the chorus the finest they had ever heard. Naturally, the programme seemed somewhat tedious last night to many of those who had never had an entire evening of the severe oratorio music before, and perhaps never an entire evening of anything more severe than comic opera or the marine band.

* * *

In the "Elijah" music the greatest strength and self-confidence was noticed, both in the orchestra and among the choristers. The music was given with magnificent strength, rich coloring and exquisite phrasing that is unfamiliar to Louisville musicians outside of the old Oratorio Society circles. And all the old Oratorio Society members who could be there were present, and some, of course, were in th chorus.

Perhaps the best individual piece of the evening, however, was No. 8 of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," and it had the approval, at least, of all the choicest music lovers of the city present. Rev. Charles E. Craik, who is accustomed to the magnificent music of his own Christ Church choir, has been an attentive listener to all the concerts. Last night he sat well back in the dress circle, where he could have the rich blending of voices and instruments, and he bestowed unstinted praise upon the closing number of the Dvorak music. With the exception of that number, the Elijah music was generally given the preference, which is natural, as the music is altogether more familiar.

The incidental solos by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mrs. Slaughter and Mr. Williams showed how well off Louisville is in the way of fine voices. Miss Katie Elliott was in especially fine voice. Her singing blended with, yet rose supreme above, orchestra and chorus at times in bursts of sweet harmony.

* * *

The social features of the evening were not as conspicuous as on Tuesday night, because the society people had all enjoyed the light and most pleasing matinee programme and did not want to destroy the impression with the heavy classical music of last night, especially as the concert was in the nature of an open rehearsal of the Friday and Saturday night music. The open rehearsal idea, in fact, did not seem to take well, in spite of the fact of its novelty and that a Louisville audience all run after the novel. They prefer to hear the complete final programme. But it must be remembered that last night's "open rehearsal" was only an imitation rehearsal, after all. Several times Mr. Nikisch audibly directed his singers and his musicians to change the tempo, the coloring, phrasing or what not to suit his own exquisite taste. But it was to be noticed that this was rather to keep up the idea of an informal open rehearsal than for any technical reason. The open rehearsals proved a most attractive feature of the concerts in Boston during the regular season of the symphony orchestra there [illegible] requires time to make [illegible] of the Louisville

It seems that the remark about Mr. Nikisch never conducting with his left hand was somewhat previous. He conducted the greater part of the time last night with his little willow stick in his left hand. It is wonderful how such a light wand can sustain the weight of such a ponderous orchestra and chorus, and it is really very little matter whether he conducts right handed or left-handed, just so he conducts at all. Besides, last night's informal open rehearsal may have had something to do with it, and at any rate it requires some very nice thinking to discern why one shouldn't just as properly conduct with his baton in one hand as in the other.

* * *

It was noticeable that many of the connoisseurs left their proper seats and lingered on the outskirts of the dress circle, where both the best view of the stage and the best combined effects of the singing and the orchestra were obtainable. Many people went in the gallery, which was found to be really the best place in the house for hearing. The view of the stage and the value of the stage sittings was also surprisingly much finer, as a whole, than could be had from much nearer seats down stair. Mr. Fernald, the musical critic of the Boston Journal, accompanied by his wife and several other musical people of Boston, who are making the tour with the orchestra, or are financially interested in it, sat in the gallery all the evening from choice.

* * *

Mr. Fernald pronounced the chorus, not one of the finest, but, perhaps, the finest that he ever heard. He also stated that last night possessed a fictitious interest on account of the fact that it was Mr. Nikisch's debut in oratorio music in America, though he frequently has conduted oratorio on the other side. Considering last night's concert only an open rehearsal, Friday night will witness his formal debut as a conductor of oratorio in America.

* * *

In Mr. Daniel Quilp's private box last night were seated Mr. and Mrs. Toomey, of St. Louis. Accompanying them was Miss Augusta Savage.

Mr. Toomey is the famous scenic artist, and he is here to arrange for the Bernhardt production next fall, Bernhardt being now on her way to Australia. In fact, the work of designing the scenery is already well in hand, and men are actually at work on the big paint frame at the back of the stage while the concerts are going on.

The other boxes were not occupied.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch did not appear at the popular-classic matinee yesterday. It was announced that she was indisposed. More interest had been awakened in the singing of Mrs. Nikisch than in any other single feature of the Music Festival, and it was a serious disappointment which many of the matinee-goers are inclined to resent, whether deservedly or not. It is to be hoped that when she does appear to-night she will not be greeted with a chill, for singers, like other human beings, are always very human.

* * *

The concert was a little inclined to the long-drawn-out sort last night. Many left during the rendering of the closing numbers of the "Elijah" music.

* * *

The number of preachers in attendance is something remarkable, as the Auditorium is not generally a preachers' resort during drama or opera seasons. The class known to theater-goers as "churchy" people is also numerous.

* * *

Miss Clementine de Vere, who sings Friday and Saturday nights, was the principal singer the first night of the Pittsburgh Musical Festival, which began last Tuesday night. She arrived to-day.

* * *

Among the prominent gentlemen present, most of whom were accompanied by ladies, were Judge Goodloe, John L. Dodd, Prof. Burcke, S. P. Graham, Dr. Cottell, Dr. Coleman Rogers, Thomas Speed, Charles H. Gibson, Thomas B. Morton, B. M. Creel, John F. Downing, Mr. Fonda, William Gordon, Rev. Charles F. Craik, J. W. Nichols, Dr Mandeville Thum, A. R. Almond, William Semple, A. G. Munn, Dr. B. Oscar Doyle, Hon. Attilla Cox, George W. Newman and others.

The Louisville Post.

THURSDAY, - - - MAY 14, 1891

AN OPEN REHEARSAL.

The Festival Shows Its Mettle at the Night Concert.

Popular Music Given by the Orchestra in the Afternoon—A Brahms and Wagner Program Announced for This Evening.

A magnificent audience, largely composed of ladies, was present at the Nikisch matinee at the Auditorium, yesterday afternoon. The program was headed "Young People's Popular Concert," but the music was of that high order characteristic of the Nikisch programs. There was great disappointment that Mrs. Nikisch was too ill to appear in the three songs announced for her. In their stead three 'cello solos were given, and so artistically that the audience were disposed to be lenient with the sick list. The orchestra was in fine trim and the music was up to its always high standard of excellence, there being but one number which did not merit the hearty encore given it, and that was "Perpetual Motion," by the violins and piano, Mrs. Nikisch being the accompanist. The composition is perhaps intended to show some of the usually unperceived difficulties of the violin, but it cannot claim the possession of any other virtue, save brevity. It was unique without being pretty. The opening number was the "Overture to Mignon," a superb thing and superbly rendered. A rhapsodie by Lalo was a sample of Spanish music which captured all honors, the quaint effects of the peculiar orchestration being full of melody and novelty. The "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" is a grand musical poem, full of pathos and overflowing with melody and emotion. To many it was the most enjoyable selection of the concert.

Signor Campanari captured the audience with his great voice in Valentine's "Farewell," from "Faust." He is a modest, unpretentious looking man, but as soon as he opened his mouth it was plain that he knew how to sing. His voice is a fine baritone and he uses it to the best advantage. As he closed there was the most rapturous applause yet heard at the Festival, and the singer was recalled five or six times, but no encores are allowed, and the audience reluctantly let him go.

THE OPEN REHEARSAL.

At night there was an "open rehearsal" and an audience of more than two thousand people heard the great festival chorus sing for the first time in public. The program embraced copious selections both from the "Stabat Mater" and the "Elijah." The stage was completely filled by the 250 singers and the orchestra, and presented a striking appearance. The sopranoes were ranged in front to the left of the conductor, the contraltos to his right, while the tenors and bassos were seated to the rear. The members of the chorus were in evening dress and were seated and arranged in a methodical manner which insured unity of action. The "rehearsal" demonstrated the fact that Louisville has the largest, best balanced and best drilled chorus ever organized here. Considering the time for preparation and the circumstances under which it was formed, the results attained have been truly remarkable and reflect credit on their leader, Mr. Shackleton, and all who assisted him. In many of the choruses last night the shading was exquisite and called forth the earnest commendation of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. At the preliminary rehearsal on Tuesday afternoon Mr. Nikisch stated that he had never known a large chorus to do so well on singing for the first time with orchestral accompaniment. The chorus is well balanced, although, probably from the arrangement of the stage, the female voices were at times unduly predominant. The great choir contains some excellent readers, otherwise they could scarcely have followed so accurately the baton of Mr. Nikisch, to whose methods of conducting they were entirely unaccustomed. There was plenty of strength and power when needed and also a proper regard for the dramatic requirements of the music. Fine results may be expected from such an organization, and it is to be hoped it will become permanent.

As last night was the first time, excepting the few selections sung on Tuesday afternoon, that the chorus and the orchestra had gone over the music together Director Nikisch made an "open rehearsal" of it in fact as well as name. He is confident that the chorus will do great work in "Elijah" on Saturday and he was careful to impress upon them his ideas of how it should be sung to secure the best effect. Half a dozen times he stopped the proceedings in order to make a suggestion or insist upon a particular form of rendition. On three occasions the flaw was in the orchestra, which did accompany to suit him. At another time he stopped the chorus while singing "Lord, Hear and Answer," in order to suggest a climax from piano to fortissimo, and kept them singing the passage till the desired effect was attained, when Nikisch cried "Bravo." Once some confusion was caused by a misunderstanding as to what page the chorus was to begin on. The audience was a little puzzled at these proceedings and began to fear that maybe the distinguished director was dissatisfied. The fact was the contrary. The chorus, on the whole, did work of surprising excellence, and at no time was there any break or flaw on their part which would have been noticed by the audience.

Some of the choruses were given with almost perfect shading, and in the selections from the "Stabat Mater" especially the crescendoes and diminuendoes were marvelously well done. The pianissimo effects were better brought out by the chorus than by the orchestra, which played too loud at times. The closing chorus, "Quando Corpus Morietur," with the "Amen," is very difficult, and the way it was given was evidence of superior training. Dvorak's beautiful but melancholy composition is full of strange intervals and close harmonies, and will test the capacity of any company of singers. It is as different as possible from Rossini's setting of the same famous hymn. The incidental quartets were acceptably sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

In the "Elijah" choruses, most of which were given, the singers were given more opportunity for dramatic expression and in most of the selections their performance was beyond criticism. Their attack was generally firm and decisive, there was no lagging or tardiness, the quality of tone was good and the phrasing satisfactory. There was an artistic finish to their work that was scarcely expected. In the chorals, "He, Watching Over Israel," and "God the Lord Passed By," the qualities mentioned were especially conspicuous, and in the "Baal" choruses there were a good deal of fire and vigor. Mr. Lewis Williams sang the recitatives which fall to the part of "Elijah." Although his position was a trying one, he sang with that robustness and resonance for which he is noted. Mr. Williams always sings as if he meant it, and his performance last night was very creditable. Nothing better was done during the evening than his solo "Fac ut Ardeat," with chorus, in the Stabat Mater. Mr. Slaughter was entirely satisfactory in the small part of "Ahab."

A mistake was made in preparing so long a program and a good many of the audience, owing to the lateness of the hour and to the lack of variety in the music (it being almost entirely choral), left before the conclusion. One thing is certain from the experience of last night: We may exect on Friday and Saturday evenings the finest choral performances ever given in this city.

Tonight is devoted to music of the modern school:

GRAND CLASSICAL CONCERT.

Program.

Overture—"Prometheus Bound"..Goldmark
Symphony—"No. 2 in D Op. 73".....Brahms
Allegro ma non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso: presto
Allegro con spirito
Cavatina—From Samson and Delilah....
.....Saint-Saens
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Waldweben—From Siegfried".....Wagner
(Voices of the Forest.)
Prelude and Liebestod—"Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

The Labor Movement.

The labor organizations of Louisville have

The Louisville Post.

FRIDAY, - - - - - MAY 15, 1891

MODERN MUSIC.

The Fourth Concert of the Musical Festival.

One of the Most Perfect Orchestra Performances Ever Listened to by a Louisville Audience—Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" Tonight.

The concert last night at the Auditorium was as near the perfection of orchestra music this city has ever enjoyed. The program, which looked somewhat trying to those unfamiliar with the numbers, proved the most interesting of the week so far, and the warmth and evident sincerity of the applause showed that it was appreciated. The selections were all from the modern school, and included Goldmark, Brahms and Wagner. The first named composer's overture, "Prometheus Bound," opened the evening and the orchestra, which appeared in unusually good form, gave it in a way that brought out all the variety of tone color which Goldmark is fond of using. The strings have some melodious work and there are also charming passages for the 'cellos and wood wind.

The Brahms Symphony, No. 2, in D., had, we believe, never before been given here. It proved decidedly effective and, in spite of the elaboration with which it is worked out, was intelligible and entertaining. Its melodic beauty was a surprise. It contains enough melodies to stock fifty ordinary ballads or dance tunes. The third movement, the scherzo, was very daintily given and met with liberal applause. The first movement, allegro non troppo, and the second, adagio non troppo, are full of graceful themes ingeniously interwoven. The former is of a bright, cheerful character, the latter more pensive and mysterious. The melody flows about amid a dozen keys, sometimes prominent, sometimes lost, like a streamlet hidden by excess of flowers. Then a new theme is heard and mingles with the old, like the "meeting of the waters." The fourth and closing movement of the symphony leads up to a fitting climax. The music of Brahms is said by the critics to resemble that of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schumann rather than the modern school. Certainly there is no touch of Wagnerism, and his symphonies show a careful attention to form and to the old traditions of the masters. The audience was agreeably surprised at the character of the composition.

Owing to the continued illness of Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Katie Elliott was substituted, singing an aria from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba." Her great popularity was attested by the approbation with which she was received. However, she has suffered from recent illness, and was scarcely in her best voice. Nevertheless, her singing was very creditable. Later on Signor Campanari, the baritone, gave the cavatina from "Faust," which took so well at the matinee. He was called out three or four times after singing.

Three numbers on the program were by Wagner and they were given con amore by director and orchestra. Those who have a vague idea that Wagner means an incomprehensible blare of horns and banging of drums should have heard the performance of the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." The musical portrayal of the sounds and influences of the forest is one of the finest passages in Wagner. It was played with unsurpassable sweetness and beauty. The man who could not enjoy such a performance, musical though it was, "hath no music in his soul"—at any rate, he need never expect to enjoy descriptive music. The prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," the opera in which Wagner depicts in the richest tone-colors the passion of love, is a selection tolerably familiar to us by this time. Its rendition was another triumph for the orchestra.

The closing number was a novelty here, "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey" from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." The scene depicted begins at the moment when Sieg ried turns to seek the fire-encircled rock and Brunhilde. The first motive heard is the Walsungen motive, symbolical of Siegfried's love for his parents. Joined to this are four others: "Siegfried the Walsung" (first horn), the "Rhinegold Song" (horns), "Glow of the Brightening Glare" (flute and clarinet), the "Voice of the Bird" (oboe). These ideas suggest Siegfried, the hero, the treasure he holds as possessor of the magic ring, the flames he is approaching and the bird which guide him. Soon is heard the fire motive in the strings in conjunction with Siegfried's horn. Interrupted by Siegfried's heroic motive, this idea is worked out at considerable length. The flames rise higher, then subside, and the slumber motive sounds. Siegfried has gained the rock, sees Brunhilde and the orchestra pictures his impressions.

The violins play the "wandering passage" as Siegfried nears Brunhilde. The orchestra now enters upon the "morning dawn" motive from "The Gotterdammerung." As day broadens and the sun rises high the horns give out the motive of "Siegfried, Son of the Forest," followed by another indicating Brunhilde's love for Siegfried, which the strings take to a fine climax. The section, "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," begins with horn-calls, and a second time the hero passes through the fire. On reaching the Rhine, the wave-like motive sways the whole orchestra. Then comes the song of the Rhine daughters, interrupted by the "Rhinegold" motive, the symbol of desire and the motive of the ring. The arrangement closes with the Walhalla theme. Though torn from its proper environment of gorgeous stage-setting and appropriate acting, nevertheless, the orchestra made a very effective number of it.

Tonight we are to have orchestral and choral music both. Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" will be given entire with the distinguished soloists who have been so extensively advertised. The following is the program:

Part I.

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" Op 23..
.....Berlioz 3
Symphony—No. 7.....Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

Part II.

Stabat Mater—Op 58.....Antonin Dvorak
Miss Clementine De Vere, Soprano.
Miss Gertrude Edmands, Contralto.
Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Tenor.
Mr. William Ludwig, Bass.
Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 17, 1891.

CLOSING THE FESTIVAL.

Louisville's Enterprising Citizens Enjoy an Exceptional Treat.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 16.—The annual musical festival closed tonight, and the Commercial Club of Louisville are to be congratulated on the great success of the season.

Had it not been for the untiring zeal of this club in arranging this festival, Louisville would have lost a great deal.

The club enjoyed an orchestra which is known the country over, the Boston Symphony orchestra; they engaged as soloists the best talent in the East, and they obtained a grand chorus of 300 persons.

As all the people were guaranteed their expenses, the Commercial Club took upon its shoulders no little task. But the end justified the means, and the members of the club are tonight in their glory.

The season was brought to a close by a magnificent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" with the following soloists: Miss Clementine De Vere, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, bass.

[145]

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES

Friday Evening, May 15, 1891.

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

The Acme of Orchestral Music and An Enthusiastic Crowd.

Commercial Clubbers Being Congratulated Upon Their Magnificent Success.

Miss Katie Elliott Acceptably Takes Mrs. Nikisch's Place On the Programme.

TO-NIGHT'S CLASSIC FEAST

The fourth concert of the May Music Festival series at the Auditorium last night, was not the climax of the series, because that would indicate that the two more to follow might be expected to be less excellent. But the concert was the very acme of orchestral music. The key-note, a mean between the severe and heavy classical and the merely pleasing, was the Brahms' symphony, four movements.

If the dictum that "each individual listener gets out of a musical composition just what he brings to it in intelligence and sensibility, and no more," then it must be admitted that last night's audience was an ideal one, ideally cultivated, for there was more enthusiasm, more spontaneity manifest, than there has been, perhaps, at any other concert.

But "the intelligence and sensibility" idea, while altogether true, is misleading, from the fact that it is but part of one stupendous whole, and not the whole itself. The whole includes not only those of intelligence and sensibility, but those of intelligence, perhaps, and without the sensibility. The latter may have been troubled with sensibilities once, but are now troubled with matter-of-factness, and have an awkward way of asking: "What does it all amount to as far as I am concerned, if I, speaking only for myself, find a lot of it exceedingly far-fetched, and that it doesn't please me?" As to the dictum of "the greatest composers" who have put themselves on record to the effect that the rules are only for those who have no ideas," it may be stated—barring now, of course, Mr. Nikisch, symphony orchestra, etc.—that it is just this idea of being above all rules, when carried to an ultimate sequence, that peoples bedlam and causes chaos. Of course, there is a noble spurning of rules, sometimes, even when most obeyed, but the ultimate sequence just mentioned is responsible for the popular definition of genius that it is a quasi-madness only separated from the real article by tissue-paper partitions. A fundamental rule, perhaps, and those fundamental rules being, not definitely agreed upon, there is left wide room for difference of opinion—there is difference of opinion.

* * *

Mr. Nikisch is rather more conventional in his conducting, if one remembers correctly, than he was last year, when a Louisville audience heard him for the first time in a light classical programme.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch continues ill. This is quite a disappointment to the Louisville audience that wanted to hear the light but pleasing soprano voice that the famous young Hungarian composer's wife is said to possess. Miss Katie Elliott most acceptably filled Mrs. Nikisch's place on the programme. Of course her singing is too well known here to need an extended notice at this time. She gave a selection from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

* * *

Mr. Campanari, whose singing was the feature of the Wednesday afternoon concert, repeated his first triumph. He is said to possess that rare voice, a magnificent barytone—a thing almost as rare as a fine contralto.

* * *

As on other evenings, the social feature was noticeable—in fact more so, perhaps, than at any other of the present series of concerts. One of the largest audiences of the series was present.

The Commercial Clubbers are being congratulated warmly, and that right deservedly, upon the magnificent success of their enterprise. The annual or biennial May Music Festival, under their auspices, is bound to become an assured thing. It must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch and his magnificent orchestra, and such a magnificent chorus as that evolved by Mr. Shackleton out of home material, will do much to raise the general standard of musical intelligence in Louisville, as it would anywhere else, even if it does not possess the magic power to infuse the sensibility by which that same music may be to the fullest extent enjoyed.

* * *

To-night will be notable for the rendering of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," complete, an earnest of the excellence of the chorus in which having been given Wednesday night open rehearsal. Two numbers will precede the piece de resistance, and the incidental solos will be taken by Miss DeVere, Miss Edmands, Mr. Mockridge and Mr. Ludwig. The programme is as follows:

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" Op 23—Berlioz 8.

Symphony—No. 7 (Beethoven)—Poco sostenuto; Vivace. Allegretto. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo. Allegro con brio.

PART II.

Stabat Mater—Op 58 (Antonin Dvorak)—Miss Clementine De Vere, Soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, Contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, Bass; Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAY 17, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenade Concerts to Begin Monday, June 1.

Some Notable Benefits Announced—Ernst Perabo's Twenty-Fifth Artistic Year to Be Commemorated—The Symphony Orchestra's Annual Tour—News Notes, Comment and Gossip.

The opening of the promenade concert season at Music Hall on the evening of Monday, June 1, is being anticipated with much interest by all who have enjoyed these events in former seasons, and an immense patronage is confidently expected.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whose far-sighted judgment is due the establishment of these charming summer night entertainments, has well nigh completed the general plans for the season, and upon his return from his tour with the Symphony orchestra the coming week, will make a definite announcement of the arrangements.

The questions relating to the appointment of a conductor have caused much discussion among former patrons, and the several names brought forward have all found more or less support. There is a possibility that the appointment may fall to the lot of a very capable leader who has not before been identified with the local musical world, but his abilities will quickly win him a following here if he should be given the position.

There is small chance that the popular Adolf Neuendorff can again return to his old post at these concerts, his engagements for the season having been filled before the possibility of renewing the promenades was definitely determined.

The orchestra will number 50 men chosen from the ranks of the Symphony organization, and the programme for the season will be varied by solo numbers by both vocal and instrumental artists.

It is designed to again maintain the reserved seat system at some of the tables and a few seats in the balconies will also be held apart from those open to buyers of admission tickets.

The library for the orchestra has been stocked with many novelties, and now makes possible a repertoire for the coming season of unprecedented interest and variety.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The fifth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra ends with the Buffalo festival concerts of the coming week, the organization reaching this city a week from today. The orchestra has, during this series of concerts, more than confirmed the good impression made a year ago under Director Nikisch, and all the critics of the West have written words in high praise of the admirable work done in the several cities visited. During the week ending yesterday the orchestra has made a part of the festival forces at Louisville, and the success which has attended this musical enterprise has resulted largely from the contributions made to the programme by the Boston musicians. Mr. Nikisch has gained a great personal following among the music lovers of the several cities of the tour, and he has evidently added a large degree of popularity to the organization by reason of his own bearing throughout his travels. Although financial considerations are apparently a secondary consideration in the conduct of the affairs of the Symphony orchestra, it is gratifying to know that the tour of the present year surpasses that of any previous one in pecuniary results.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MAY 18, 1891.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

The Promenade Concerts in Music Hall.

Echoes from Festival Cities—A Boston Soprano.

An Inditement or a Joke—Notes and Nuggets.

It is not true that J. Eduard Strauss will conduct the Music Hall Promenade Concerts which begin Monday evening, June 1; nor is it affirmed that the best fiddler in the Symphony Orchestra will hold the stick over 50 of his companions; it may be the town will again welcome the genial Mr. Neuendorff, but even if he could transport from Mexico the library he always carries with him, it is feared he is Locked up elsewhere for the month of June. The conductor may be a spectacled viola player who—but another week will tell; meanwhile the management is planning a varied entertainment for the short span of these most popular and welcome entertainments.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters the last week of its long continued outing, Buffalo being the place, the Festival Association the contracting party of the first part. Last week the festival at Louisville occupied its time. This is an enterprise of importonce in Kentucky. For several seasons the Musical Club of Louisville, under Mr. C. H. Shackleton, have given concerts, improving its programme rather slowly but gradually; but previous to this year no affair of magnitude looking to a furtherance of only the best music has occupied the attention of its capital city. The successful result of the first festival is due to the fine spirit shown by the Commercial Club, which generously guaranteed the ambitious plans of Mr. Shackleton and his society for a five days' festival. The city responded admirably, and the excellent artistic results obtained were not gained at the expense of the Blue Grass pocket book. Not to mention Miss Higbee's loyal and incessant work for the cause in her department of the Courier-Journal would be to overlook an important factor in the result achieved.

Times-Star, Cincinnati, O.

Date 5-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Thomas on the 23d—Ballenberg and Lloyd Benefits.

To-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear at the

There should have been a series of at least three, but one is much better than none at all. The Odeon will be completely filled, as the subscriptions have made the financial part a success. Another evening with this superb organization will again set Cincinnatians longing for such an organization of their own and symphony seasons.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-16

Boston Letter

Our petted musical favorite, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take up a new departure next season. It will unite with the Boston Singers, one of the two best choruses of the city, led by George Osgood, the distinguished teacher, and supported by the most fashionable of our music lovers. That will weave choral works and instrumental music in the same program, and may well be taken as a hint by the Walter Damrosch orchestra in New York. The latter, by the way, is to be the richer through a loss of the Boston orchestra. Mr. Hekking, our eminent 'cellolst, has signed a contract to play under Damrosch's baton next season. Hekking, you will be interested to know, is said to have served as the model for Munkacsy's Christ in his great painting, "Christ Before Pilate." The striking resemblance of the two faces will be at once detected by New York audiences.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 5/17

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A May festival of unusual proportions has just been held in Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Commercial Club, an organization embracing some 1,500 of the leading citizens of Louisville. The festival extended over five days, and was carried on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by a chorus of 250 voices, formed three months ago by the club, with the assistance, as soloists, of Mrs. Nikisch, Fräulein Jahn, Miss De Vere, and Messrs. Mockridge and Ludwig. "Elijah" and Dvorak's Stabat Mater were the choral works performed. The brilliant success of the festival, which came to a close yesterday, proves that a lively appreciation of good music is not confined to the East. The Louisville Commercial Club, however, is entitled to the credit of having planned the affair, and of having borne it to a prosperous termination.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MAY 21.

MAY FESTIVAL INAUGURATED.

Buffalo's Music Hall Crowded with an Enthusiastic Audience.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 20.—The great May festival was inaugurated here this evening, with a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the following soloists: Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Francis Fischer Powers.

The affair was a grand success from start to finish. It was held in the great Music Hall, which was crowded to the doors.

The programme was divided into two parts, and opened with the following selections:

Overture—Leonore No. 3.....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.
Aria—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Mr. Powers.
Suite—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46.....Grieg
Daybreak.
The death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains
(The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mad scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.
(a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps..
(b) Dance of Sylphs.....
(c) Hungarian March.....
From the "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs, with piano.
(a) "Enchantment".....Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?".....Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

Part two was the oratorio, "Eve," by Massenet, and was rendered with the following cast:

Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival chorus of 500 voices and orchestra.
John Lund, Conductor

The festival continues for the week, with two concerts tomorrow, one Friday and two on Saturday.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MAY 22.

TWO SUCCESSFUL CONCERTS.

Buffalo's Music Hall Again Crowded to the Limit.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 21.—Music Hall was again filled this afternoon when the second concert of the festival was given by the Boston symphony orchestra and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Conrad Behrens, and Franz Rummel, solo pianist.

This was the first appearance of Mrs. Nikisch in this city, and her success was the same as in the other places she has appeared—overwhelming.

This was the programme:

Grande Polonaise.....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart
Mrs. Nikisch.
(a) Nikia's Dream.... } From Symphonic Orien-
(b) In the Hammock } tale, op. 84.....Godard
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, from La Juive.....Halevy
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Scherzo Capriccioso.....Dvorak
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Mr. Rummel.
Songs, with piano—
(a) Die Quelle.....Goldmark
(b) Florian's Song.....Godard
(c) Vergebliches Standchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
(a) The Linden Tree }
(b) The Wanderer.. } .....Schubert
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream....
Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The evening concert found the hall filled with the same representative audience. The programme was as varied as it was excellent. The soloists were Miss Mary Howe, Miss Marie Jahn and Mr. E. C. Bushnell, and this was the programme:

Overture, Oberon.....Von Weber
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Aria, Ocean, thou mighty monster, from Oberon, Von Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle.....John Lund
Mr Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and male chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra.....Lalo
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Bell song, Lakme.....Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (rustic wedding), op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato.
Molto.
Bridal song, allegretto.
In the garden, andante.
Dance, finale, allegro molto.
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Song, The Nightingale.....Allbreff
Miss Howe.
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Vorspiel und Liebestol, from Tristan und Isolde, Wagner
Boston Symphony orchestra
Chorale, from Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Festival chorus and orchestra.

The concert tomorrow evening will be a strictly classical one. Saturday afternoon the chorus of children will assist in the concert.

[146]

THE LOUISVILLE TIMES

Friday Evening, May 15, 1891.

THE FOURTH CONCERT.

The Acme of Orchestral Music and An Enthusiastic Crowd.

Commercial Clubbers Being Congratulated Upon Their Magnificent Success.

Miss Katie Elliott Acceptably Takes Mrs. Nikisch's Place On the Programme.

TO-NIGHT'S CLASSIC FEAST

The fourth concert of the May Music Festival series at the Auditorium last night, was not the climax of the series, because that would indicate that the two more to follow might be expected to be less excellent. But the concert was the very acme of orchestral music. The key-note, a mean between the severe and heavy classical and the merely pleasing, was the Brahms' symphony, four movements.

If the dictum that "each individual listener gets out of a musical composition just what he brings to it in intelligence and sensibility, and no more," then it must be admitted that last night's audience was an ideal one, ideally cultivated, for there was more enthusiasm, more spontaneity manifest, than there has been, perhaps, at any other concert.

But "the intelligence and sensibility" idea, while altogether true, is misleading, from the fact that it is but part of one stupendous whole, and not the whole itself. The whole includes not only those of intelligence and sensibility, but those of intelligence, perhaps, and without the sensibility. The latter may have been troubled with sensibilities once, but are now troubled with matter-of-factness, and have an awkward way of asking: "What does it all amount to as far as I am concerned, if I, speaking only for myself, find a lot of it exceedingly far-fetched, and that it doesn't please me?" As to the dictum of "the greatest composers" who have put themselves on record to the effect that the rules are only for those who have no ideas," it may be stated—barring now, of course, Mr. Nikisch, symphony orchestra, etc.—that it is just this idea of being above all rules, when carried to an ultimate sequence, that peoples bedlam and causes chaos. Of course, there is a noble spurning of rules, sometimes, even when most obeyed, but the ultimate sequence just mentioned is responsible for the popular definition of genius that it is a quasi-madness only separated from the real article by tissue-paper partitions. A fundamental rule, perhaps, and those fundamental rules being, not definitely agreed upon, there is left wide room for difference of opinion—there is difference of opinion.

* * *

Mr. Nikisch is rather more conventional in his conducting, if one remembers correctly, than he was last year, when a Louisville audience heard him for the first time in a light classical programme.

* * *

Mrs. Nikisch continues ill. This is quite a disappointment to the Louisville audience that wanted to hear the light but pleasing soprano voice that the famous young Hungarian composer's wife is said to possess. Miss Katie Elliott most acceptably filled Mrs. Nikisch's place on the programme. Of course her singing is too well known here to need an extended notice at this time. She gave a selection from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

* * *

Mr. Campanari, whose singing was the feature of the Wednesday afternoon concert, repeated his first triumph. He is said to possess that rare voice, a magnificent barytone—a thing almost as rare as a fine contralto.

* * *

As on other evenings, the social feature was noticeable—in fact more so, perhaps, than at any other of the present series of concerts. One of the largest audiences of the series was present.

The Commercial Clubbers are being congratulated warmly, and that right deservedly, upon the magnificent success of their enterprise. The annual or biennial May Music Festival, under their auspices, is bound to become an assured thing. It must be admitted that Mr. Nikisch and his magnificent orchestra, and such a magnificent chorus as that evolved by Mr. Shackleton out of home material, will do much to raise the general standard of musical intelligence in Louisville, as it would anywhere else, even if it does not possess the magic power to infuse the sensibility by which that same music may be to the fullest extent enjoyed.

* * *

To-night will be notable for the rendering of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," complete, an earnest of the excellence of the chorus in which having been given Wednesday night open rehearsal. Two numbers will precede the piece de resistance, and the incidental solos will be taken by Miss DeVere, Miss Edmands, Mr. Mockridge and Mr. Ludwig. The programme is as follows:

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini" Op 23—Berlioz 3.

Symphony—No. 7 (Beethoven)—Poco sostenuto; Vivace. Allegretto. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo. Allegro con brio.

PART II.

Stabat Mater—Op 58 (Antonin Dvorak)—Miss Clementine De Vere, Soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmands, Contralto; Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Tenor; Mr. William Ludwig, Bass; Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAY 17, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenade Concerts to Begin Monday, June 1.

Some Notable Benefits Announced—Ernst Perabo's Twenty-Fifth Artistic Year to Be Commemorated—The Symphony Orchestra's Annual Tour—News Notes, Comment and Gossip.

The opening of the promenade concert season at Music Hall on the evening of Monday, June 1, is being anticipated with much interest by all who have enjoyed these events in former seasons, and an immense patronage is confidently expected.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whose far-sighted judgment is due the establishment of these charming summer night entertainments, has well nigh completed the general plans for the season, and upon his return from his tour with the Symphony orchestra the coming week, will make a definite announcement of the arrangements.

The questions relating to the appointment of a conductor have caused much discussion among former patrons, and the several names brought forward have all found more or less support. There is a possibility that the appointment may fall to the lot of a very capable leader who has not before been identified with the local musical world, but his abilities will quickly win him a following here if he should be given the position.

There is small chance that the popular Ad Neue dorff can again return to his old post at these concerts, his engagements for the season having been filled before the possibility of renewing the promenades was definitely determined.

The orchestra will number 50 men chosen from the ranks of the Symphony organization, and the programme for the season will be varied by solo numbers by both vocal and instrumental artists.

It is designed to again maintain the reserved seat system at some of the tables and a few seats in the balconies will also be held apart from those open to buyers of admission tickets.

The library for the orchestra has been stocked with many novelties, and now makes possible a repertoire for the coming season of unprecedented interest and variety.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The fifth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra ends with the Buffalo festival concerts of the coming week, the organization reaching this city a week from today. The orchestra has, during this series of concerts, more than confirmed the good impression made a year ago under Director Nikisch, and all the critics of the West have written words in high praise of the admirable work done in the several cities visited. During the week ending yesterday the orchestra has made a part of the festival forces at Louisville, and the success which has attended this musical enterprise has resulted largely from the contributions made to the programme by the Boston musicians. Mr. Nikisch has gained a great personal following among the music lovers of the several cities of the tour, and he has evidently added a large degree of popularity to the organization by reason of his own bearing throughout his travels. Although financial considerations are apparently a secondary consideration in the conduct of the affairs of the Symphony orchestra, it is gratifying to know that the tour of the present year surpasses that of any previous one in pecuniary results.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, MAY 18, 1891.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

The Promenade Concerts in Music Hall.

Echoes from Festival Cities—A Boston Soprano.

An Inditement or a Joke—Notes and Nuggets.

It is not true that J. Eduard Strauss will conduct the Music Hall Promenade Concerts which begin Monday evening, June 1; nor is it affirmed that the best fiddler in the Symphony Orchestra will hold the stick over 50 of his companions; it may be the town will again welcome the genial Mr. Neuendorff, but even if he could transport from Mexico the library he always carries with him, it is feared he is locked up elsewhere for the month of June. The conductor may be a spectacled viola player who—but another week will tell; meanwhile the management is planning a varied entertainment for the short span of these most popular and welcome entertainments.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra enters the last week of its long continued outing, Buffalo being the place, the Festival Association the contracting party of the first part. Last week the festival at Louisville occupied its time. This is an enterprise of importonce in Kentucky. For several seasons the Musical Club of Louisville, under Mr. C. H. Shackleton, have given concerts, improving its programme rather slowly but gradually; but previous to this year no affair of magnitude looking to a furtherance of only the best music has occupied the attention of its capital city. The successful result of the first festival is due to the fine spirit shown by the Commercial Club, which generously guaranteed the ambitious plans of Mr. Shackleton and his society for a five days' festival. The city responded admirably, and the excellent artistic results obtained were not gained at the expense of the Blue Grass pocket book. Not to mention Miss Higbee's loyal and incessant work for the cause in her department of the Courier-Journal would be to overlook an important factor in the result achieved.

Date 5-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Thomas on the 23d—Ballenberg and Lloyd Benefits.

To-night the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear at the [illegible]. There should have been a series of at least three, but one is much better than none at all. The Odeon will be completely filled, as the subscriptions have made the financial part a success. Another evening with this superb organization will again set Cincinnatians longing for such an organization of their own and symphony seasons.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, New York, N. Y.

Date 5/16

Boston Letter

Our petted musical favorite, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to take up a new departure next season. It will unite with the Boston Singers, one of the two best choruses of the city, led by George Osgood, the distinguished teacher, and supported by the most fashionable of our music lovers. That will weave choral works and instrumental music in the same program, and may well be taken as a hint by the Walter Damrosch orchestra in New York. The latter, by the way, is to be the richer through a loss of the Boston orchestra. Mr. Hekking, our eminent 'cellolst, has signed a contract to play under Damrosch's baton next season. Hekking, you will be interested to know, is said to have served as the model for Munkacsy's Christ in his great painting, "Christ Before Pilate." The striking resemblance of the two faces will be at once detected by New York audiences.

V.

SUN, New York, N. Y.

Date 5/17

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A May festival of unusual proportions has just been held in Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Commercial Club, an organization embracing some 1,500 of the leading citizens of Louisville. The festival extended over five days, and was carried on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by a chorus of 250 voices, formed three months ago by the club, with the assistance, as soloists, of Mrs. Nikisch, Fraulein Jahn, Miss De Vere and Messrs. Mockridge and Ludwig. "Elijah" and Dvorak's Stabat Mater were the choral works performed. The brilliant success of the festival, which came to a close yesterday, proves that a lively appreciation of good music is not confined to the East. The Louisville Commercial Club, however, is entitled to the credit of having planned the affair, and of having borne it to a prosperous termination.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, MAY 21.

MAY FESTIVAL INAUGURATED.

Buffalo's Music Hall Crowded with an Enthusiastic Audience.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 20.—The great May festival was inaugurated here this evening, with a concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the following soloists: Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Francis Fischer Powers.

The affair was a grand success from start to finish. It was held in the great Music Hall, which was crowded to the doors.

The programme was divided into two parts, and opened with the following selections:

Overture—Leonore No. 3.....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.
Aria—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Mr. Powers.
Suite—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46.....Grieg
Daybreak.
The death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the halls of the king of the Dovre Mountains
(The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mad scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.
(a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps..
(b) Dance of Sylphs.....
(c) Hungarian March.....
From the "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs, with piano.
(a) "Enchantment".....Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?".....Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

Part two was the oratorio, "Eve," by Massenet, and was rendered with the following cast:

Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival chorus of 500 voices and orchestra.
John Lund, Conductor

The festival continues for the week, with two concerts tomorrow, one Friday and two on Saturday.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, MAY 22.

TWO SUCCESSFUL CONCERTS.

Buffalo's Music Hall Again Crowded to the Limit.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 21.—Music Hall was again filled this afternoon when the second concert of the festival was given by the Boston symphony orchestra and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Conrad Behrens, and Franz Rummel, solo pianist.

This was the first appearance of Mrs. Nikisch in this city, and her success was the same as in the other places she has appeared—overwhelming.

This was the programme:

Grande Polonaise.....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart
Mrs. Nikisch.
(a) Nikia's Dream...) From Symphonie Orien-
(b) In the Hammock) tale, op. 84.....Godard
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria, from La Juive.....Halevy
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Scherzo Capriccioso.....Dvorak
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Mr. Rummel.
Songs, with piano—
(a) Die Quelle.....Goldmark
(b) Florian's Song.....Godard
(c) Vergebliches Standchen.....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
(a) The Linden Tree)
(b) The Wanderer...).....Schubert
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream....
Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The evening concert found the hall filled with the same representative audience. The programme was as varied as it was excellent. The soloists were Miss Mary Howe, Miss Marie Jahn and Mr. E. C. Bushnell, and this was the programme:

Overture, Oberon.....Von Weber
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Aria, Ocean, thou mighty monster, from Oberon, Von Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle.....John Lund
Mr Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and male chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra.....Lalo
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Bell song, Lakme.....Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (rustic wedding), op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding march, with variations, moderato.
Molto.
Bridal song, allegretto.
In the garden, andante.
Dance, finale, allegro molto.
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Song, The Nightingale.....Allbreff
Miss Howe.
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Vorspiel und Liebestol, from Tristan und Isolde, Wagner
Boston Symphony orchestra
Chorale, from Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Festival chorus and orchestra.

The concert tomorrow evening will be a strictly classical one. Saturday afternoon the chorus of children will assist in the concert.

---

[146]

EXPRESS

Thursday Morning, May 21, 1891.

It Was Brilliant.

FIRST CONCERT OF THE GREAT MAY FESTIVAL.

Two Thousand Persons Present to Enjoy a Rare and Delightful Feast of Music.

EXCELLENT WORK OF ARTISTS AND ORCHESTRA,

An Exhilarating Musical Treat--The Concert Described--Scenes at Music Hall--To-day's Programmes.

Buffalo's fifth great Music Festival was inaugurated at Music Hall last evening under brilliant and encouraging auspices. The day had been a capricious one so far as the weather was concerned; but it was so uncertain that it would rain in the evening that probably few were deterred from making all necessary arrangements to attend the opening concert. A tantalizing drizzle set in been seven and eight o'clock, but it did not last long enough to dampen the enthusiasm of the large and eager company that presently assembled in Music Hall to enjoy an evening of inspiring music; nor did it in any way affect the spirit of the artists or other participants who provided the enjoyment of the occasion. Altogether the best cheer prevailed, and the evening was one long to be remembered for the exhilarating musical treat it offered. The details of the occasion, herewith given, will surely prove of interest not only to those who missed the opportunity of attending, but as well to those who had the good fortune to be present and for whom memory may repeat the inspiring programme.

AN IMPOSING SPECTACLE.

OVER 2,000 PERSONS PRESENT—THE DECORATIONS AND ARRANGEMENTS.

The outdoor and indoor arrangements were all that could be desired. The public were admitted through the Main Street entrance; the singers and members of the orchestra by the side door on Edward Street. Some who did not understand this were put to a little inconvenience in having to go around to the proper door. Order was preserved by four policemen in uniform, who were scattered around among the various entrances so as not to be conspicuous. A couple of members of the Fire Department were on hand near the stage, a rare precaution on such occasions.

The large army of ushers did good work, which was marred somewhat by a tendency to garrulity where perfect quiet was imperative. It is a rule of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wherever they go that the utmost stillness must prevail during their performances. So when the first number began last evening, a few minutes after eight, the doors were closed, and from 200 to 300 people had to bide their time outside until the number was completed. The moral from this is, don't be late.

The carriage arrangements were as nearly perfect as it was possible to have them.

The decorations were in excellent taste, reflecting credit on Mr. C. W. Pardee, chairman of the committee on box decoration; Mr. P. H. Griffin, chairman of the committee that looked after the stage, and Florist Scott.

The old drapery of the boxes was replaced by one more truly festival in character, consisting of Allegheny laurel enlivened by flowers in bloom and a unique system of two-candle incandescent light furnished by storage batteries, the whole giving the pretty effect of fire-flies as seen through shrubbery. In front of the stage were feathery palms and other choice exotics, while in the ceiling of the cove over the proscenium arch was the word in laurel "Euterpe" encircled in the Allegheny evergreen in honor of the goddess of music, one of the chief among the nine Greek muses. To make way for this appropriate decoration the old bars and ropes that were suspended over the proscenium have been removed. They were intended to afford facilities for the painting which the celebrated artist, H. Siddons Mowbray of New-York, is under contract to furnish as a setting of the proscenium cove. This is a work which it is estimated will take two years to complete and may cost from $3,000 to $4,000. The laurel decoration is regarded as so appropriate that it will probably be allowed to remain as a permanent feature until the new painting is undertaken, possibly not for a year or two.

A great improvement has been effected by the doing away with the side and overhead hangings, in which on former occasions volume of sound that should have been enjoyed [illegible] were lost. The new sounding [illegible] by Janitor J. W. [illegible] the volume of sound out into the hall, so that it can be heard distinctly in the vestibule and corridors.

The stage setting is larger than on former occasions, there being in all 465 chorus singers on the semi-circular tiers of seats.

Secretary Harrower was early on hand to look after the financial arrangements, and Mr. W. H. Brennan, the hall manager, was quite active in seeing to the wants of people in general.

THE AUDIENCE.

By eight o'clock the hall was well filled, and, as has been stated, hundreds were compelled to wait until the completion of the first number before they could be admitted to the floor. In addition to the elite of Buffalo, there were large contingents from Niagara Falls and adjacent towns in the general audience. Altogether there could not have been less than 2,000 people present, there being very few vacant seats up or down stairs.

From the main entrance to the grouping of singers on the stage the eye took in an imposing spectacle of feminine loveliness, gay attire, and artistic decoration. Rising in tiers above the space reserved for the orchestra, the gentlemen occupied the center seats, flanked on either side by the lady singers—a picturesque streak of black in a setting of white, all being in evening dress.

In the audience, as well as on the stage, most of the ladies were observed to be unbonneted.

The occupants of the lower boxes were as follows:

Box A—Mr. and Mrs. Wilson S. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Scatcherd, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin, Mrs. Sturges, Mrs. Cary, Miss Love, Miss Winnifred Scatcherd, and Miss Wood.

Box B—Gen. and Mrs. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Hayes, Miss Ussher, Miss Fowler, the Rev. Dr. John W. Brown, formerly of St. Paul's, now of St. Thomas's, New-York.

Box E—Mr. and Mrs. Willis O. Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Griffin, the Rev. Henry A. Adams, Miss McKenna, Mr. Arthur Coffey, Miss Martin, and Miss Gray.

Box F—This was reserved for the distinguished soloists during their intervals of rest. The upper boxes G, H and D were occupied by ladies of the Buffalo Female Academy, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams and Miss Hemenway.

Box G—Misses Ovens, Chittenden, Grace Jewett, Georgie Jewett, Murray, Williams, and Eaton, and Mr. J. J. McWilliams.

Box H—Misses Shipman, Peabody, Hawkins, Briggs, Wilhelm, Davis, and Norton, and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams.

Box D—Misses Hemenway, Geismer, Marcus, Wride, Hammond, Walbridge, Cook, and McWilliams.

Box C—Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pardee, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New-York, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Hunsicker, Judge and Mrs. Daniels.

THE CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

It was a magnificent picture which greeted the eye last night at Music Hall as Mr. Arthur Nikisch raised his baton as a signal that the May Festival would begin. On the stage were stationed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the large festival chorus. The stage had been extended in front for the accommodation of the orchestra, the main stage being reserved for the chorus, who were provided with rows of seats rising one above the other to a landscape scene that shows most prettily under the soft reflection of the light.

The stage, which was boxed in on three sides and overhead by the sounding board arrangement, which consists of heavy canvas which had been thoroughly soaked in alum water, after which it received three coats of white paint, proved to be very effective in preventing any of the sound from the chorus escaping into the flies, and throwing it forward to the audience.

THE USHERS.

The following gentlemen, under the direction of E. H. Rounds, chairman of the hall committee, acted as ushers: Murray Smith, Frank C. Reid, E. C. Rumrill, Selden Munger, H. E. Choate, Frank C. Perew, Harold Sidway, William Meadows, Burt Wheeler, F. C. Trubee, Frank Kimberly, George Himmelsbach, Fred Deming, Nat Hall, Joe Hadcock, C. D. Fowler, Howard Cornwell, D. Newhall, Jr., George P. Keating, Ned Newhall, Arthur Hayes, C. H. Williams, W. [illegible] Wheeler, William S. Barnett, George Lettis, and John Ogleveie,

THE CONCERT.

ONLY WORDS OF PRAISE FOR THE ORCHESTRA, SOLOISTS, AND CHORUS.

Within a few minutes after eight, Director Nikisch stepped to the footlights, and after bowing serenely to the great audience, ascended the director's stand and rapped for that alert attention which his men have so well learned to give. The opening number falling to the orchestra was Bethooven's famous "Leonore" overture No. 3, a work entirely familiar to local audiences, and which revealed new beauties under the clear and scholarly interpretation of Mr. Nikisch. Later on, the orchestra gave the entire "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, which had likewise been familiarized to the people of Buffalo by the home orchestra, and it received delicate and poetic treatment. The weird grace of the different movements was revealed with poetic charm, and the entire performance displayed that electric command of orchestral forces exercised by this director, and which has heretofore excited admiration. A similar line of comment is applicable to the remaining orchestral numbers, the "Minuet," "Dance of the Sylphs" and "Hungarian March" from "The Damnation of Faust," which followed later on. As the orchestra is to be heard in a great variety of selections during the week, some fuller mention of the detailed perfection of [illegible] may properly be reserved for a

The first of the vocal artists to appear was Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, who won the audience by a face and manner at once pleasing and winning. Her singing proved equally gracious. She has a fine alto voice of large range and sings with great ease, taste, and refinement. Her first number was the familiar aria from "Don Carlos" of Verdi, with orchestral accompaniment, and her effort met with great favor, resulting in a recall, in response to which she bowed her acknowledgments. Later on she sang a cycle of three songs, "Open Thy Blue Eyes," by Massenet; "Heart's Fancies," by Thomas, and "Donnez-vous?" by Wakerlin, which proved equally felicitous.

Miss Clementine De Vere contributed the difficult mad scene from Thomas's "Hamlet," and her beautiful voice, brilliant execution, and dramatic warmth united to arouse great enthusiasm; and she was twice recalled, to be saved from an active response only by the iron-clad rule forbidding encores. Miss De Vere has been heard in Buffalo before, and last evening's performance gave renewed evidence of her uncommon resources as a vocalist.

Mr. Francis Fisher Powers sang the aria "O tu Palermo," from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and showed the possession of a smooth and pleasing baritone voice, which he uses with quiet effectiveness. Mr. Powers's selection, as well as the three songs of Mrs. Wyman, were accompanied on the piano by Miss Bianca Fleischmann with her well-known taste and facility.

"EVE."

After a brief intermission, during which the audience became diffused in visiting friends, the listeners were recalled to their seats for the second part of the programme, which was devoted to Massenet's "Eve," "a mystery in three parts," as says the title page of Jules Massenet's cantata, and it was presented for the first time in Buffalo last night. The work treats of the birth of woman, the fall of our first parents, and the curse which fell upon them in consequence of their listening to the voice of evil. The opening depicts heavenly voices setting forth the beauties of nature—a soft breeze undulates the flowers of the field and the waves of the sea—while Adam in dreamless slumber is awakened by voices that seem to call from Heaven above, and beholds the woman arrayed in beauty and in love. The chorus informs him, "Man, thou art not alone." Then the woman appears to him and the duo between man and woman begins. The second part depicts Eve walking in the solitude of a forest, far from Adam, buried in thought, and listening to the voices which murmur about her. The third part is entitled "The Fall," and is composed of a love duet, which describes the rapture of the meeting and the temptation to the forbidden fruit.

As this was the first presentation of this work in Buffalo and its production enlisted the massed vocal and instrumental forces, as well as several of the most prominent soloists, the performance naturally had many elements of interest. "Eve" was written by Massenet in the year 1875 at about the middle of the distinguished French composer's career. The work does not readily submit to classification. It does not rise to the proportions or dignity of an oratorio, and is rather more serious and elaborate than what is commonly known as a cantata. By way of compromise, it might be called a sacred cantata—an expression which has of recent years been found at least convenient, if not at all times accurate, as embracing a large number of nondescript works of this type, something after the fashion of the medical science which groups unknown ailments under the head of malaria. Probably Massenet did not have in mind this difficulty of classification when he styled his work "A Mystery in Three Parts," though that term appears to define the situation.

The subject of "Eve" is readily suggested by its title. It represents the eventful scenes in the life of the first human pair in Eden. Fortunately, the text and libretto of the work are its worst and most uncomfortable features, and the general superiority of the music alone pardons the effort one feels called upon to make of shutting the eyes and ears to the words. Doubtless some allowance may be made for the deterioration of the text in its translation from French to English. It is safe to say, however, that the music generally is far superior to the text, seldom, if ever, dropping to its level. Indeed, this work affords a striking illustration of the inherent purity of music and of the impossibility of its alloy except through association with language. The score of this work is by no means sustained or of even merit, parts of it being more meritorious than others. Even in the matter of the sympathetic expression of the text, the music occasionally fails. Generally speaking, however, it may be said that Massenet has succeeded in his obvious endeavor to portray and emphasize the sensuous phase of the theme. Being master of the resources of modern orchestration, he has imparted to the work a dramatic charm and glow at once fascinating and inspiring. The variety and contrast of effects produced easily keep the attention on the alert and there is no flagging of interest in listening to the work. As intimated, the effects are occasionally more sensational than artistic, and in these instances the work drops to a lower level of French composition. Altogether the performance proved interesting and attractive, and as the composition is of mod[illegible] engaged in its production for their conscientious and painstaking preparation. The final narrative and chorus, expressing the curse, were discreetly omitted as being rather more bizarre than musical, and the work was brought to a close with the duet and chorus, "Let Us Love, for Love is Living."

The first part of "Eve," entitled "The Prologue," opens with a chorus of heavenly voices describing the scene in Eden. This chorus is one of the best, and it has rare delicacy of sentiment. The undulating movement in the orchestral accompaniment suggesting the gentle breezes of the text, is especially felicitous. A duet between Adam and Eve follows, which is melodious, but somewhat commonplace. It is occasionally heard in the concert room. The chorus closing the prologue, "At The First Sweet Smile of Woman," is marked by a syncopated rhythm at once novel and stirring, and closes with an inspiring burst of harmony. The second part, entitled "Eve in Solitude," represents the temptation. It opens with a chorus in chorale form, "Eve, who art come," unaccompanied, followed by an air for Eve, "O, Gentle Night," which abounds in fine contrasts and effects. Then follows a scene for Eve and the chorus, "Wouldst thou call thine own," somewhat more severe in treatment and harmony and less interesting than other portions, with the exception of an episode for the chorus, "Love alone will give them unto thee," which has singular grace and charm. The third and closing part, entitled "The Fall," opens with a somber instrumental prelude leading to an air for the narrator, who fills in the gaps of the story. Another duet ensues between Adam and Eve, based in part on previous motives more elaborately treated, and revealing great warmth of expression and fine orchestral coloring in the accompaniment. The duet is reinforced by the chorus to the words "Yours be love, for love means living," with which the performance is brought to a close, the sensational epilogue describing the curse being omitted, as above indicated.

The performance of Massenet's work proved eminently satisfactory in every detail, including soloists, chorus, orchestra, and interpretation. Miss De Vere sang the music of Eve with finest artistic appreciation, imparting to its gentler measures rare delicacy of feeling, and to its intenser moods, thrilling dramatic fervor. Having thoroughly familiarized herself with the score, she sang with entire freedom and spontaneity, and her numbers were frequently interrupted with enthusiastic applause which would not be suppressed. The voice and method of Mr. Powers are not quite cast in the heroic mould required for the adequate presentation of the measures falling to Adam, especially when placed in concert with so spirited a singer as was his associate on this occasion. Still he acquitted himself conscientiously and in a manner to give the music a fairly effective interpretation. To Mr. Rieger was assigned the somewhat thankless task of singing the connecting measures falling to the narrator, and he showed the possession of a very pleasing tenor voice, which he employed with discretion. He will doubtless be heard to better advantage later on during the Festival.

The portions of the work which proved particularly inspiring and more than of passing interest to the local audience were found in the choruses, and it is gratifying to note that the body of singers to whom this part of the work fell acquitted themselves with great credit and honor. The chorus recruited for this year's Festival is doubtless the best of its size that has ever been brought together in Buffalo. Care must have been shown in the selection of the voices, for the body of tone has that richness and fullness, without harshness, which can only result from the high average of the quality of the individual voices. The chorus is likewise unusually well balanced, this attribute being especially noticeable in the tenors, who have hitherto always been lamentably weak in Buffalo but who appear this year to quite, if not entirely, come up to the prevailing level of tone. In the matters of pitch and attack the chorus also reveals uncommon firmness, whilst the intelligence and spirit which can alone give life to singing, are conspicuous. Of course, much of this outcome is due to the skill and persistency of Buffalo's efficient director, Mr. Lund, and there surely will be no rivalry between the commanding general and his forces in dividing the honors of the victory achieved last evening, as well as of others to come during the week. The singers readily caught the spirit of the work produced and gave the various numbers falling to them with appreciative spirit.

The Symphony Orchestra played the accompaniments faultlessly and contributed to give Buffalo, without doubt, as complete and satisfactory a performance of Massenet's "Eve" as has ever been offered.

Mr Lund conducted the entire work with the ease and assurance of a veteran and confirmed the high estimate of his powers as a director which the people of Buffalo have always entertained.

To-day's Programmes.

Two concerts will be given to-day, a matinee at two o'clock and an evening concert at eight o'clock. As will be noticed, the programmes are made up of miscellaneous num[illegible] calculated to please

[147]

...audience. There will be so long works given on either occasion, so that those wishing a varied programme of generally lighter classic music will find ample enjoyment at either concert. At the matinee the orchestra will be heard in a number of most attractive selections, and the soloists will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Behrens, vocalists, and Franz Rummel, the distinguished pianist, all of whom will make their first appearance during the Festival at this matinee. In the evening the orchestra will likewise contribute some attractive numbers, notable among which will be Goldmark's symphony, "Rustic Wedding," which has never been heard in Buffalo and which will be found unusually pleasing. The great chorus will be heard in the chorale from "Die Meistersinger," and the male chorus and soloists will give Mr. Lund's composition, "The War Song of the Ancient Germans," which was sung last winter by the Orpheus without orchestral accompaniment, and which will thus have its first complete and satisfactory production to-night. Miss Mary Howe, the attractive soprano, will make her bow to a local audience at this concert, and among her associates who will be heard are Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Jahn, and Mr. Bushnell.

The complete programmes for the day are as follows:

MATINEE PROGRAMME.

Grande Polonaise.....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—.....Selected
Mrs. Nikisch.
(a) "Nikia's Dream", } From "Symphonie
(b) "In the Hammock" } Orientale" op 81...Godard
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—From "La Juive".....Halevy
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Scherzo Capriccioso.....Dvorak
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat Major.....Liszt
Mr. Rummel.
Songs with piano.
(a) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
(b) Florian's Song.....Godard
(c) "Vergebliches Slandchen".....Brahms
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
(a) "The Linden Tree" }
(b) "The Wanderer" } .....Schubert
Mr. Conrad Benrens.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EVENING PROGRAMME.

Overture—"Oberon".....Von Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—from "Oberon".....Von Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle.....John Lund
Miss Jahn, Mr. Bushnell, and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra.....Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell song—"Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—"The Nightingale".....Alibieff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
"Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

Festival Vibrations.

The lady pupils of St. Margaret's school will occupy the upper boxes at to-night's performance.

Adam and Eve last evening escaped the curse, out of consideration on the part of Director Lund.

The members of the Musical Association are to be congratulated on the auspicious opening of the Festival.

The male soloists of the festival were entertained at the Buffalo Club last night after the concert by members of the Musical Association.

Mr. F. F. Powers, one of the baritone soloists of the Festival, resembles Capt. Balcom of this city, which is a compliment to both parties.

Director Lund seems entirely at home in handling the great Symphony Orchestra, and the men appear equally at home in following his baton.

C. W. Torrington, the well-known conductor of Toronto, accompanied by his wife, and Mr. Walter D'Enyer of Rochester were among the audience last night.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. E. C. Bushnell, and Mr. Franz Rummel, who will be heard at to-day's concerts, occupied the lower right-hand box during last night's performance.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, complimented the management of Music Hall, saying it was one of the best managed halls in which that organization has appeared.

The music committee has shown considerable adroitness in dividing up the soloists on the different programmes. As matters stand, it will be necessary to take in pretty much all of the concerts in order to get acquainted with all of the soloists.

Miss Bianca Fleischmann appears to be the emergency pianist of Buffalo. She was unexpectedly called upon yesterday afternoon to play the piano accompaniments for Mr. Powers and Mrs. Wyman at the evening concert and she responded with her usual alacrity.

At page 38 of the score of "Eve," the heroine Eve says, "Ah love! It is a word which I know not." At page 14, however, she has already said, "Dearest, say, shall we stray, plighted in love for aye?" Eve evidently forgot some of her early declarations on this question, as lovers are apt to do.

Messrs. Harry Hamlin and Edmund Hayes yesterday afternoon drove their four-in-hands to the Hotel Iroquois and took the leading musicians and soloists of the May Festival for a pleasant drive round the Park and lunching at the Country Club. The ladies of the party were Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Miss De Vere, and Mrs. Arthur Jules Emile Frederick Massenet, the composer of the cantata, "Eve," which was produced last night, was born at Montaud, near St. Etienne, on May 12, 1842. He was educated at the Paris Conservatoire, where he won the first piano prize in 1859, the same prize for fugue in 1862, the first prize for fugue, and the "Prix de Rome" in 1863. On his return from Italy, through the influence of Ambroise Thomas, his "La Grand 'tante" was produced at the Opera Comique in 1867. Even in this first attempt, Massenet showed himself a skilled and graceful musician. It was only, however, after the Franco-German War that he rose to the first rank among young French composers by the production of "Don Cæsar de Bazan" in 1872; incidental music to the tragedy "Les Erynius" and the oratorio "Marie Magdeline" in 1873. "Eve," which was presented last night, was first produced in 1875. Among his other productions since then were the overture to "Phedre," the opera "Le Roi de Lahore," the cantata "Narcisse," and the oratorio "La Vierge."

Buffalo Courier.

THURSDAY, MAY 21, 1891.

A RARE COMBINATION.

Boston's Instrumentalists and Buffalo's Singers.

THE FESTIVAL A GREAT SUCCESS.

The Orchestra's Playing Beyond Criticism—Excellent Soloists —Opening Concert.

The May Festival was begun last night auspiciously. The audience was large and cheerful, and the work of all who took part in the performance was applauded vigorously and sincerely. A full criticism of the several numbers on the programme will be found below.

The Audience.

The audience might have been larger, yet the Hall was well filled. Looking back from the front rows of seats on the floor you might think there was scarcely an empty seat. The greater number in the audience, filled with the festival spirit, made their dress bear witness to it, and the scene was gay and animated, especially in the brief intermissions between the numbers when there was unrestrained and pleasant conversation all over the hall.

The Performers.

The orchestra was spick and span, and the soloists, the women, were picturesquely attired. Every one of them—men and women alike were warmly received and none seemed more a favorite than another. Mr. Lund received a warm welcome from the chorus when he stepped on the pedestal. It was Fourth of July weather and he suffered on that account, but the appreciation of the audience must have reassured him if he felt any nervous misgivings.

The Decorations.

The arrangements on the stage and the decorations of the auditorium were in excellent taste. Over the stage there was a cover of white canvas or like material. Through this hung four chandeliers, and the light from them, multiplied by the reflection from the white canopy, set off the chorus splendidly, so that any individual in it could easily be recognized by admiring relatives and friends in the audience.

The orchestra pit was filled with palms and ferns, and the boxes were very prettily festooned with green. Long lines of green hung down from the canopies following the lines of the curtains, and others were trailed and festooned along the borders of the boxes. Mingled with these and knotted to them were bunches of roses and other flowers, while here and there from the darkness gleamed a tiny spark of electricity, the effect being that of a merry band of glow-worms disporting themselves in the shadows of these vernal arbors.

The ugly rods that have so long disfigured the ceiling above the proscenium have been taken down and in their place is a graceful device in evergreen, which excites admiration and the curiosity of those who, like Shakespeare, know little Latin and less Greek.

To the Eye of the Observer.

The scene when the first strains of the overture to "Lenore" were heard was most inspiring. The audience, bright in spring color, alert and eager to hear the famous Boston Symphony; the boxes showing glimpses through their green festoons of pretty girls and comely matrons, and fine gentlemen; the great orchestra filling the entire front of the stage making delicious music; the solemn long-locked Nikisch on his pedestal controling and swaying the music; the banked-up chorus—a symphony in black and white rising in tiers to the farther wall—all contributed to make a brilliant and charming Festival picture. Every body enjoyed the performance, and the series of concerts has been begun without a single untoward incident or disappointment.

To-day's Programmes.

The sale of seats for to-night's concert promises even a larger audience than that of last night. That is well. The audience should swell in numbers at every performance. The Festival programmes are all too good to be slighted. The programme for this afternoon will introduce Mrs. Arthur Nikisch and Mr. Conrad Behrens, vocal soloists, and Mr. Franz Rummel, pianist. This evening Miss Howe will make her debut to a Buffalo audience, and nobody need be surprised if the gentlemen crowd for admission. It's whispered that her portrait has attracted many of the unmusical.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 21.

Grand Polonaise.....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—"Les Dragons de Villars".....Maillard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
(a) "Nikra's Dream".... } From "Symphonie
(b) "In the Hammock".. } Orientale" Godard
Scherzo capriccioso.....Dvorak
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Mr. Franz Rummel.
Songs with Piano.
(a) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
(b) Florian's song.....Godard
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 21.

Overture—"Oberon".....Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—
From "Oberon".....Weber
Marie Jahn.
The March to Battle.....John Lund
Marie Jahn, Mr. E. C. Bushnell, and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for Orchestra.....Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell Song—"Lakme".....Delibes
Miss Mary Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding) op. 26...Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—The Nightingale.....Alibeff
Miss Howe.
Waldweben, from "Siegfried".....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Vorspiel und Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from Meistersinger.....Wagner
Festival Chorus.

THE PROGRAMME.

A Critical and Appreciative Dissertation Upon the Performance.

The beautiful Leonore overture, No. 3, was appropriately selected to open the Festival, and the great Beethoven's work never seemed more grand. For 80 years the music has been ripening under the warmth of the love and admiration of the musical world, growing nearer to the hearts of the people and teaching its wonderful story with great power. The interpretation last evening was a revelation to even veteran musicians, being most acceptable in its chasteness and appealing to the finest musical instincts. From the opening adagio through the intervening storm of passions, to the happy issue out of the chaotic turmoil, the oachestra was lead by the hand of a skilled musician.

Mr. Nikisch knows Beethoven as a savant understands his precious theories, and each separate and distinct beauty was put into the light of the broadest possible orchestral interpretation. How marvellously the music bears the full power of critical survey those who heard the overture last night know. Not a flaw, not a weakness is discernible in the colossal composition which has stood the test of ages. Boston has reason to be thankful when hearing Beethoven played that such an orchestra has fallen to her lot, for it is complete—so complete that the ear desires nothing. In no number was this perfectness more noticeable, and the mind of the intent listener was filled with rapturous delight as the exquisite thoughts took sonorous form.

Beethoven stands alone in the grandeur of the originality which characterizes every stroke of his musical pen. The musician never strays far from his conceptions without turning back with happiness and relief that the peaceful haven is always to be reached. His symphonic mirror, his noblest thoughts, his most passionate struggles, which do not seem less poignant as the years pass. How the beauties of the Leonore Symphony could have sprung from the disappointments, the sorrows of such a life, the world cannot understand. Suffice it that they did, and that they have been preserved for the development and delight of generations to accrue. As the orchestra completed the last movement, the house paid its tribute to the music and to the musicians, who had caught the inspiration, and thrown out the chords like bunches of fragrant violets into the summer night.

Mrs. Wyman.

From Beethoven to Verdi is a rapid transition, but when led so delightfully, as was the audience by Mrs. Julie E. Wyman, there was no fault to be treasured long. The vocalist was received with the cordiality of intimate acquaintance and sang to a host of friends. Her voice responded brilliantly to the music, and the fervid aria was sung with nice finish and characteristic excellence. Mrs. Wyman was recalled, but the rule of "no encores" prevailed, much to the disappointment of many who were anxious to have the aria repeated.

In the three songs which appeared later upon the programme, "Enchantment," by Massenet; "Heart's Fancies," by Goring-Thomas, and "Dormezvous," by Wekerlin, she was equally charming, though the attractions of a singer need to be strong to counteract a composition such as the last. The accompaniment by the orchestra made the "Don Carlos" selection, together with Mrs. Wyman's artistic conception, one of the best numbers on the programme.

Mr. Powers.

Mr. Francis Fisher Powers, the well-known baritone singer of New York, did not disturb the Verdi atmosphere created by Mrs. Wyman's selection, but gave the aria "O tu Palermo," from the "Sicilian Vespers" by the same composer. He has a fine voice, sings well, and is musical, three requisites for a successful soloist. A piano accompaniment, although played correctly by Miss Fleischmann, detracted greatly from the effect, and was unjust to the singer. It seemed particulary inadequate after the preceding solo, and tested Mr. Power's ability to the uttermost. That he rose above it was to his credit.

Later Numbers by the Orchestra.

The suite by Greig, entitled "Peer Gynt," brought the orchestra again before the audience and with the same profitable pleasure. Most of the music is familiar in Buffalo, thanks to Mr. Lund and our home orchestra, but it seemed richer than when given here. The strength of the Boston orchestra happily lies in the strings, and though two of the first violins are missing, the ensemble is unimpaired even to critical ears. An analysis of the work shows the opportunities given a director, and Mr. Nikisch did not allow them to escape him. The rhythm of one part appealed to many, the quaintness, to a second body of listeners, while the descriptive "Daybreak" enchanted still a third group. No more beautiful illustration of tone-painting is likely to be heard at the Festival than was presented last night.

The three selections from the "Damnation of Faust," brought the same power of the orchestra prominently forward. If ever "Will-o'-the-Wisps" danced a minuet in fact, they did over the four prosaic strings of the violins. There were alternately flashes of fire, then wierd notes, staccato and sparkling, dashed off with apparent carelessness but unerring exactness. The "Dance of the Sylphs" was graceful, melodious, and fascinating, passing naturally into the strains of the "Hungarian March" as if the dancers paused to watch the passing troops on their sterner errand of war.

Conductor Nikisch.

These three compositions completed the important orchestra numbers and established the reputation of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as a conductor of consummate skill. He is sensitive to a degree hardly to be appreciated, and this shows in every quiet but nervous beat of his delicate hand. The orchestra follows him with a closeness born of a knowledge of his acute eye and ear, for nothing escapes this thoroughbred musician. The slightest deviation of wind or stringed instrument is detected, and the culprit knows that his hour of reckoning will come sooner or later. It is no wonder that the orchestra plays as it does, for it is handled by a man who perfectly understands what are the capabilities of the instrument before him. He conducted without score both the "Overture" and the "Suite," a practical evidence of his wonderful power of memory.

Miss De Vere.

Miss Clementine De Vere made her debut in the florid, "Mad scene" from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet." The aria bristles with difficulties for the ordinary vocalist, but the singer made light of diatonic and chromatic scales, eliciting the most enthusiastic applause. Miss De Vere is a conscientious and skillful vocalist, who indulges in no eccentricities, but sings her music with honest intent. She has no mannerisms and gives the impression of a musician who has acquired her position by hard work, and enjoys the success that is deservedly hers. The "Hamlet" aria has never been sung more briliantly in Buffalo.

The Chorus in "Eve."

The piece-de-resistance of last night's programme was Massenet's cantata, entitled "Eve," which introduced the full festival chorus of 500 voices. Mr. Lund had grouped the male voices in the center of the stage and surrounded them with the soprano and contralto singers. The effect was good and the body of sound in forte passages was well equalized.

Massenet introduces early in the cantata a love motif, which is sensuous in character, and suggestive of the awakening emotions of newly created human beings. The orchestra presents it in a guise that fascinates the musician, then leaves it for more earthly scenes and sterner realities. After a short descriptive chorus of heavenly voices, the narrator (tenor) is introduced and heralds the birth of woman; following directly upon this is a duet for Adam (bass) and Eve (soprano). Miss De Vere and Mr. Powers were particularly happy in the singing of this music.

One of the most important choruses in the cantata follows immediately and is entitled, "At the first sweet smile of woman." In this the singers were taxed almost beyond their ability, for the music, while not difficult, in one sense, is very hard to sing. The accompaniment is likewise intricate and gives not the slightest support to the chorus. Long and continued drill was very evident throughout the cantata, but no more prominently than in this particular chorus. The unaccompanied music, which introduces the second part and precedes the solo for Eve, was the only weak part in the cantata. Miss De Vere did some very nice work in her aria, and likewise in the scene with chorus which followed it. Through to the end of the second part, the solo soprano is prominent, and the vocalist has many difficult passages. Mr. Rieger, as the narrator, had very little to do, but voiced a very fair tenor of some cultivation. He has most of his honors yet to win, but has made commendable progress. The cantata closes with one of the most impassioned duets ever penned, between Adam and Eve, followed by a chorus, which contains the love motif, introduced by the principal characters. Throughout this, in fact, throughout the entire cantata, the chorus sang superbly, and reflected the highest possible credit upon the members and their conductor, Mr. Lund.

Notes.

Who does Miss Clementine de Vere look like? Why Sara Bernhardt, to be sure.

Mrs. Wyman has a most rapturous expression on her face when she sings, and a deaf man would enjoy her.

The chorus looked like a piece of Dolly Varden cake, the men in the middle being the dark layer and the girls on either side the light layers.

Several of the soloists occupied the lower right-hand box during the evening. Many were puzzled to know who the lady was who talked with Mrs. Wyman now and then. It was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch. Franz Rummel was another occupant of the box.

After the concert last night the gentlemen who are to appear in solo at the Festival were entertained at the Buffalo Club by the Musical Association.

[148]

Boston Daily Globe

SATURDAY, MAY 23.

A CLASSICAL PROGRAMME.

Buffalo's Music Festival Continued with Representative Audience.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 22.—The music festival was continued tonight, with a classical programme of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the following soloists: Miss Mary Howe, Miss Mary E. Fox, Mr. W. H. Rieger and Mr. Conrad Behrens.

Music Hall was again filled with one of Buffalo's representative audiences, and the evening's entertainment was entirely successful. The full programme was as follows:

Symphonic poem, Lancelot and Elaine..MacDowell
(a) The Watch.....Lowe
(b) Tom the Rhymer.....Lowe
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Overture—Fantasie, Romeo and Juliet.Tschaikowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) Loveliest Flower.....Price
(b) In the East.....Mulligan
Mr. Rieger.
Solo—Bird Song, Pearl of Brazil.....David
Miss Howe.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from Siegfried and Gotterdammerung.....Wagner
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) The Arabian Slave.....Shelley
(b) Ah! 'tis a Dream.....Hawley
Miss Fox.
(a) To. To Man Tro, } Swedish } .....Lindblad
(b) Trolhattau, } Songs. } .....Please
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (scherzo)—Allegro (finale).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo, Echo Song.....Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus, To Thee, O Country.....Eichberg
Festival chorus and orchestra.

The members of the Symphony orchestra were again entertained tonight by Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin.

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 23, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Western and Southern Tour—Close of a Very Successful Season.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 22. The closing concert in the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which began April 26, will be given in this city to-morrow evening. The orchestra has been in the city all the week, giving a festival similar in many respects to that in Louisville last week. Massenet's "Eve," and "King Rother," a cantata by J. Krug-Waldsee, are among the choral works given, the latter closing the series. The remaining concerts were devoted to symphonic numbers, and solos by an array of artists which proved very attractive and pleasing, including Miss Clementine de Vere, Mrs. Wyman, Mme Mielke, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Mary Howe, Mr. Powers, Franz Rummel, Messrs. Rieger, Bushnell and Dippel.

This fifth annual tour has been in every respect the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The versatility and ability of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have been demonstrated at every step. Very large audiences have attended, and they have heard not only the orchestra, but leading soloists in the band, as well as vocal and instrumental artists, whose appearances in Boston warranted a further engagement on the tour. The opening concert of the trip was given in Philadelphia Monday evening, April 27, with Mrs. Walter C. Wyman and Mr. Hekking as soloists. Tuesday evening, April 28, at Baltimore; Wednesday evening, April 29, at Washington. At both of these concerts Mme. Hopekirk was the soloist. Thursday and Friday evenings, April 30 and May 1, at Pittsburg. The first evening Mrs. Nikisch and Miss Lena Little were the soloists, and the second evening Verdi's "Requiem Mass" was given, with Mrs. Seabury Ford, Miss Little, Dr. Carl Marten and a local tenor, in connection with the Mozart Club of that city. Saturday evening, May 2, at Cleveland, Ohio, where an audience of 4500 people attended, and Mrs. Nikisch was the soloist. Monday, May 4, at Detroit, Mich., with Miss Jahn and Mrs. Nikisch. Tuesday, May 5, at Ann Arbor, with Mrs. Nikisch, to an audience of 2500. Wednesday, May 6, a second concert was given at Detroit, and Thursday, Friday and Saturday, May 7, 8 and 9, the orchestra appeared in Chicago. There Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Nikisch and Miss Lena Little were the soloists. Monday evening, May 11, a concert was given in Cincinnati, the stronghold of Theodore Thomas, before an audience that filled every seat, and the "Im Walde" symphony, by Raff, was enthusiastically received, and Mrs. Nikisch sang. The rest of the week the orchestra devoted to the Louisville festival, and this week the tour closed at Buffalo.

At this latter city the choral works were given under the direction of John Lund, and the importance of the Louisville festival was therefore intensified by the appearance of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor of oratorio. He had a remarkable chorus at the outset—one that had been so well trained that many of its members knew portions of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" without the score, and composed of fresh, true voices, particularly in the sopranos. And strange as it may appear this choir rendered Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" better than it did Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and it was a much more creditable performance. Mr. Nikisch proved an admirable leader in choral works, and very little difference was perceptible in his readings of "Elijah" from the traditional interpretation under Mr. Zerrahn. He was remarkably able in producing effects in shading with the chorus, and more experience will lead him to a better attention to little details in the ensemble. The double quartette was given by the local choir, and very poorly done, and Mr. Nikisch led the trio of soloists in the "Angels' Trio" to a tempo much faster than is customary. On the contrary, "Thanks be to God" was taken slower than Mr. Zerrahn usually leads it, and it was not given with the force and brilliancy that should have attended it. But the accompaniment by the orchestra was beautiful, especially notable with the soloists for its unobtrusiveness and the careful manner in which Mr. Nikisch compelled the band to accompany and not lead the artists. The conduct, as a [illegible] was admirable, and the ability of our [illegible] in this line of work, as well as in the [illegible] symphonies, was abundantly demon-

Boston Journal.
WITH SUPPLEMENT.
SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 16, 1891.

BOSTON MUSICIANS DOWN SOUTH

The Symphony Orchestra at the Music Festival in Louisville, Ky.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 15. The May Festival in Louisville—the first distinctively musical festival ever held in this city—is a notable event here. It is held in the Auditorium, an immense amphitheatre, but whose acoustic properties are remarkable, and opened Tuesday evening with an orchestral concert. Mr. Arthur Nikisch, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the director, and the works given, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," are conducted by him for the first time in this country.

It is a fact worthy of mention that the oratorio of "Elijah," or any great choral work, has never been given in Louisville except with an organ accompaniment or a small local orchestra, and that many years ago. A chorus or a choral society of the size of the present festival chorus has never had an existence here, and the present organization and the responsibility for the festival is due entirely to the Commercial Club. This club has been in existence three or four years and has a membership of 1325, largely the young business men of the city. Many of its members are gentlemen of refined musical taste and realized the need, for educational purposes, of such a festival as has been arranged. A guarantee fund was easily obtained from its ranks and a chorus organized numbering 250 voices, which it is proposed shall be a nucleus for a permanent choral organization. Mr. C. H. Shackleton, a member of the Commercial Club, and an energetic local director, has drilled the choir for three months, its entire attention being held strictly to the two great works given. Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" would seem an ambitious performance for such a chorus, but Director Shackleton believes in a high standard, and this has been maintained in the choice of soloists, in the selection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its conductor, and the high class of music which had been put before the public.

The Symphony Orchestra has played before in Louisville, giving single concerts on its annual tour last year under Mr. Nikisch and the previous year under Mr. Gericke. But under such circumstances the enlarged work of the orchestra and the great variety of its renditions have not been realized as they are this week here and as they are in the home city of Boston. A symphony concert Tuesday evening, with Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, a vocal and instrumental soloist and other numbers; a young people's popular Wednesday afternoon, with other soloists; a strictly classical symphony concert Thursday evening, in which Wagner was given a leading place; Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" Friday evening, preceded by a symphony by Beethoven, and "Elijah" Saturday evening—all this is certainly a week of music of which any city might be proud. Mr. Nikisch's band is in magnificent form, and it is interesting to the writer, who is familiar with the reception accorded the renditions of the familiar numbers at home, to note the manner in which the audiences here receive the orchestra. It is with a feeling of local pride that the enthusiastic reception of the fine work of Conductor Nikisch is seen. The auditorium Tuesday night was filled with the elite of the city, the ladies in gala attire and the gentlemen in full evening dress. As the matchless performance of Raff's symphony was finished the applause was deafening, and Conductor Nikisch was the recipient of an ovation. Concertmeister Kneisel was ill, and Mr. Adamowski was in his place. He also gave a solo in place of one assigned to Mr. Kneisel, and his reception was a delightful one. Miss Marie Jahn of the Metropolitan Opera House was the vocal artist, and she sang much better than in Boston. Mrs. Nikisch was on the programme for the young people's popular Wednesday afternoon, but she failed to appear, and an opportunity was given the audience to hear a group of numbers on the 'cello by Mr. Hekking, who is not to be a member of the orchestra next season. Signor Campanari of Boston gave an aria from "Faust," and had it not been for the inexorable law of Mr. Nikish—which will have to be relaxed if he is to be a conductor of festivals—he would have been compelled to sing again. The programme was heavy for a "popular," closing with the "Tannhauser" overture, but it was well liked.

The quartette of soloists for the works are Clementine de Vere, Gertrude Edmands, Whitney Mockridge and William Ludwig, a grand combination for "Elijah," and equally so for the "Stabat Mater." With the grand accompaniment of the full Symphony Orchestra at the performance of the act of "Fidelio," given so recently in Boston under Mr. Nikisch, so fresh in mind, its work in these choral numbers must be of surpassing excellence. The chorus is made up largely of Louisville people, and the ensemble is pronounced admirable at the rehearsals thus far held by Mr. Nikisch. The financial success of the festival is so assured that the guarantee fund is safe. Its musical success is an equally established fact.

BUFFALO EXPRESS
FRIDAY MORNING,
ESTABLISHED 1878
MAY 22, 1891.

ANOTHER SUCCESS.

A SCENE CALCULATED TO AROUSE ENTHUSIASM.

The May Festival is Growing in Popularity--Two Fine Concerts Yesterday--To-night's Programme.

The second day of Buffalo's fifth great Music Festival proved another success. The audiences that attended yesterday afternoon and evening contained in addition to local visitors numerous contingents from the cities and villages far and near. The facilities afforded by the various railroads place the Festival at the very doors of the residents of this and adjoining counties. People from Rochester, Syracuse, Toronto, Batavia, Lockport, and large numbers from adjoining towns were seen in the audience. That the Festival has thus attained to something more than local renown can be readily seen, and it must be very gratifying to the Musical Association to realize that the Festival is coming to be recognized as an event of general interest to the musical world.

THE FIRST MATINEE.

AN AUDIENCE COMPOSED LARGELY OF THE FAIR SEX ENJOYS A MUSICAL TREAT.

The audience attracted to the matinee concert yesterday afternoon was only of moderate proportions and was composed largely of the fair sex. Those present were offered a most enjoyable treat in the delightful variety of musical selections presented.

The opening number was Liszt's Polonaise in E major, originally written for the piano and transcribed for orchestra. Though this composition has become thoroughly hackneyed at the hands of piano virtuosos as well as amateurs, it still remains more attractive and satisfactory in its original form as a piano piece than in its transformed orchestral garb. Most of the florid passages which ornament the structure of the work and which make it a sort of test of technique on the piano, naturally drop out in the orchestral version, leaving its skeleton, so to speak, exposed and suggesting the idea of angularity. The orchestra made the most of the piece and was in no way responsible for its inherent shortcomings. The two numbers from Godard's Symphonie Orientale, entitled "Nikia's Dream" and "In the Hammock," as the title implies, had genuine oriental coloring and were greatly admired. Later on the orchestra gave the Dvorak "Scherzo Capriccioso," which was new here. The piece is almost entirely free in treatment, though a delicious waltz movement keeps recurring. The orchestration abounds in kaleidescopic changes and the finale is worked up with thrilling effect. The remaining orchestral numbers were the Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne, and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. All of these have long been familiar to the musical world, but at each new hearing they reveal that abiding charm and freshness which has made them immortal.

To speak of the faultless playing of the Symphony Orchestra in these various numbers would be merely to repeat what has heretofore been noted, and what would have to be said in each instance. Mr. Nikisch is unique as a conductor. He has the sensitiveness of a poet, and a quiet magnetism which imparts itself to his men with electrical certainty. His fine artistic intuition of the best meaning of the various composers whom he interprets is likewise at all times manifest, and the performances given under his direction are conspicuous for their refinement, transparency and elevated taste. He is also daring and heroic in the more spirited passages, and does not hesitate to call forth the full resources of his band when aiming at inspiring effects. Many of the familiar works which he has given have shown new beauties.

The Liszt Concerto in E flat, for piano and orchestra, had a brilliant interpretation at the hands of Franz Rummel, the well-known pianist, and the orchestra. Mr. Rummel has for several years been a favorite player, and his reputation has been won and merited by his robust and honest presentation of the stronger works for piano, in which direction he excels, rather than in the line of delicacy. His performance yesterday met with wonted favor, and he was summoned forth at its close by a hearty recall, to which, however, he was not allowed to respond.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the wife of the talented director, came forward for the first time as a vocalist in the Page's canzonetta, an aria from Mozart's "Figaro," with orchestral accompaniment, as well as in three familiar songs with piano accompaniment, and showed herself a singer possessed of a pleasing voice, fine intelligence, her singing being especially noteworthy for its distinct enunciation and sincerity.

Mr. Conrad Behrens was likewise heard for the first time in an aria from Halevy's "La Juive," with orchestra, and in two Schubert songs with piano, and he created a profound impression by his rich and sonorous voice, as well as repose of style. His singing was impressive and was deeply appreciated. Miss Fleischmann played the accompaniments, with the exception of those for Mrs. Nikisch, which were played with great taste by Mr. Nikisch.

BRILLIANT IN EVERY RESPECT.

THE AUDIENCE AT THE EVENING CONCERT WAS THE LARGEST THUS FAR.

The concert of the evening proved brilliant in every respect. The audience was the largest thus far assembled at Music Hall during the Festival and there were but few vacant seats either down stairs or in the gallery. The gathering was, moreover, a representative one, and the geniality of temperature prevailing enabled the ladies to don their summer garb, so that the scene presented by the chorus and audience was one well calculated to inspire the utmost cheer.

The programme was likewise in keeping with the occasion, set, as it was, with a fairly dazzling cluster of musical gems. The orchestra shone with peculiar luster in the varied numbers assigned to it. The first of these was the familiar overture to "Oberon." Later on came the somewhat eccentric but fascinating Rhapsody by Lalo, which was first heard in Buffalo at the great Saengerfest in 1883. The number that proved especially attractive was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, portions of which had been given here before. The movements given of this work were the Wedding March, presumably called such because most of it was not in march time, but consists of a theme in triple time, with a large number of ingenious and elaborate variations, ending, however, with a few martial measures; the "Bridal Scene"; the episode "In the Garden," which was particularly rich in its sentiment, and the finale entitled "A Dance." The movement known as "The Serenade" was omitted. The entire symphony is extremely fascinating, and it showed the resources of the orchestra and its director at their very best. The remaining orchestral numbers were the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," both of which transported the listeners into the seventh heaven of Wagnerism, and which were likewise familiar to the local public, assuming that these extreme and mysterious flights of Wagner's fancy can ever become familiar in the ordinary sense of that term.

The concert was likewise interesting in bringing forth a trio of new soloists. Among these Miss Marie Jahn, during the past season one of the leading sopranos of the German opera company at the Metropolitan Opera-house, came first. She gave the well-known scene from "Freischuetz," instead of the "Oberon" aria mentioned on the programme. Miss Jahn is a singer of the German dramatic type, having a powerful soprano voice and singing with intense fervor and spirit. She likewise revealed a tendency of this school of vocalists to sharpen the pitch, resulting, doubtless, in a measure from the high pressure at which they sing. She is, however, a fine artist, and her effort evoked merited applause.

The audience was on the alert for the appearance of Miss Mary Howe, whose fame and photograph had preceded her; and it is not too much to say that she did justice to both. She is a woman of attractive and commanding appearance, but fortunately her vocal equipment must win admiration aside from her personal charms. Her two selections were the well known Bell Song from "Lakme" and a ballad, "The Nightingale." The compositions are of the same type, calling for florid execution in the extreme upper range of the soprano register; and this line of work appears to be Miss Howe's forte. Her voice is clear and flute-like, rather than sympathetic, and it has enjoyed a high degree of cultivation in colorature execution, without, however, at all times concealing its mechanism. Altogether Miss Howe's vocalism may aptly be described as brilliant, and as such it will inevitably arouse a great audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, as proved the case last evening. The attractive singer was twice recalled and honored with a floral tribute, and only escaped an encore by the rigid enforcement of the rule prohibiting it.

An interesting number of the programme was Mr. Lund's composition for male voices, with soprano and baritone solos, entitled "The March to Battle." This work had been given by the Orpheus during the past season, but without that fullness of vocal or instrumental effect which it had last evening. Nevertheless, it was then greatly admired for its grace and vigor, and its interpretation last night by the great body of male singers of the Festival chorus, together with the entire Symphony Orchestra, more than confirmed the original estimate formed of the work, and revealed its true effectiveness under favorable conditions. The composition must surely take very high rank among those of its type; and as it is about to be published, it is likely to be heard elsewhere. Mr. Lund himself wrote the full instrumental score, which showed his mastery of orches-

[149]

...ral treasures and exhibits. The composer directed in person and was loudly cheered at the close and was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times. The incidental soprano solo was finely sung by Miss Jahn. Mr. E. C. Bushnell, the possessor of a strong and melodious voice, sang the baritone solo with fine spirit.

WAR SONG OF THE ANCIENT GERMANS.

The "War Song of the Ancient Germans," composed by our accomplished local musician and director, Mr. John Lund, which was presented last night, is a work of more than ordinary importance, as it calls for a full orchestra, an efficient male chorus, and two solo voices (soprano and baritone). The work is based on a poem by Silbersteen. The opening depicts the stalwart Teutonic warriors marching through the forest with heavy and steady tread to the fight for liberty and home. Their hearts are not filled with joy of victory, but they are full of courage and willing to die—firm as the oak trees, the branches of which rustle above their heads.

These sentiments are expressed by the short introduction of the orchestra, after which the chorus follows relating and describing the situation at the beginning of the scene (D minor). The tread of the warriors is distinctly marked by the accompanying orchestra; stern and grave sounds the relating song. But in the branches of the sacred oak trees, devoted to Odin (Wotan) it rustles, the Walkyrie's accompany the march of the doomed troop, and after the dying out of the martial strains a motive, appearing already at the first number, is taken up in a slower movement by 'cello and French horn (E major), introducing the song of a Walkyrie, who now, with obligato accompaniment of the horn, describes to the warriors the festive enjoyments of Walhalla, that await the dead heroes. Conquered by love she foretells as the fate of the warriors that none will return, that all will perish.

Far from being discouraged by this prophecy of the Walkyrie, the warriors, taking up again the theme heard at the beginning, cross their swords, clashing, and when one of them has given expression to his feelings (baritone solo, D major), the character of the music is again entirely changed. Every doubt, hope, and fear has disappeared from this courageous heart. The willingness to die of the man, who has closed up with life, is expressed by his song; gladly will he sacrifice blood and life, for he exchanges vanity for home and liberty—the glory of a better life is expecting him.

The composer in this short but effective work produces a dramatic picture of richest color and finest shading; we hear the martial sounds of battle, we listen to the touching strains of solemn prophecy, to the song of sacred enthusiasm devoted to home and liberty. This work cannot fail to attract attention for its scholarly effects.

The concert closed with the chorus, "At the First Sweet Smile of Woman," from "Eve" instead of the chorale from "The Meistersinger," the parts of which had not arrived in time for rehearsal, and the singing of this number was marked by the same spirit which characterized it on the previous evening. It proved a fitting finale to a delightful concert.

To-Night's Programme.

There will be no matinee performance today, but the programme for this evening will be found of exceptional interest and variety. Among the orchestral numbers will be a symphonic poem by MacDowell, an American composer of promise, which will prove of special interest; Tschaikowsky's Overture, "Romeo and Juliet," two Wagner selections from the later operas, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony complete. The Festival chorus will be heard in Eichberg's patriotic anthem, "To Thee, O Country," and the soloists of the evening will be Mr. Behrens, Mr. Rieger, and Miss Mary Howe.

The full programme will be as follows:

Symphonic poem—"Lancelot and Elaine".....MacDowell
Songs.
(a) "The Watch".....Lowe
(b) "Tom the Rhymer".....Lowe
Mr Conrad Behrens.
Overture—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Songs.
(a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
(b) "In the East".....Mulligan
Mr. Rieger.
Solo—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David
Miss Howe.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn, and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Swedish Songs.
(a) "To, To Man Tro".....Linblad
(b) Trolihattan".....Please
Mr. Conrad Behrens.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo—"Echo Song".....Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

Melodious Mention.

The man who keeps time with his feet was there.

The children's chorus of 600 voices will be one of the attractions at to-morrow's matinee.

The price for children attending the matinee concert to-morrow has been placed at 50 cents.

W. J. Sheehan of New York, formerly of Buffalo, will sing the part of the Emperor in "King Rother" on Saturday night.

Miss Jahn will sing at the matinee performance to-morrow in place of Mrs. Nikisch, ...

Mr. and Mrs. Niksch, C. A. Ellis manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and F. R. Comee, assistant manager, visited Niagara Falls on Wednesday for the first time.

Mr. Lund regrets that he must go to church on Sunday morning to conduct his choir, as he feels that he will be in need of about a week's sleep after the Saturday-night concert.

The Musical Association has decided to make the price of general admission for to-night at $1, and at the matinee to-morrow 75 cents. At these prices there should be no vacant seats.

The souvenir book of the Festival finds ready sale among lovers of music who desire to follow correctly the story of the principal works produced and become familiar with the biography of the different soloists. The reading matter, which was prepared by Miss Charlotte Mulligan, is deserving of special mention.

Every possible change in the programme should be avoided. Thus far there have been some founded on necessity and some on caprice. This is not fair to the audience, who wish to know to what they are listening and who cannot be expected to be familiar with the limitless range of musical literature. A correct and corrected programme should be issued for every concert.

Mr. Hobart Weed received a letter from Dr. Curtis of Brooklyn saying that Miss Marie Fox, who is on the programme to-night, was very ill at his home and could not appear. Mr. Weed immediately made arrangements with Miss Olive Fremstad, a contralto singer, who is highly spoken of as a substitute. She will be heard in two songs, "Still as the Night," by Bohn, and "Happiest Days" by Hellmund.

It is said that the music committee instructed Mr. Kelley to select eight of the handsomest girls from the chorus for the octette to be placed in the front row of the chorus, irrespective of their vocal abilities. This must be a mistake. Not that the girls are not among the best looking, but because they are all first-class singers. Mr. Kelley evidently showed great skill and experience in making the selection both on the score of beauty and good singing.

Buffalo Courier.

FRIDAY, MAY 22, 1891.

THE PRICE REDUCED.

A Bid for Bigger Attendances at the Music Festival.

A PURELY ARTISTIC SUCCESS.

The Two Concerts Yesterday and the Soloists Therein Introduced—The Music.

Two excellent programmes were presented at the Music Festival yesterday afternoon and evening. The performance in the afternoon was attended by between 1,000 and 1,500 people. The hall did not appear to have a large audience. It was only when you stood at the doors and saw the men and women streaming in, and, better yet, after the last crash of the grand "Wedding March," when they poured out, that you got an idea of the numbers present. In the evening the audience was larger than at either of the previous performances, yet the hall was not crowded.

Five new soloists were heard, and all made favorable impressions. Mrs. Nikisch is a tall woman with a charming expression. She received abundant applause, particularly for her singing of the familiar "Florian's Song" of Godard. It satisfies the popular craving, and when popular taste can be gratified without reproach it is a very good thing. Mr. Conrad Behrens is almost a giant in appearance. He is one of the best attractions—from a popular judgment—that the festival offers. Miss Howe's appearance, manner, and gracious deportment won all hearts. She is a magnificently beautiful woman, and everybody will be glad to know she will sing again to-night. Miss Jahn and Mr. Rummel proved artists in their respective lines of effort, and were further proof of the good judgment made by the music committee of the Association in selecting its solo artists.

No disappointment has yet occurred to mar the anticipations of the Association or the enjoyment of the Festival audiences, except in the one change of programme enforced for this evening, and fully explained later in this article. Everything points to a successful festival in an artistic sense, and only the financial outcome is in doubt.

There is no glossing over the fact that the attendance so far has not been as large as was hoped. The hall has only been fairly well-filled at the best-attended of the three performances. The audiences have been made up for the most part of those who have more directly interested themselves in the Festival cause, their friends, members of musical societies, and students of music. The great mass of people have hardly attended at all. This is a matter of great regret to the members of the Musical Association who have worked so arduously to have the Festival a success. The citizens should support such efforts cordially, and especially those who wish to see the cause of music prosper in the city. An opportunity to hear the best chorus which has ever sung ... in Buffalo, and the most perfect orchestra that has ever played here or that can be heard in America to-day, is a rare one to ignore. Parents should send their children as a means of education, and not begrudge the money that is so well spent. The two remaining days of the Festival should see the hall crowded to its fullest capacity with Germans as well as Americans. The music is of the best; it is an education; it is for all.

Prices to be Reduced.

President Edmund Hayes of the Musical Association said last night that the directors of the May Festival had unanimously decided to reduce the general admission fee to the remaining three concerts as follows: For to-night and to-morrow night, from $1.50 to $1; and for the Saturday matinee from $1, to 75 cents.

The Association, he said, had reached this conclusion from seeing that with present prices the hall was not filled. No more money might be received under the reduced admission, but more people, it was hoped, would avail themselves of the opportunity to hear the best of music. They would rather take in $3 by having three people attend, than to take in the same amount by having two attend. The object of this enterprise was unselfish and public-spirited, no one caring or expecting to make any money, but on the contrary assuming a risk of loss. A guaranty fund of $15,000 had been provided, and would in all probability have to be drawn upon.

THE TWO CONCERTS.

Scholarly Interpretation by Nikisch's Men—Solos Which Were Appreciated.

The broad reading of the Symphony Orchestra has been frequently commented upon here and elsewhere and Mr. Nikisch's catholic ideas are constantly present. He leans toward an academic rather than an emotional interpretation, and the result is a gain to those who find the scholarly part of composition most acceptable. In the "Grande Polonaise" by Liszt, which opened the programme yesterday afternoon, he invested the music with a strength that was not given it by the author. A Polonaise is a Polish dance in three-four time, where the emphasis must fall upon the first unaccented part of the measure. Liszt wrote it for the piano, but it was splendidly orchestraled by Müller Berghaus. The arrangement played attracted indifferent interest, because the estimate of Liszt's efforts are so at variance one with another. His music has become a matter of personal preference in most communities, and the admiration for him is certainly dying out. A programme composed entirely of the Abbe's compositions would draw few listeners now as compared with what might have been expected 10 years ago. The orchestra brought out the fullest merits of the Polonaise, and the audience enjoyed the brilliant yet unimportant beauties of the work.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch made her first appearance in Mozart's canzonetta and aria from the "Magic Flute," a substitution which should not have been permitted. People read a series of programmes and decide what to hear, and they should not be misled. The aria in question has been magnificently sung in Buffalo, and many did not care to hear it in the place of the Maillard selection. The music displayed the singer's full powers, which are not extraordinary in any sense, though they are above the average, but her personality carried great weight with the audience. The orchestral accompaniment was a background that a diva might have envied, though possibly needing it less.

Mrs. Nikisch sang three songs later upon the same programme which captivated her hearers. "Die Quelle" by Goldmark is a gem which will always be beautiful, and the plaintive "Florian's Song" is too pretty not to be popular. Her voice is dramatic, well schooled, and she invests all that she does with rare intelligence. Mrs. Nikisch was accompanied upon the piano by her husband who perfectly understands the art, more so, possibly, than anyone who has appeared in Buffalo.

Following the aria the orchestra presented two numbers from Godard's "Oriental Symphony," providing musicians here with a new sensation. Both selections were delicious in their quaintness and enjoyed immensely by the audience. Dvorak's Scherzo followed, gaining for the Prague composer a hearing which his talent thoroughly deserves. Beautiful music beautifully played is but a passing tribute which is inadequate to the prolific theme.

Franz Rummel, the piano virtuoso, carried off the honors of the afternoon. He played the Liszt Concerto in E flat superbly, and was recalled three times. The orchestral part was equally well done, making a most symmetric performance, and one not to be easily displaced or forgotten.

Mr. Behrens gave the aria from "La Juive" only indifferently well, but his singing of two of Schubert's songs, namely, "The Linden Tree" and "The Wanderer," was exceptionally good. He has an immense compass, and a control of the sotto voce that many a singer might envy.

The programme closed with Mendelssohn's familiar "Midsummer Night's Dream," played with the care that is characteristic of this splendid band.

The Evening Concert.

The second evening concert of the Festival was very German in character, and, with the exception of three numbers, did not draw upon the resources of any other nationality. Von Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the aria "Piano! Piano!" from "Der Freischutz," introduced the orchestra as principal and then accompanists. As is well known, the composer desired to cater to a popular taste at the time "Oberon" was written, and the work was given more to propitiate the people than to increase his reputation as a master of counterpart. It is replete with fairy music, in which conception Von Weber had no rival. The [illegible] themselves and the magical chorus ... of Fairyland completely surround the listener, and the whirlwind of notes is like the fluttering of myriads of wings. The themes which occur beginning after the introduction of Sir Huon's horns, introduce "Over the Dark Blue Waters" and the second song known as "From Boyhood Trained." Then comes the suggestion from the magnificent aria which follows in the opera. It is difficult to associate Von Weber with "Oberon," especially when the mind recurs to the musical value of "Der Freischutz." It is an eccentricity which is fascinating and deliciously piquant, however, and it will live as an exemplification of the irrational moments in the life of a very rational author. In the aria, "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster" Von Weber returns to his best and strongest self and it is a great piece of composition.

Owing to the substitution of Marie Jahn for Mme. Mielke, the solo was omitted from the programme and the familiar aria mentioned above was given. During the past winter Miss Jahn has sung at the German opera in New York, and with acceptance. She is a tall, dignified woman, with a voice of surpassing beauty in quality, and she understands using it. Her singing of the aria commanded the respect of musicians. She will appear again during the Festival, a pleasant anticipation for those who recognize her ability.

The "War Song of the Ancient Germans," Mr. John Lund's dramatic composition, introduced Miss Jahn and Mr. Bushnell as soloists, together with the best male chorus that has ever been heard in Buffalo. The latter were upon the musical warpath, and threw their mightiest effort into the dramatic interpretation of the music. They were ambitious to do their popular conductor great honor, and they succeeded beyond the fondest expectations of their friends. The hall rang with acclamation at the close of the selection, and the soloists and composer were recalled. Miss Jahn sang her solo well and Mr. Bushnell acquitted himself creditably in his short solo. Mr. Lund was cheered most enthusiastically at the end.

The "Rhapsody" by Lalo, the Spanish composer, which followed, carried the audience bodily into the modern French school, and left them the enjoyment of having to make no mental effort to comprehend the music. Lalo is delightful in chamber music and his "Rhapsody" is an overgrowth of the same style with bolder outlines and stronger forms. It is scored for a full orchestra, and has a character of its own which is most pleasing. It was a favorite with the audience immediately, and grew in the admiration of all as the orchestra painted its many charms.

Miss Howe's appearance was the signal for tremendous applause, which only ceased as the introductory strains of the "Bell Song" were played. The singer has great control of voice, good execution, and a high range which has phenomenal notes. This upper register appeared to good advantage in an aria which has no merit whatever beyond those phrases difficult to sing. Miss Howe sang the music easily, however, taking trill, cadenza, and runs with perfect ease. In her second number, "The Nightingale," the same quiet control was apparent, and the high F was touched as if it did not lie far beyond the extreme limits of ordinary voices. The orchestra accompanied the "Bell Song" delightfully.

Goldmark's symphony, entitled the "Rustic Wedding," has a variety which saves it in the eyes of many a musician. There are immense merits in the composition, but they are distributed too far apart. It is moreover a piece of work which needs to be studied while in the most sympathetic vein with the Hungarian writer. His use of the oboe and bassoon and the general harmonization is quaint, breaking away from forms which have become classic. The orchestra played it with full justice of Goldmark, but it matters very little what it plays from a listener's standpoint, but it is all refreshingly acceptable. The criticism which was made upon Goldmark by a Viennese critic seems a very just one, after hearing this composition, namely; That his style was intermediate between that of Meyerbeer and Wagner at the "Tannhauser" period. In the various theme and variations the solo instruments in the orchestra are shown prominently, making it an interesting study of ingenious arrangement.

"The "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the "Vorspiel" and Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" were evidently to the mind of the orchestra, for the musicians played it with magnificent effect. Mr. Nikisch has, however, his own interpretations, and they do not run at all parallel with established rules. He is a law unto himself, and the force of that law in which he has perfect faith, impresses itself upon his orchestra. Many a performer under his control has wondered at the musical vagaries displayed by the conductor, and while he has obeyed them, he has done so with a mental reservation. The "Waldeweben" is perfectly familiar, but it has worn into what may be called an American groove. Mr. Nikisch having sat at the feet of the Beyreuth Gamaliel, knows precisely the theories and desires of the composer. This changed appearance of the "Waldeweben" is perplexing, and yet the motif is expressed so beautifully that it must be the right conception. "Tristan and Isolde" embodies all the unbridled self of Wagner with no suggestion of hideousness, but the most subtle portrayal of passionate love that can be conceived. The music sways and writhes with an intenseness the very depths of the coldest nature, and Wagner, though dead, speaks with a tongue of fire. No other two selections could have been more acceptable in Buffalo, where so little is known of the master pieces of his composition. Theodore Thomas is credited with saying, at the recent testimonial banquet tendered him in New York, that Wagner never should be played in the concert-room. If, however, he can be played as was demonstrated last evening, it will be difficult to make the musical world believe that he spoke in seriousness or meant to convey such an idea.

The concert closed at a late hour with the singing of the chorale from "The Meistersinger" by the Festival chorus, accompanied by the full orchestra and conducted by Mr. Lund.

Another splendid programme is offered for to-night. The orchestra numbers and those for the soloists indicate an entertainment of rare excellence. One feature will be changed. Word has been received from New York that Miss Mary Fox is quite ill, and her physician, Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis forbids her coming on to fill her engagement. In her place the Musical Association has secured a Swedish singer, Miss Fremstad, who is spoken of in the highest terms by German musical critics in New York. Her voice is a mezzo soprano. She is but 20 years old, but wherever she has appeared has given evidence of great talent. Mr. E. C. Bushnell believes that she will make a fine impression.

Following is the programme for to-night as corrected:

Symphonic poem—"Lancelot and Elaine,"
MacDowell
Overture—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet,"
Tschaikowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Songs—
(a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
(b) "In the East".....Mulligan
Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Solo—Bird song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David
Miss Mary Howe.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn, and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried and Gotterdammerung,"
Wagner
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Songs—
(a) "Still as the Night".....Bohm
(b) "Happiest Day".....Hellmund
Miss Fremstad.
Symphonic in C Minor No. 5 .....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo—"Echo Song".....Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg
Festival Chorus.

Notes.

The chorus chairs vacated by their fair and manly occupants made one think of Coney Island in October.

Mary Howe's pictures are lovely—but Mary Howe herself—why Euterpe would faint with envy could she see her.

Arthur Nikisch's family name has been pronounced in many ways. Some call it Nyekisch; others, Nik-eesh with the accent on the "eesh." The correct pronounciation is just what anybody would suppose it is—"Nich-ish" —with the accent on the "Nich."

A great many people were late again yesterday and last night. The performances begin so very soon after 8 o'clock that it behooves all to be in their places by that time, for the doors are shut just before the first number, and they are not opened again until it is concluded.

A great many people are longing to see the ghost of a smile on the face of Herr Nikisch. He is solemn because he is very tired. The Orchestra has been traveling now nearly four weeks, and has just finished taking part in the Louisville festival. The smiling will come after the return home.

Euterpe never before provoked the curiosity that she has this week. If the muse's name was Sniggin (which is pretty near Singing) she couldn't have her name more talked about. Some imagine that the word is in plain English letters, but done by a foreigner who doesn't know his business. Others think that the word is "Evergreen" spelt in a new way, and still others suggest that it is "European," out of compliment to the Orchestra leader and most of the soloists.

[150]

FADED TEXT

THE ENQUIRER.
CINCINNATI, O.
SUNDAY.....MAY 12, 1891.

A GRAND SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Warmly Greeted at the Odeon.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening, called out one of the largest and most brilliant audiences of the season. Society and the musical profession gathered to pay their tribute of homage to Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, who, without a doubt, is one of the few orchestra conductors living at the present time. The programme as originally published was changed by the addition of the overture "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, and the substitution of Raff's Symphony "Im Walde" for Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B. The personnel of the orchestra is about the same as it was last year, with the exception of the strings, which have been considerably strengthened, the first violins numbering alone fourteen, and the balance of the quartet in proportion, making the total a band of seventy skilled musicians, under the baton of an unsurpassable director.

The interpretation of the various numbers was artistic to the highest degree, the performers having apparently overcome all the technical difficulties, making it possible for them to follow minutely every direction dictated by Mr. Nikisch's poetical conception. The Berlioz overture and Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from his Symphony No. 4 were novelties for the Cincinnati musical world. These works are tone pictures of the modern school, exceedingly characteristic in orchestration and intricate in movement, producing at times some very striking effects. The Raff symphony and Wagner numbers have been heard here before this, but the rendition of them by the Boston Orchestra has not been surpassed.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who sang with taste and artistic delivery. Her voice is a soprano of a not very sympathetic quality, but what the lady lacks in quality she makes up by her splendid declamation.

The orchestra goes from here to Louisville, Ky., where it is to be the leading attraction of the May Festival.

SUNDAY HERALD.
BOSTON, MAY 24, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Unusual Interest in the Music Hall Promenades.

The Tour of the Boston Orchestra—Some Statistics—Mr. Mullaly's Benefit Concert Tonight—Sharp Comments Upon Sullivan's "Ivanhoe"—News Notes and Current Gossip.

The arrangements for the promenade concert season, to begin at Music Hall on the evening of June 1, have been well advanced during the week, and the first nights of the season give promise of reawakening the popularity of these pleasant summer night entertainments with grand success.

Manager Ellis will arrive back home with the Symphony orchestra this afternoon, and the announcement of the conductor selected for the season will be made upon his return. The choice will undoubtedly meet the approval of all Promenade patrons, as the position is one that offers a strong inducement to the best directors in the country, thus making the selection a matter of great importance.

A number of promising engagements have been made with soloists, and the programmes will be constantly varied by contributions from vocalists and instrumental players.

The scale of prices for the season will be the same as in former years—25 cents for admission, and an additional 25 cents for seats at the tables within the rail or in the front row of the first balcony.

The orchestra, numbering 50 men, will be made up from the Symphony men of the winter season, and rehearsals will be begun early in the coming week.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The Boston Symphony orchestra left Buffalo last evening at the end of the concert which concluded the festival in that city, and the organization will arrive in this city this afternoon, thus completing its fifth annual tour. During its four weeks' absence from Boston the orchestra has appeared in 11 or the largest cities of the country, and has met with greater artistic and financial success than has ever attended a similar tour.

The concert engagements filled have included two festival schemes, those of Louisville and Buffalo, and the aggregate number of patrons is estimated at above 50,000. A noticable feature of the trip has been that the financial success of nearly all the concerts of the tour was guaranteed.

The management of the tour differed from that of many organizations on the road, as the entire cost of the 3000 miles' travel of the 60 men was paid in cash before the party left Boston, and the plans were so made that only five nights were passed in sleeping cars.

The orchestra was put to a severe test in Chicago, where "La Grippe" invalided 10 men at two of the concerts given there, among these being Concert Meister Kneisel and the first violinists, Adamowski, Rath and Kuntz.

The soloists of the tour have been Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Jahn, Miss Mary Howe, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Lena Little, Mme. Lapokirk, Mrs. Seabury Ford and Messrs. Listemann, Dippel, Mockridge, Rieger, Behrens, Kneisel, Kneisel, Adamowski, Hekking and [illegible]

[illegible] has been personally conducted by Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, [illegible] Comee, and not a slip or accident of [illegible] has occurred to mar the trip, the [illegible] being made and carried out with rare [illegible] Conductor Arthur [illegible] much to the results [illegible] personal popularity he has [illegible] of many cities, and,

BUFFALO [illegible]
Saturday Morning, May 23, 1891.

NEARING THE END.

THE GREAT MAY FESTIVAL CLOSES TO-DAY.

Good Work of the Orchestra and Singers at the Fourth Concert—To-day's Programmes—Notes.

The music festival passed the culminating point yesterday and is rapidly approaching its end. Only one concert was given in the evening, and the interruption of the matinees thus effected was doubtless discreet as it relieved the tension to which both the artists and the public have been subjected during the week. The judicious reduction in general prices of admission announced yesterday, together with the inherent attractiveness of the programme offered and the pleasant state of the weather, combined to draw to Music Hall last evening the largest audience of the week, there being very few vacant seats left in any part of the hall.

As the programme brought forth few new faces and no works of importance that were new here, it suggests less opportunity for comment than did the previous concerts. The opening number was a symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine," which was particularly interesting as being the work of a promising young American composer, E. A. MacDowell. The piece is of the order known as programme music and is supposed to picture the scenes of Tennyson's poem. As is the case, however, with all compositions of this type, including Liszt's as well as others, one has to know the theme which it is attempted to portray before being able to discover the intended meaning of the music, and at the best the association must ever remain vague. When these compositions, however, have inherent musical value, as they must have to be entitled to consideration, they are no less interesting by reason of the purpose which animated them of representing some concrete subject of thought. Mr. MacDowell's composition shows him to be entire master of orchestral resources; and while one is disposed to think that he has at times lost sight of the elements of beauty and grace, which must after all distinguish all works of art, in his flights after unusual effects, there is no reason for withholding praise for the work as an encouraging product of home talent. Later on the orchestra gave the Tschaikowsky overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," which, after like fashion, is supposed to suggest the scenes of Shakespeare's play, and is equally vague. The composition, however, is a brilliant one, and was appreciated. The Wagner extracts, from his later operas, were revelations of the ultimate resources of a modern orchestra, and were especially interesting as such.

To most of the listeners who have not yet been educated up, or down, to the extremest flights of modern musical fancy, Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony was doubtless the most grateful orchestral performance of the evening. For the sake of developing local musical culture by enlarging its acquaintance with less familiar works of the great composers, one could wish that this symphony were not so often repeated; but when its impressive opening notes are once sounded, no one wishes to have it stop, so refreshing is its charm. The performance of the work last evening under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitious, being noticably broad, straightforward, and unaffected. Some ambitious young directors have of recent years made innovations in the interpretation of this symphony, with a view to revealing hidden effects, but with the result usually of displaying their own hidden defects. Mr. Nikisch gives the work in a natural and honest way, knowing that such treatment with so fine an orchestra is well calculated to show the work at its best.

Of the soloist of the evening, Mr. Behrens gave a number of songs, appearing twice, and his rich and sonorous voice and dignity of method proved as pleasing and impressive as on his first appearance the day before, and he was loudly applauded. Mr. Rieger was heard to advantage in two songs and showed himself the possessor of a very melodious tenor voice which he uses in a quiet and artistic style. Miss Howe sang David's bird song, "Pearl of Brazil," and Eckert's "Echo" song, in which she revealed the same cold brilliancy of voice and execution noted on her first appearance and aroused the same degree of enthusiasm. Miss Olive Fremstad, who appeared as a substitute for Miss Fox, sang two songs in which she revealed a rich contralto voice and fine sentiment. Her efforts were warmly received.

A grateful and inspiring number of the programme was the closing chorus "To Thee, O Country!" by Eichberg, which has [illegible] festal or patriotic occasions. It was given by the full mixed chorus and orchestra under the direction of Mr. Lund with genuine spirit, and proved a fitting finale to the concert.

To-day's Programmes.

The Festival will close to-day with a matinee and evening performance. The feature of the matinee will be the children's chorus of 1,000 voices, who will be heard in a large variety of songs under the direction of their instructor, Mr. E. L. Baker. The orchestra and a number of the prominent soloists will likewise participate.

To-night's performance will be notable as offering the first production in this country of Krug's cantata "King Rother," which was published in this country with English text for the Buffalo Festival. There will also be a number of other attractive selections preceding the cantata. The hall should be crowded so that the Festival may end in a brilliant and enthusiastic style.

The full programmes for the day are as follows:

MATINEE CONCERT.

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorus, (Children's).
(a) Choral—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee,"....Selected
(b) Part Song—"Sweet Spring Evening,"...Gluck
(c) Solo, Duet and Chorus—"Sigh Gentle Gales,".....N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.
Aria—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhauser,".....Wagner
Miss Jahn.
Fantaisie for Flute—"Airs Valaques,"....Fr. Doppler
Mr. Mole.
Anthem—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker
Soloists: Miss Margaret E. Campbell.
Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Songs.
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. Bushnell.
Largo .....Handel
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs.
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund
Mr. Reiger.
Songs.
(a) Solo and Chorus—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Bierly
(b) Chorus—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
(c) Part Song—"Good Night".....Franz Abt
Children's Chorus.
Overture—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Children's choruses conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

EVENING CONCERT.

Symphonic Poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Lohengrin's Narrative—from "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Mr. Dippel.
Songs with piano—
(a) Unterm Lindenbaum.....Wallnoefer
(b) Waldwanderung .....Grieg
(c) Fruehlingsnacht .....Schumann
Mrs. Nikisch.
PART II.
"King Rother," a Cantata.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere, Miss Philipbaar, Mr. Bushnell, Mr. Sheehan.
Festival Chorus of 500 Voices and Orchestra, John Lund, conductor.

Stray Notes.

Mr. E. L. Baker will conduct the children's chorus this afternoon.

Miss Howe's singing is of the pyrotechnic order, and as such is necessarily dazzling.

With so fine a violinist as Adamowski in the orchestra one or more of the standard violin concertos should have been given in place of some of the vocal numbers.

The general admission for this afternoon is 75 cents, children 50 cents, and for the evening concert $1. There are plenty of good seats at the above prices, and there should be no vacant ones at either performance.

The following local singers, forming a quadruple quartette, will be heard in portions of "King Rother," which will be presented to-night for the first time in America: Mrs. Jesse Otterstatter, the Misses Clara Philipbaar, Charlotte Inman, Kate Sherbourne, Charlotte Tilden, Carolyn Eckert, Ada Gates, Mrs. Dietrich-Minehan, and Messrs. E. M. Kelly, Jesse Otterstatter, L. S. Lodge, Frank Willingharst, F. C. M. Lautz, W. E. Kisselburgh, C. F. Hager, and E. C. Walker.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, MAY 25.

Symphonists at Home.

NORTH ADAMS, May 24.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, homeward bound, stopped here about an hour this morning and breakfasted at the Wilson House. The party left at 10.45, and attached to their special train was a platform car which had been fitted up under the direction of Agent Eastman, that the musicians might view the big tunnel through the Hoosac range. All expressed themselves as highly delighted with the town and seemed to enjoy their underground ride immensely. The party was conducted by Mr. Fred Comee, who made his friend, Capt. F. S. Richardson of this town, a brief visit.

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.
SUNDAY, MAY 24, 1891.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....May 24

NIKISCH RECEIVES OVATION.

His Orchestra Delights Buffalo and Starts for Home.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 23.—The musical festival was brought to a close here today with two concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Music Hall was filled this afternoon.

The children's chorus was a novelty, but a great success. The audience was made up in good part by young people, for whom the programme had been especially chosen.

This evening at 8 o'clock the final concert was given. The soloists were Miss Marie Jahn, Miss Clementine De Vere, Mr. Andreas Dippel and Mr. E. C. Bushnell. The programme was in two parts.

At the close of the concert the applause was continued for some moments, and Conductor Nikisch was recalled again and again. The orchestra left for Boston at the close of the concert.

——The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive home this afternoon from its Western trip, which has been such a successful one, eclipsing any in the history of this organization. Everywhere have they been received with the greatest cordiality, but in no city were they more royally entertained than in Buffalo, where they closed a four days' season of concerts last night. The members of the Buffalo and Country clubs, who were largely interested in the musical festival, opened their houses to the orchestra. On Wednesday they were taken for a drive in two stunning four-horse drags. In the first one, driven by Mr. Harry Hamlin, one of the finest whips in the State, were Mrs. Wyman, Manager Ellis, Assistant Manager Comee, and several members of the club. President Hayes of the Buffalo Club drove the second. In it were Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Mary Howe, Mr. Hekking and other members of the club. After the concert in the evening Mr. Nikisch, the Adamowski brothers, Mr. Hekking and Messrs. Ellis and Comee were entertained at the Buffalo Club. An elaborate spread was served, and Mr. Nikisch, Mr. T. Adamowwski and Mr. Hekking played.

[illegible] Buffalo, N. Y. ate 5-20

THIS EVENING

The Great May Festival Will be Brilliantly Inaugurated.

Music hall is in gala day attire for the greatest event in its musical history.

All the arrangements are completed for the Festival which will be inaugurated this evening. The decorations are elaborate and were designed by W. C. Cornwell and F. C. M. Lautz.

The decorations consist of heavy ropes of laurel looped in the form of draperies and garlands all about the balcony and the boxes are fairly covered with the waxen

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

foliage. Scott the florist is doing the work. The rehearsal last evening was most satisfactory in every respect and the concert this evening will be a great and glorious success. Nearly all the soloists are in the city. Beautiful Mary Howe arrived yesterday and is stopping at the Iroquois. The following is the programme for this evening:

Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor.
Soloists—Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Judie L. Wyman, Mr. W. H. Rieger, Mr. Francis Fisher Powers.

PART I.

Overture—"Leonore No. 3".....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.
Aria—"O tu Palermo" Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Mr. Powers.
Suite—"Peer Gynt"—op 46.....Grieg
Daybreak—The Death of Asse—Anitra's Dance—In the Halls of the King of Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.
(a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps } "Damnation of
(b) Dance of Sylphs..... } Faust"
(c) Hungarian March.....Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs with Piano— (a) "Enchantment".....Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?".....Wekerlin
(c) "Hearts Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

PART II.

"Eve".....Massenet
A Mystery in Three Parts.
Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival Chorus of 500 Voices.....
.....John Lund, Conductor.

[151]

FADED TEXT

THE ENQUIRER.

CINCINNATI,

TUESDAY.....MAY 12, 1891.

A GRAND SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Warmly Greeted at the Odeon.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening, called out one of the largest and most brilliant audiences of the season. Society and the musical profession gathered to pay their tribute of homage to Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor, who, without a doubt, is one of the few orchestra conductors living at the present time. The programme as originally published was changed by the addition of the overture "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, and the substitution of Raff's Symphony "Im Walde" for Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B. The personnel of the orchestra is about the same as it was last year, with the exception of the strings, which have been considerably strengthened, the first violins numbering alone fourteen, and the balance of the quartet in proportion, making the total a band of seventy skilled musicians, under the baton of an unsurpassable director.

The interpretation of the various numbers was artistic to the highest degree, the performers having apparently overcome all the technical difficulties, making it possible for them to follow minutely every direction dictated by Mr. Nikisch's poetical conception. The Berlioz overture and Tschaikowsky's andantino and scherzo from his Symphony No. 4 were novelties for the Cincinnati musical world. These works are tone pictures of the modern school, exceedingly characteristic in orchestration and intricate in movement, producing at times some very striking effects. The Raff symphony and Wagner numbers have been heard here before this, but the rendition of them by the Boston Orchestra has not been surpassed.

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, who sang with taste and artistic delivery. Her voice is a soprano of a not very sympathetic quality, but what the lady lacks in quality she makes up by her splendid declamation.

The orchestra goes from here to Louisville, Ky., where it is to be the leading attraction of the May Festival.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, MAY 24, 1891.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Unusual Interest in the Music Hall Promenades.

The Tour of the Boston Orchestra—Some Statistics—Mr. Mullaly's Benefit Concert Tonight—Sharp Comments Upon Sullivan's "Ivanhoe"—News Notes and Current Gossip.

The arrangements for the promenade concert season, to begin at Music Hall on the evening of June 1, have been well advanced during the week, and the first nights of the season give promise of reawakening the popularity of these pleasant summer night entertainments with grand success.

Manager Ellis will arrive back home with the Symphony orchestra this afternoon, and the announcement of the conductor selected for the season will be made upon his return. The choice will undoubtedly meet the approval of all Promenade patrons, as the position is one that offers a strong inducement to the best directors in the country, thus making the selection a matter of great importance.

A number of promising engagements have been made with soloists, and the programmes will be constantly varied by contributions from vocalists and instrumental players.

The scale of prices for the season will be the same as in former years—25 cents for admission, and an additional 25 cents for seats at the tables within the rail or in the front row of the first balcony.

The orchestra, numbering 50 men, will be made up from the Symphony men of the winter season, and rehearsals will be begun early in the coming week.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The Boston Symphony orchestra left Buffalo last evening at the end of the concert which concluded the festival in that city, and the organization will arrive in this city this afternoon, thus completing its fifth annual tour. During its four weeks' absence from Boston the orchestra has appeared in 11 of the largest cities of the country, and has met with greater artistic and financial success than has ever attended a similar tour.

The concert engagements filled have included two festival schemes, those of Louisville and Buffalo, and the aggregate number of patrons is estimated at above 50,000. A noticable feature of the trip has been that the financial success of nearly all the concerts of the tour was guaranteed.

The management of the tour differed from that of many organizations on the road, as the entire cost of the 3000 miles' travel of the 80 men was paid in cash before the party left Boston, and the plans were so made that only five nights were passed in sleeping cars.

The orchestra was put to a severe test in Chicago, where "La Grippe" invalided 10 men at two of the concerts given there, among these being Concert Meister Kneisel and the first violinists, Adamowski, Rath and Kuntz.

The soloists of the tour have been Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Jahn, Miss Mary Howe, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Lena Little, Mme. Hopekirk, Mrs. Seabury Ford and Messrs. Ludwig, Dippel, Mockridge, Rieger, Behrens, Timmel, Kneisel, Adamowski, Hekking and [illegible].

The tour has been personally conducted by Manager Charles A. Ellis and his assistant, Fred R. Comee, and not a slip or accident of any sort has occurred to mar the trip, the plans being made and carried out with rare success at all points. Conductor Arthur Nikisch has also added much to the results [illegible] the personal popularity he has [illegible] with the publics of other cities, and, [illegible] the highest credit [illegible] and the Symphony orchestra.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Saturday Morning, May 23, 1891.

NEARING THE END.

THE GREAT MAY FESTIVAL CLOSES TO-DAY.

Good Work of the Orchestra and Singers at the Fourth Concert—To-day's Programmes—Notes.

The music festival passed the culminating point yesterday and is rapidly approaching its end. Only one concert was given in the evening, and the interruption of the matinees thus effected was doubtless discreet as it relieved the tension to which both the artists and the public have been subjected during the week. The judicious reduction in general prices of admission announced yesterday, together with the inherent attractiveness of the programme offered and the pleasant state of the weather, combined to draw to Music Hall last evening the largest audience of the week, there being very few vacant seats left in any part of the hall.

As the programme brought forth few new faces and no works of importance that were new here, it suggests less opportunity for comment than did the previous concerts. The opening number was a symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine," which was particularly interesting as being the work of a promising young American composer, E. A. MacDowell. The piece is of the order known as programme music and is supposed to picture the scenes of Tennyson's poem. As is the case, however, with all compositions of this type, including Liszt's as well as others, one has to know the theme which it is attempted to portray before being able to discover the intended meaning of the music, and at the best the association must ever remain vague. When these compositions, however, have inherent musical value, as they must have to be entitled to consideration, they are no less interesting by reason of the purpose which animated them of representing some concrete subject of thought. Mr. MacDowell's composition shows him to be entire master of orchestral resources; and while one is disposed to think that he has at times lost sight of the elements of beauty and grace, which must after all distinguish all works of art, in his flights after unusual effects, there is no reason for withholding praise for the work as an encouraging product of home talent. Later on the orchestra gave the Tschaikowsky overture fantasie "Romeo and Juliet," which, after like fashion, is supposed to suggest the scenes of Shakespeare's play, and is equally vague. The composition, however, is a brilliant one, and was appreciated. The Wagner extracts, from his later operas, were revelations of the ultimate resources of a modern orchestra, and were especially interesting as such.

To most of the listeners who have not yet been educated up, or down, to the extremest flights of modern musical fancy, Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony was doubtless the most grateful orchestral performance of the evening. For the sake of developing local musical culture by enlarging its acquaintance with less familiar works of the great composers, one could wish that this symphony were not so often repeated; but when its impressive opening notes are once sounded, no one wishes to have it stop, so refreshing is its charm. The performance of the work last evening under the direction of Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitious, being noticably broad, straightforward, and unaffected. Some ambitious young directors have of recent years made innovations in the interpretation of this symphony, with a view to revealing hidden effects, but with the result usually of displaying their own hidden defects. Mr. Nikisch gives the work in a natural and honest way, knowing that such treatment with so fine an orchestra is well calculated to show the work at its best.

Of the soloist of the evening, Mr. Behrens gave a number of songs, appearing twice, and his rich and sonorous voice and dignity of method proved as pleasing and impressive as on his first appearance the day before, and he was loudly applauded. Mr. Rieger was heard to advantage in two songs and showed himself the possessor of a very melodious tenor voice which he uses in a quiet and artistic style. Miss Howe sang David's bird song, "Pearl of Brazil," and Eckert's "Echo" song, in which she revealed the same cold brilliancy of voice and execution noted on her first appearance and aroused the same degree of enthusiasm. Miss Olive Fremstad, who appeared as a substitute for Miss Fox, sang two songs in which she revealed a rich contralto voice and fine sentiment. Her efforts were warmly received.

A grateful and inspiring number of the programme was the closing chorus "To Thee, O Country!" by Eichberg, which has festal or patriotic occasions. It was given by the full mixed chorus and orchestra under the direction of Mr. Lund with genuine spirit, and proved a fitting finale to the concert.

To-day's Programmes.

The Festival will close to-day with a matinee and evening performance. The feature of the matinee will be the children's chorus of 1,000 voices, who will be heard in a large variety of songs under the direction of their instructor, Mr. E. L. Baker. The orchestra and a number of the prominent soloists will likewise participate.

To-night's performance will be notable as offering the first production in this country of Krug's cantata "King Rother," which was published in this country with English text for the Buffalo Festival. There will also be a number of other attractive selections preceding the cantata. The hall should be crowded so that the Festival may end in a brilliant and enthusiastic style.

The full programmes for the day are as follows:

MATINEE CONCERT.

Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chorus, (Children's).
(a) Choral—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee,"....Selected
(b) Part Song—"Sweet Spring Evening,"...Gluck
(c) Solo, Duet and Chorus—"Sigh Gentle Gales,".....N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.

Aria—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhauser,".....Wagner
Miss Jahn.

Fantaisie for Flute—"Airs Valaques,"....Fr. Doppler
Mr. Mole.

Anthem—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker
Soloists: Miss Margaret E. Campbell.
Mr. W. H. Rieger.

Songs.
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. Bushnell.

Largo.....Handel
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Songs.
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund
Mr. Reiger.

Songs.
(a) Solo and Chorus—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Bierly
(b) Chorus—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
(c) Part Song—"Good Night".....Franz Abt
Children's Chorus.

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Children's choruses conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

EVENING CONCERT.

Symphonic Poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lohengrin's Narrative—from "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Mr. Dippel.

Songs with piano—
(a) Unterm Lindenbaum.....Wallnoefer
(b) Waldwanderung.....Grieg
(c) Fruehlingsnacht.....Schumann
Mrs. Nikisch.

PART II.

"King Rother," a Cantata.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere, Miss Philipbar, Mr. Bushnell, Mr. Sheehan.
Festival Chorus of 500 Voices and Orchestra, John Lund, conductor.

Stray Notes.

Mr. E. L. Baker will conduct the children's chorus this afternoon.

Miss Howe's singing is of the pyrotechnic order, and as such is necessarily dazzling.

With so fine a violinist as Adamowski in the orchestra one or more of the standard violin concertos should have been given in place of some of the vocal numbers.

The general admission for this afternoon is 75 cents, children 50 cents, and for the evening concert $1. There are plenty of good seats at the above prices, and there should be no vacant ones at either performance.

The following local singers, forming a quadruple quartette, will be heard in portions of "King Rother," which will be presented to-night for the first time in America: Mrs. Jesse Otterstatter, the Misses Clara Philipbaar, Charlotte Inman, Kate Sherbourne, Charlotte Tilden, Carolyn Eckert, Ada Gates, Mrs. Dietrich-Minehan, and Messrs. E. M. Kelly, Jesse Otterstatter, L. S. Lodge, Frank Willingharst, F. C. M. Lautz, W. E. Kisselburgh, C. F. Hager, and E. C. Walker.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, MAY 25.

Symphonists at Home.

NORTH ADAMS, May 24.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, homeward bound, stopped here about an hour this morning and breakfasted at the Wilson House. The party left at 10.45, and attached to their special train was a platform car which had been fitted up under the direction of Agent Eastman, that the musicians might view the big tunnel through the Hoosac range. All expressed themselves as highly delighted with the town and seemed to enjoy their underground ride immensely. The party was conducted by Mr. Fred Comee, who made his friend, Capt. F. S. Richardson of this town, a brief visit.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.

SUNDAY, MAY 24, 1891.

MINIATURE ALMANAC.....May 24

NIKISCH RECEIVES OVATION.

His Orchestra Delights Buffalo and Starts for Home.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 23.—The musical festival was brought to a close here today with two concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Music Hall was filled this afternoon.

The children's chorus was a novelty, but a great success. The audience was made up in good part by young people, for whom the programme had been especially chosen.

This evening at 8 o'clock the final concert was given. The soloists were Miss Marie Jahn, Miss Clementine De Vere, Mr. Andreas Dippel and Mr. E. C. Bushnell. The programme was in two parts.

At the close of the concert the applause was continued for some moments, and Conductor Nikisch was recalled again and again. The orchestra left for Boston at the close of the concert.

——The Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive home this afternoon from its Western trip, which has been such a successful one, eclipsing any in the history of this organization. Everywhere have they been received with the greatest cordiality, but in no city were they more royally entertained than in Buffalo, where they closed a four days' season of concerts last night. The members of the Buffalo and Country clubs, who were largely interested in the musical festival, opened their houses to the orchestra. On Wednesday they were taken for a drive in two stunning four-horse drags. In the first one, driven by Mr. Harry Hamlin, one of the finest whips in the State, were Mrs. Wyman, Manager Ellis, Assistant Manager Comee, and several members of the club. President Hayes of the Buffalo Club drove the second. In it were Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Mary Howe, Mr. Hekking and other members of the club. After the concert in the evening Mr. Nikisch, the Adamowski brothers, Mr. Hekking and Messrs. Ellis and Comee were entertained at the Buffalo Club. An elaborate spread was served, and Mr. Nikisch, Mr. T. Adamowwski and Mr. Hekking played.

ate 5-26

THIS EVENING

The Great May Festival Will be Brilliantly Inaugurated.

Music hall is in gala day attire for the greatest event in its musical history.

All the arrangements are completed for the Festival which will be inaugurated this evening. The decorations are elaborate and were designed by W. C. Cornwell and F. C. M. Lautz.

The decorations consist of heavy ropes of laurel looped in the form of draperies and garlands all about the balcony and the boxes are fairly covered with the waxen

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

foliage. Scott the florist is doing the work. The rehearsal last evening was most satisfactory in every respect and the concert this evening will be a great and glorious success. Nearly all the soloists are in the city. Beautiful Mary Howe arrived yesterday and is stopping at the Iroquois. The following is the programme for this evening:

Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor.

Soloists— Miss Clementina De Vere, Mrs. Judie L. Wyman, Mr. W. H. Rieger, Mr. Francis Fisher Powers.

PART I.

Overture—"Leonore No. 3".....Beethoven
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Aria from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. Wyman.

Aria—"O tu Palermo" Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Mr. Powers.

Suite—"Peer Gynt"—op 46.....Grieg
Daybreak—The Death of Aase—Anitra's Dance—In the Halls of the King of Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss De Vere.

(a) Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps
(b) Dance of Sylphs
(c) Hungarian March
} "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Songs with Piano— (a) "Enchantment".....Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?".....Wekerlin
(c) "Hearts Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. Wyman.

PART II.

"Eve".....Massenet
A Mystery in Three Parts.
Eve.....Miss De Vere
Adam.....Mr. Powers
Narrator.....Mr. Rieger
Festival Chorus of 500 Voices.....John Lund, Conductor.

[151]

Buffalo Courier.
SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1891.

A MUSICAL TRIUMPH.

The Third Grand Evening Concert of the May Festival.

SUCCESSFUL IN ALL RESPECTS.

The Orchestra, the Soloists, and the Chorus—The Closing Day's Two Entertainments.

The rain was gentle yesterday, and being gentle it was considerate enough to cease before the Festival concert in the evening. The audience last night was larger than that on Thursday evening. There was a noticeable increase in the general admissions, which showed that the reduction in price had been wise.

The soloists, perhaps, created more of a furore than at any previous concert. Critical notice of their numbers is appended below.

Looking at the singers from the point of view of the audience, Mr. Behrens created the most enthusiasm, being recalled three times after his second number.

Miss Howe again had an ovation, and Mr. Rieger had a recall. Miss Fremstad, who sang in Miss Fox's place, is slight and fair, and looks very youthful—indeed she is said to be only 20. She has a very pleasing personality, and was twice recalled.

The programme for the third evening concert of the Festival, included, as to orchestral numbers, MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine;" overture, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky; two selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" by Wagner, and the symphony in C minor, No. 5, by Beethoven. Much interest was manifested in the composition by MacDowell, the popular Boston musician, who is acquiring a reputation in the creation of orchestral, instrumental, and vocal music. His talent is not confined to any one department of musical form, and his entire work shows that he has great density of gifts. No songs which have appeared within the last few years are more esteemed, and the fact that Mr. Nikisch presents his "Overture" speaks volumes in its favor. The latter is intended to be, and is, descriptive, following the familiar lines of Tennyson's poem so closely that there is no difficulty in understanding the musical themes. So little do Buffalonias hear of such music, however, that it is difficult to separate a poem such as the above into separate pictures which could be distinguishable, especially after the remembrance of the music has been confused with other selections.

MacDowell believes in the important factor known as motif, but his themes are not indifferently presented, nor indifferently developed. They are fashioned with skill in every particular. He has a strong character in what he does, not treating parts slightingly for the sake of startling contrasts, but keeping steadily before him the needs of the thought to be expressed. He has very marked lines in "Lancelot and Elaine," and they are prominent at times, perhaps too much so, and yet they are characteristicly beautiful.

Mr. Conrad Behrens sang in his best style at the close of the overture two songs by Lowe, and still later upon the programme two Swedish folk-songs. He was in better voice than at a previous concert, and excited the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm in his "Tra-la-la" refrain, running down into the deepest depths. He was obliged to return and bow his acknowledgement of the hearty applause three separate times. Mr. Behrens has become a great favorite in Buffalo since his first appearance this year.

Peter Tchaikowsky, the Russian musician, was born a composer, and his overture "Romeo and Juliet" bears the stamp of undisputed genius. It is a higher type of a symphonic poem, and has more necessary requisite for such a form than MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine." He is undoubtedly a devotee to the intellectual strength of Shakespeare's play. He does not in his music follow the traditional emotional sentiment, but represents a higher form of passionate tenderness. In the reading of such a work a conductor can easily throw his personality into the interpretation. Mr. Nikisch invested the poem with a judicious combination which had powerful influence upon his hearers. His extreme sensitiveness makes itself very apparent, but the velvet touch covers a steel-like point which can make dangerous wounds. His patience with weakness is undoubtedly short-lived, and with the resources of his magnificent band, he hides such with chords of musical charity. Throughout the overture the wind and brass instruments appear in charming guise. The oboe, whenever it has been prominent, shows the touch of a virtuoso, and it can be singled out as one of the best-played instruments in the orchestra. The work closed presumably with the romantic death of Juliet, and the whole story had been recalled by a most beautiful illustration of the power of instruments. There is no criticism to be made of such playing, for Mr. Nikisch leads his orchestra from one subtle passage to another with infinite grace.

Following these orchestral selections came two solos by Mr. William H. Rieger, namely the recitative and aria from "Reginella" by Braga, and "Entreaty" by Boehm. The programme was thus changed to enable the young tenor to do himself greater credit than was permitted him in work. He sings with fine expression, has a fine sense of what the music requires, and with enlarged experience will make a valuable singer. The heights of his art are before him, but between his present standing and his ultimate success, lie hours of conscientious work under the direction of a skillful hand. His style needs great improvement; his upper register is beautiful, but is not developed as it should be. As has been said, all this will come with work and experience. The song by Boehm was cleverly given, and the high tones especially pure and deliciously sweet.

Miss Mary Howe carried her listeners into the French school once more and gave the "Bird Song" from the "Pearl of Brazil," by David, precisely such a rendering as the music deserved. She is entitled to the thanks of the vocal community for not allowing the tremolo to interfere with honest, legitimate tone. Many of the soloists of the Festival have used it to excess, and have gone trembling through beautiful passages with unblushing ignorance of the rules of good singing. Her staccato notes are remarkable for perfect accuracy, and she has many qualities which challenge the admiration of the well informed. Her solo was received with great favor.

The reappearance of the orchestra seemed especially grateful after the frivolities of such compositions as soloists are obliged to select now to please the popular taste. "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Gotterdammerung," are perhaps the two most familiar selections from Wagner's operas known to the concert patron. They have been studied and reviewed sufficiently to make them old friends with musicians. They received the kindest possible treatment at the hands of the orchestra, drawing forth bursts of applause from the delighted listeners.

The next number upon the programme introduced a new singer from preparatory studies in the vocal workshop of Mr. Bristol of New York. Miss Fremstad very obligingly took the place of Miss Fox who was detained, so her physician stated, by illness, from taking part in the Festival. She is a young and attractive girl of honest, straightforward manner, and is an enthusiast in her art. Her voice is a rich contralto not yet fully developed or under control, but overflowing with promise for the future. In its entire compass there are no harsh notes and there are triumphs for Miss Fremstad in the coming years if she perseveres. Her stage manner was quiet, reserved, and that of a modest girl who sang because she loved her art. Neither of the selections, by Boehm and Meyer-Hilmund respectively, were however, calculated to show her best ability, but it matters little thus early in her career.

Between Miss Fremstad's solo and the "Echo Song" by Eckert, which Miss Howe sang marvelously well, appeared the great "Fifth Symphony" by Beethoven. It is the most familiar, and it is the most descriptive in it melancholy dignity of the splendid circle of nine, which have made his name immortal. A devotee of Beethoven listens with abated breath to the sequence of orchestral beauties which comprise its four parts. The master himself said when speaking of the opening notes of the work: "So pocht das schicksal au die Pforte," which translated means: "That is how Fate knocks at my door." A life long study makes the Fifth Symphony no more comprehensive than it was years ago, it cannot be put into form, but it reaches out with its tender musical arms and touches the very heart's core. The deepest feelings are stirred by its chords, and a musician surrenders himself willingly to the stream which hurries him along with such irresistible and tremendous force. Almost every musical writer and critic have attempted to describe this symphony, but each one has failed signally and, moreover, has known that he has failed. The music is its own best interpreter, and when played divinely as it was last evening, its beauties cannot be expressed adequately in words. Every man in the orchestra who contributed to the magnificent rendering has the grateful acknowledgment of those in the audience to whom Beethoven is the greatest of all masters. Such moments come rarely in life and they are never forgotten.

The audience should have been permitted to carry home the last triumphal chords of the symphony, but no such pleasure was vouchsafed them. The Eickberg chorus, "To Thee, O Country" had to be sung and it was well given, but the mind filled with Beethoven cannot readily turn with gratitude to the present school of composition. The singers themselves acknowledge the influence of the master, but fulfilled their part conscientiously and with appropriate enthusiasm. The concert was good throughout, and the largest audience yet attracted by the Festival enjoyed it.

To-day's Concerts.

The programme offered this afternoon will undoubtedly bring out a great audience, for the children's chorus—under Mr. Baker's leadership—will sing in two numbers, and their parents and friends will surely desire to see and hear them. The Largo by Handel for violins alone is enough in itself to draw a crowd. Wagner will be represented in the famous overture to "Tannhauser," and Von Weber in the overture to "Euryanthe." It will be an afternoon preëminently devoted to song. Following is the programme:

Overture and Finale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorus (children's)—
(a) Choral—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee,"
(b) Part Song—"Sweet Spring Evening,"
(c) Solo, duet, and chorus—"Sigh, Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.
Songs with piano—
(a) In Liebeslust.....Liszt
(b) Bon Jour, Susanne.....Delibes
(c) Fruehlingsnacht.....Schumann
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Solo for flute—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....

Soloists: Miss Margaret E. Campbell and Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Songs—
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schnecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. E. C. Bushnell.
Largo, for violins.....Haendel
Songs—
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Helmund
Mr. Rieger.
Songs—
(a) Solo and chorus—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
(b) Chorus—"The Banner of the Free,"
(c) Part Song—"Good Night".....Frans Abt
Children's Chorus.
Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival will end this evening and the programme promises to be one of the best of the series. Wagner is represented in three numbers. Mr. Dippel will be heard for the first time, and the cantata of "King Rother" will probably show the powers of the chorus in the fullest measure.

Following is the programme:

Symphonic poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Lohengrin's Narrative—from "Lohengrin,"
Mr. Dippel.
Aria—"O Lovely Halls," from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Marie Jahn.
Duet—"In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
Marie Jahn and Mr. Dippel.
"King Rother," a cantata.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere and Mr. Bushnell and Festival Chorus of 500 voices. John Lund, conductor.

Festival Notes.

Festival books at half price now.

This is the last day. Make it the biggest yet.

The Boston Symphony was presented each with a book by Mr. Weed.

Go this afternoon to see Mr. Baker conducting the children's chorus.

Dr. Lucien Howe gives a large reception for Miss Mary Howe this evening, from 10 to 11:30 o'clock.

Mr. Brennan's services in giving the press notes and information are very highly appreciated.

The programmes are somewhat long. One of the orchestra declares that they have not had such hard work all winter long as they are having this week, and that in Boston the performances are not more than half as long.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 5-19

150 ventilating lockers in the [illegible] gymnasium.

ARTHUR NIKISCH SELECTED.

He Will [illegible] of the Philharmonic Concerts This Year.

By a unanimous vote the Philharmonic society last evening resolved to employ the services of Arthur Nikisch and his permanent orchestra for the coming season. Mr. Nikisch has been only a year in this country and has been connected with the Boston symphony society during his residence here.

At the meeting last night Edward A. Seccomb was in the chair and B. T. Frothingham was secretary. From the executive committee Henry K. Sheldon reported that that body, true to its conception of what was the highest musical standard, had secured Mr. Nikisch's services. "Six concerts will be given, as usual," Mr. Sheldon went on to say, "and the high standard of the Philharmonic performances will be maintained. We hope the public will show no abatement of interest in this matter."

The committee's report was adopted unanimously, and the report presented by W. R. Bunker, the treasurer, was read. It was dated May 6, and showed the receipts and disbursements throughout the year:

RECEIPTS.

Cash on hand	$3,895.10
Subscriptions	4,778.00
Reserved seats	5,324.50
Door admissions	3,699.25
Interest	103.55
Total	$17,800.40

DISBURSEMENTS.

Orchestra, conductor and soloists	$12,352.50
Academy, stage, scenery, etc	2,307.50
Advertising and printing	2,364.68
Agent and sundries	456.00
Total	$17,481.68

As will be seen, this leaves a balance of $318.72 with which to begin the new year.

William H. Cromwell, from the finance committee, reported that he had gone over the accounts and found them correct.

On motion of Carl H. De Silver a vote of thanks to Mr. Bunker, the treasurer, and Mr. Frothingham, the secretary, was unanimously adopted.

These directors, whose terms will expire in 1894, were elected: Henry K. Sheldon, L. S. Burnham, William H. Cromwell, B. T. Frothingham, George H. Prentiss, Edward B. Bartlett, John F. Praeger and C. H. De Silver.

[illegible] 2/0

AMUSEMENTS

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed by a large [illegible] last evening at Central Music Hall, and its brief series of concerts promises to furnish a fitting finale to Chicago's long and interesting musical season. The patient and persistent artistic effort of this splendid body of instrumentalists, up to within a season ago won tardy recognition in this city. The latter result was attained under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Indeed it is generally recognized that his efforts came nearer developing the artistic latent strength of the orchestra, and made a more potent appeal for public commendation than his predecessor. A New York authority this season frankly admitted the superiority of this company, stating "that in some respects the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations"—a remarkable confession to come out of Gotham. The primary idea of this orchestra as an institution was to be an educator, as well as an entertainer; the programmes excellently annotated by George Wilson, the character of the selections, as well the force and finish of their rendition, and the steady growth of the concerts in popular favor, indicate that the mission is being fulfilled in a way that must be most gratifying to all concerned. It may be interesting to glance at the composition of this organization. The instrumentalists enlisted are: Fourteen first violins, 12 second violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, 6 double bass, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 1 English horn, 2 bassoons, 1 bass clarinet, 2 clarinets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 2 trumpets, 1 tympane, 1 tuba, 1 harp, 3 percussion, or 72 in all, showing no curtailment of number to save expenses in travel. As may be observed this admirably balanced organization has an instrumental strength that would have satisfied the exactions of a Berlioz, and it is handled with a skill that would gratify Wagner himself. Director Nikisch leads without reference to the printed score, and appears to dominate the entire body with his peculiar personal magnetism. All the work of last evening seemed to be permeated with a subdued enthusiasm, showing the subtle sympathy between leader and instrumentalists. It may be recalled that the first season of this organization the strength lay in its strings; there has been no loss of power in this body, while there has been corresponding growth in the other component parts, notably the wood-wind. The programme last evening was inaugurated with the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." The overture is based upon themes from the opera, and although it might be called old in years it has the leit motive that Wagner developed to such perfection plentifully introduced. The strings open the work with a broad, swift flow of solemn melody of the cardinals, followed by the counter subject based on the Celein, a tender sentimental strain. This counter-melody is then transferred to the strings, against a gently rippling accompaniment for flute, oboe, and clarinet in semi-quavers. Its treatment in this manner, which occupies a considerable space, at length brought to a tonic full close; and, after a sudden and unexpected modulation to E-flat, the Cardinal's air is repeated in this key, but with an entirely new treatment, the melody being sustained by the violoncellos and clarinets, and richly embroidered by the violins con sordini, and flute and oboe alternately. The Celeni air again modified in scope and treatment enters the composition; and so the motives play hide and seek, coming and departing with fresh elaboration and disguises, until in the climax they gain to full force of the orchestra. The fine, splendidly sustained tone, the rich and varied modulations, the general accuracy of the rendition and the precision of finish gave the orchestra a most favorable introduction. The programme originally announced that Franz Kneisel would play Brahms' first movement from concerto for violin; instead Mr. Timothi Adamowski furnished a most acceptable substitute, playing Saint Saens' Rondo Capriccioso for violin. Seldom has a Chicago audience enjoyed a more charming musical treat. The dainty and delightful melody of Saint Saens had most magnetic and finished interpretation from the graceful bow of Mr. Adamowski, meriting the enthusiasm that it aroused. The Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried" has been given here under the direction of Anton Seidel when it had the advantages of the scenic show to ennance the music, but it had an even more rare or sympathetic interpretation last evening without any such adventitious aids. This exquisite tone poem, most ingenious in its melodic construction, showed a body of instrumentale most admirably adapted to faultless mechanical rendition, yet withal endowed with a flexibility to portray its glowing lights, its darkling shadows, the music of the whispering leaves and the carol of the birds among the branches; in fact to paint the picture through the imagery of sound. The concluding orchestral feature was Raff's Symphony No. 3, an interesting selection full of variety, rich in color, cheerfully suggestive of the exhilaration of the aromatic woodlands in spring, and was most artistically and delightfully played throughout. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the handsome wife of the director, was the vocalist of the evening, and her appearance completely dissipated the impression of her appearance made under trying circumstances in the Auditorium. It was evident that the lady was free from the nervousness that so beset her on that occasion, and with a fine accompaniment did herself justice as a finished vocalist of the German school. If anything Mme. Nikisch's work as a vocalist might be characterized as too finished for the appreciation of the general public, free from all the tricks and devices that are too frequently resorted to for effect and applause. The pages' Canzonette and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" is not particularly interesting, but she sung it extremely well. Her best work, however, was in the three songs, the piano accompaniment being furnished by Mr. Nikisch, Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The songs were most charming and finished bits of vocalism and won most enthusiastic approval.

The following programme will be given tonight: Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Gluck aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus," Miss Lena Little; "Lalo," concerto for violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking; "Tschaikowsky," andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor; songs with piano, (a) Brambs, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not," (c) Hiller, "Im Maien," Miss Lena Little; Beethoven symphony No. 5 in C minor.

[152]

Buffalo Courier.

SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1891.

A MUSICAL TRIUMPH.

The Third Grand Evening Concert of the May Festival.

SUCCESSFUL IN ALL RESPECTS.

The Orchestra, the Soloists, and the Chorus—The Closing Day's Two Entertainments.

The rain was gentle yesterday, and being gentle it was considerate enough to cease before the Festival concert in the evening. The audience last night was larger than that on Thursday evening. There was a noticeable increase in the general admissions, which showed that the reduction in price had been wise.

The soloists, perhaps, created more of a furore than at any previous concert. Critical notice of their numbers is appended below.

Looking at the singers from the point of view of the audience, Mr. Behrens created the most enthusiasm, being recalled three times after his second number.

Miss Howe again had an ovation, and Mr. Rieger had a recall. Miss Fremstad, who sang in Miss Fox's place, is slight and fair, and looks very youthful—indeed she is said to be only 20. She has a very pleasing personality, and was twice recalled.

The programme for the third evening concert of the Festival, included, as to orchestral numbers, MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine;" overture, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky; two selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" by Wagner, and the symphony in C minor, No. 5, by Beethoven. Much interest was manifested in the composition by MacDowell, the popular Boston musician, who is acquiring a reputation in the creation of orchestral, instrumental, and vocal music. His talent is not confined to any one department of musical form, and his entire work shows that he has great density of gifts. No songs which have appeared within the last few years are more esteemed, and the fact that Mr. Nikisch presents his "Overture" speaks volumes in its favor. The latter is intended to be, and is, descriptive, following the familiar lines of Tennyson's poem so closely that there is no difficulty in understanding the musical themes. So little do Buffalonias hear of such music, however, that it is difficult to separate a poem such as the above into separate pictures which could be distinguishable, especially after the remembrance of the music has been confused with other selections.

MacDowell believes in the important factor known as motif, but his themes are not indifferently presented, nor indifferently developed. They are fashioned with skill in every particular. He has a strong character in what he does, not treating parts slightingly for the sake of startling contrasts, but keeping steadily before him the needs of the thought to be expressed. He has very marked lines in "Lancelot and Elaine," and they are prominent at times, perhaps too much so, and yet they are characteristicly beautiful.

Mr. Conrad Behrens sang in his best style at the close of the overture two songs by Lowe, and still later upon the programme two Swedish folk-songs. He was in better voice than at a previous concert, and excited the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm in his "Tra-la-la" refrain, running down into the deepest depths. He was obliged to return and bow his acknowledgement of the hearty applause three separate times. Mr. Behrens has become a great favorite in Buffalo since his first appearance this year.

Peter Tchaikowsky, the Russian musician, was born a composer, and his overture "Romeo and Juliet" bears the stamp of undisputed genius. It is a higher type of a symphonic poem, and has more necessary requisite for such a form than MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine." He is undoubtedly a devotee to the intellectual strength of Shakespeare's play. He does not in his music follow the traditional emotional sentiment, but represents a higher form of passionate tenderness. In the reading of such a work a conductor can easily throw his personality into the interpretation. Mr. Nikisch invested the poem with a judicious combination which had powerful influence upon his hearers. His extreme sensitiveness makes itself very apparent, but the velvet touch covers a steel-like point which can make dangerous wounds. His patience with weakness is undoubtedly short-lived, and with the resources of his magnificent band, he hides such with chords of musical charity. Throughout the overture the wind and brass instruments appear in charming guise. The oboe, whenever it has been prominent, shows the touch of a virtuoso, and it can be singled out as one of the best-played instruments in the orchestra. The work closed presumably with the romantic death of Juliet, and the whole story had been recalled by a most beautiful illustration of the power of instruments. There is no criticism to be made of such playing, for Mr. Nikisch leads his orchestra from one subtle passage to another with infinite grace.

Following these orchestral selections came two solos by Mr. William H. Rieger, namely the recitative and aria from "Reginella" by Braga, and "Entreaty" by Boehni. The programme was thus changed to enable the young tenor to do himself greater credit than was permitted him in "Eva." His voice showed to its best advantage in the aria, and he did some distinguished work. He sings with nice expression, has a fine sense of what the music requires, and with enlarged experience will make a valuable singer. The heights of his art are before him, but between his present standing and his ultimate success, lie hours of conscientious work under the direction of a skillful hand. His style needs great improvement; his upper register is beautiful, but is not developed as it should be. As has been said, all this will come with work and experience. The song by Boehm was cleverly given, and the high tones especially pure and deliciously sweet.

Miss Mary Howe carried her listeners into the French school once more and gave the "Bird Song" from the "Pearl of Brazil," by David, precisely such a rendering as the music deserved. She is entitled to the thanks of the vocal community for not allowing the tremolo to interfere with honest, legitimate tone. Many of the soloists of the Festival have used it to excess, and have gone trembling through beautiful passages with unblushing ignorance of the rules of good singing. Her staccato notes are remarkable for perfect accuracy, and she has many qualities which challenge the admiration of the well informed. Her solo was received with great favor.

The reappearance of the orchestra seemed especially grateful after the frivolities of such compositions as soloists are obliged to select now to please the popular taste. "Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock," "Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Gotterdammerung," are perhaps the two most familiar selections from Wagner's operas known to the concert patron. They have been studied and reviewed sufficiently to make them old friends with musicians. They received the kindest possible treatment at the hands of the orchestra, drawing forth bursts of applause from the delighted listeners.

The next number upon the programme introduced a new singer from preparatory studies in the vocal workshop of Mr. Bristol of New York. Miss Fremstad very obligingly took the place of Miss Fox who was detained, so her physician stated, by illness, from taking part in the Festival. She is a young and attractive girl of honest, straightforward manner, and is an enthusiast in her art. Her voice is a rich contralto not yet fully developed or under control, but overflowing with promise for the future. In its entire compass there are no harsh notes and there are triumphs for Miss Fremstad in the coming years if she perseveres. Her stage manner was quiet, reserved, and that of a modest girl who sang because she loved her art. Neither of the selections, by Boehm and Meyer-Hilmund respectively, were however, calculated to show her best ability, but it matters little thus early in her career.

Between Miss Fremstad's solo and the "Echo Song" by Eckert, which Miss Howe sang marvelously well, appeared the great "Fifth Symphony" by Beethoven. It is the most familiar, and it is the most descriptive in it melancholy dignity of the splendid circle of nine, which have made his name immortal. A devotee of Beethoven listens with abated breath to the sequence of orchestral beauties which comprise its four parts. The master himself said when speaking of the opening notes of the work: "So pocht das schicksal au die Pforte," which translated means: "That is how Fate knocks at my door." A life long study makes the Fifth Symphony no more comprehensive than it was years ago, it cannot be put into form, but it reaches out with its tender musical arms and touches the very heart's core. The deepest feelings are stirred by its chords, and a musician surrenders himself willingly to the stream which hurries him along with such irresistible and tremendous force. Almost every musical writer and critic have attempted to describe this symphony, but each one has failed signally and, moreover, has known that he has failed. The music is its own best interpreter, and when played divinely as it was last evening, its beauties cannot be expressed adequately in words. Every man in the orchestra who contributed to the magnificent rendering has the grateful acknowledgment of those in the audience to whom Beethoven is the greatest of all masters. Such moments come rarely in life and they are never forgotten.

The audience should have been permitted to carry home the last triumphal chords of the symphony, but no such pleasure was vouchsafed them. The Eichberg chorus, "To Thee, O Country" had to be sung and it was well given, but the mind filled with Beethoven cannot readily turn with gratitude to the present school of composition. The singers themselves acknowledge the influence of the master, but fulfilled their part conscientiously and with appropriate enthusiasm. The concert was good throughout, and the largest audience yet attracted by the Festival enjoyed it.

To-day's Concerts.

The programme offered this afternoon will undoubtedly bring out a great audience, for the children's chorus—under Mr. Baker's leadership—will sing in two numbers, and their parents and friends will surely desire to see and hear them. The Largo by Handel for violins alone is enough in itself to draw a crowd. Wagner will be represented in the famous overture to "Tannhauser," and Von Weber in the overture to "Euryanthe." It will be an afternoon preëminently devoted to song. Following is the programme:

Overture and Finale from "Tannhauser" (Paris version).....Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Chorus (children's)—
(a) Choral—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee,"
(b) Part Song—"Sweet Spring Evening,"
(c) Solo, duet, and chorus—"Sigh, Gentle Gales"..... N. Lincoln
Children's Chorus.

Songs with piano—
(a) In Liebeslust.....Liszt
(b) Bon Jour, Susanne.....Delibes
(c) Fruehlingsnacht.....Schumann
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.

Solo for flute—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Damerscroman
Mons. Ch. Mole.

Anthem—"Who is like unto Thee?"
E. L. Baker

Soloists: Miss Margaret E. Campbell and Mr. W. H. Rieger.

Songs—
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schnecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. E. C. Bushnell.

Largo, for violins.....Haendel

Songs—
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Helmund
Mr. Rieger.

Songs—
(a) Solo and chorus—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
(b) Chorus—"The Banner of the Free,"
Brinley Richards
(c) Part Song—"Good Night".....Franz Abt
Children's Chorus.

Overture—"Euryanthe".....Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Festival will end this evening and the programme promises to be one of the best of the series. Wagner is represented in three numbers. Mr. Dippel will be heard for the first time, and the cantata of "King Rother" will probably show the powers of the chorus in the fullest measure.

Following is the programme:

Symphonic poem—"Tasso".....Liszt
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lohengrin's Narrative—from "Lohengrin,"
Wagner
Mr. Dippel.

Aria—"O Lovely Halls," from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Marie Jahn.

Duet—"In Neuen Thaten," from "Die Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
Marie Jahn and Mr. Dippel.

"King Rother," a cantata.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss De Vere and Mr. Bushnell and Festival Chorus of 500 voices. John Lund, conductor.

Festival Notes.

Festival books at half price now.

This is the last day. Make it the biggest yet.

The Boston Symphony was presented each with a book by Mr. Weed.

Go this afternoon to see Mr. Baker conducting the children's chorus.

Dr. Lucien Howe gives a large reception for Miss Mary Howe this evening, from 10 to 11:30 o'clock.

Mr. Brennan's services in giving the press notes and information are very highly appreciated.

The programmes are somewhat long. One of the orchestra declares that they have not had such hard work all winter long as they are having this week, and that in Boston the performances are not more than half as long.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 5-19

150 ventilating lockers in the new gymnasium.

ARTHUR NIKISCH SELECTED.

He Will [illegible] Charge of the Philharmonic Concerts This Year.

By a unanimous vote the Philharmonic society last evening resolved to employ the services of Arthur Nikisch and his permanent orchestra for the coming season. Mr. Nikisch has been only a year in this country and has been connected with the Boston symphony society during his residence here.

At the meeting last night Edward A. Seccomb was in the chair and B. T. Frothingham was secretary. From the executive committee Henry K. Sheldon reported that that body, true to its conception of what was the highest musical standard, had secured Mr. Nikisch's services. "Six concerts will be given, as usual," Mr. Sheldon went on to say, "and the high standard of the Philharmonic performances will be maintained. We hope the public will show no abatement of interest in this matter."

The committee's report was adopted unanimously, and the report presented by W. R. Bunker, the treasurer, was read. It was dated May 6, and showed the receipts and disbursements throughout the year:

RECEIPTS.
Cash on hand	$3,895.10
Subscriptions	4,778.00
Reserved seats	5,324.50
Door admissions	3,699.25
Interest	103.55
Total	$17,800.40

DISBURSEMENTS.
Orchestra, conductor and soloists	$12,356.50
Academy, stage, scenery, etc	2,307.50
Advertising and printing	2,304.68
Agent and sundries	450.00
Total	$17,481.68

As will be seen, this leaves a balance of $318.72 with which to begin the new year.

William H. Cromwell, from the finance committee, reported that he had gone over the accounts and found them correct.

On motion of Carl H. De Silver a vote of thanks to Mr. Bunker, the treasurer, and Mr. Frothingham, the secretary, was unanimously adopted.

These directors, whose terms will expire in 1894, were elected: Henry K. Sheldon, L. S. Burnham, William H. Cromwell, B. T. Frothingham, George H. Prentiss, Edward B. Bartlett, John F. Praeger and C. H. De Silver.

INTER OCEAN, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5/8

AMUSEMENTS

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed by a large [illegible] last evening at Central Music Hall, and its brief series of concerts promises to furnish a fitting finale to Chicago's long and interesting musical season. The patient and persistent artistic effort of this splendid body of instrumentalists, up to within a season ago won tardy recognition in this city. The latter result was attained under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Indeed it is generally recognized that his efforts came nearer developing the artistic latent strength of the orchestra, and made a more potent appeal for public commendation than his predecessor. A New York authority this season frankly admitted the superiority of this company, stating "that in some respects the Boston Symphony Orchestra has attained a perfection beyond that of our best organizations"—a remarkable confession to come out of Gotham. The primary idea of this orchestra as an institution was to be an educator, as well as an entertainer; the programmes excellently annotated by George Wilson, the character of the selections, as well the force and finish of their rendition, and the steady growth of the concerts in popular favor, indicate that the mission is being fulfilled in a way that must be most gratifying to all concerned. It may be interesting to glance at the composition of this organization. The instrumentalists enlisted are: Fourteen first violins, 12 second violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, 6 double bass, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 1 English horn, 2 bassoons, 1 bass clarinet, 2 clarinets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 2 trumpets, 1 tympane, 1 tuba, 1 harp, 3 percussion, or 72 in all, showing no curtailment of number to save expenses in travel. As may be observed this admirably balanced organization has an instrumental strength that would have satisfied the exactions of a Berlioz, and it is handled with a skill that would gratify Wagner himself. Director Nikisch leads without reference to the printed score, and appears to dominate the entire body with his peculiar personal magnetism. All the work of last evening seemed to be permeated with a subdued enthusiasm, showing the subtle sympathy between leader and instrumentalists. It may be recalled that the first season of this organization the strength lay in its strings; there has been no loss of power in this body, while there has been corresponding growth in the other component parts, notably the wood-wind. The programme last evening was inaugurated with the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." The overture is based upon themes from the opera, and although it might be called old in years it has the leit motive that Wagner developed to such perfection plentifully introduced. The strings open the work with a broad, swift flow of solemn melody of the cardinals, followed by the counter subject based on the Celein, a tender sentimental strain. This counter-melody is then transferred to the strings, against a gently rippling accompaniment for flute, oboe, and clarinet in semi-quavers. Its treatment in this manner, which occupies a considerable space, is at length brought to a tonic full close; and, after a sudden and unexpected modulation to E-flat, the Cardinal's air is repeated in this key, but with an entirely new treatment, the melody being sustained by the violoncellos and clarinets, and richly embroidered by the violins con sordini, and flute and oboe alternately. The Celeni air again modified in scope and treatment enters the composition; and so the motives play hide and seek, coming and departing with fresh elaboration and disguises, until in the climax they gain to full force of the orchestra. The fine, splendidly sustained tone, the rich and varied modulations, the general accuracy of the rendition and the precision of finish gave the orchestra a most favorable introduction. The programme originally announced that Franz Kneisel would play Brahms' first movement from concerto for violin; instead Mr. Timothi Adamowski furnished a most acceptable substitute, playing Saint Saens' Rondo Capriccioso for violin. Seldom has a Chicago audience enjoyed a more charming musical treat. The dainty and delightful melody of Saint Saens had most magnetic and finished interpretation from the graceful bow of Mr. Adamowski, meriting the enthusiasm that it aroused. The Waldweben from Wagner's "Siegfried" has been given here under the direction of Anton Seidel when it had the advantages of the scenic show to enhance the music, but it had an even more rare or sympathetic interpretation last evening without any such adventitious aids. This exquisite tone poem, most ingenious in its melodic construction, showed a body of instrumentale most admirably adapted to faultless mechanical rendition, yet withal endowed with a flexibility to portray its glowing lights, its darkling shadows, the music of the whispering leaves and the carol of the birds among the branches; in fact to paint the picture through the imagery of sound. The concluding orchestral feature was Raff's Symphony No. 3, an interesting selection full of variety, rich in color, cheerfully suggestive of the exhilaration of the aromatic woodlands in spring, and was most artistically and delightfully played throughout. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, the handsome wife of the director, was the vocalist of the evening, and her appearance completely dissipated the impression of her appearance made under trying circumstances in the Auditorium. It was evident that the lady was free from the nervousness that so beset her on that occasion, and with a fine accompaniment did herself justice as a finished vocalist of the German school. If anything Mme. Nikisch's work as a vocalist might be characterized as too finished for the appreciation of the general public, free from all the tricks and devices that are too frequently resorted to for effect and applause. The pages' Canzonette and aria from the "Marriage of Figaro" is not particularly interesting, but she sung it extremely well. Her best work, however, was in the three songs, the piano accompaniment being furnished by Mr. Nikisch, Goldmark, "Die Quelle;" Jensen, "Am Ufer des Manzanares;" Brahms, "Vergebliches Staendchen." The songs were most charming and finished bits of vocalism and won most enthusiastic approval.

The following programme will be given tonight: Liszt symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Gluck aria, "I have lost my Eurydice," from "Orpheus," Miss Lena Little; "Lalo," concerto for violoncello, Mr. Anton Hekking; "Tschaikowsky," andantino and scherzo from symphony No. 4 in F minor; songs with piano, (a) Bramhs, "Wie bist du meine Koenigin," (b) Secchi, "Love Me or Not," (c) Hiller, "Im Maien," Miss Lena Little; Beethoven symphony No. 5 in C minor.

[152]

Courier-Journal

JOURNAL: LOUISVILLE, WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 13, 1891.

MAY MUSIC.

The Festival At the Amphitheater Auditorium Formally Opened.

43

A Splendid Audience and An Evening of Delightful Entertainment.

Selections By the Orchestra and Soli By Miss Marie Jahn.

Mr. Shackleton's Chorus To Make Its Appearance This Evening.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH.

The May Music Festival opened last evening at the Auditorium with a grand concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the whole can be judged by the opening night the festival is to be a grand success. Never before has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Auditorium than the one last evening, which greeted Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, as he stepped upon the stage. The hopes of the most sanguine were realized by the reception accorded the orchestra and the chorus talent of this city.

The parquette and dress circle were crowded, and the stage presented a glittering effect. The scenery was so arranged as to from an octagon shaped hall, with portals at the rear of the stage opening upon mountain scenery and lakes. The ceiling was handsomely frescoed scenery, of a dome-shaped appearance, and was dazzling with myriads of incandescent lights

The orchestra was placed in the front of the stage, with Mr. Nikisch in the center with his back turned to the audience. The members of the chorus, who will sing Friday and Saturday, were seated immediately in the rear of the orchestra, on tiers, rising one above the other. The female members of the chorus were dressed in white, the men, wearing full dress suits.

The audience showed its appreciation for classical music from the opening overture to the close. During the rendition of the selections, absolute quiet was observed.

Conspicuous in one of the boxes was Mrs Nikisch, who will take the leading vocal part this afternoon and evening.

THE CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Finished and Satisfactory Performance.

The concert was a highly satisfactory one in all respects; the programme was interesting; the orchestra in good condition, and the audience in an excellent humor. Even the failure of Mr. Kneisel, the violinist, to appear as announced, did not cast a gloom over the occasion. The gap in the programme was so acceptably filled by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, that the change did not take the color of disappointment. The orchestra, both in the high order of the music presented as well as in the execution of the numbers, was fully up to the stanadrd of excellence that has left such favorable impression behind on the previous visits of the organization to this city, and the enthusiasm of the audience, while it lacked the unreasoning persistence in the demand for encores that is sometimes exhibited, was warmly and intelligently appreciative.

The orchestra is finely balanced, and the work, which was excellent all through, was most impressive in the Raff Symphony, and the prelude to the Meistersinger, which was added to the original programme, though the charming Greig Suite, which is evidently a favorite with the orchestra, and is always given by them with keen appreciation of its good points, was admirably done.

The programme opened with Goldmark's overture to Sakuntala, which was given here last year by the Boston Orchestra. This is more properly a symphonic poem, full of the color and sentiment of the Oriental subject, and with a sufficient Hungarian flavor to indicate the nationality of the composer. It was the [illegible] made Goldmark's devoted to that episode is more romantic and mysterious than terrible.

The first two movements giving the "impressions and sensations" of daytime and twilight in the woods are instinct with a reposeful and poetic beauty, which, without being in the least imitative, or even similar in treatment, suggests Beethoven's Pastoral symphony. None of the composers from Schumann down have recorded their impressions of the woods in a more poetic vein, or with more seriousness of purpose. The attitude of the composer is announced in the solemn opening chord of the allegro. The first theme is uttered by the strings, and the second is reached through a singular and striking modulation from G to Bb. A salient feature of the first movement is the passage of the horn very full and melodious. The entire movement is beautifully expressive of the idyllic surroundings and full of poetic suggestiveness.

There are two movements in the second part; the first finally suggests the deepening twilight and the hum of insect voices. There is a short prelude which leads into the principal theme, which, after slight digression, is repeated, the horn and violas taking the melody, while the remaining strings accompany them pizzicato with a very charming effect. A fresh feature is introduced with a change of key and temps, into which the principal theme of the movement is brought by one violincello, while the flutes and muted strings keep up a chirping and fluttering that suggest a similar episode in Seigfried. The scherzo of the second part, which represents the Dryads Dance, ushers in a lively theme for the flutes, supported by a pizzicato accompaniment for all the strings, which is repeated several times, ending always in a different key from that in which it started. The orchestration of this part is a striking feature, and the effects were very beautifully brought out by the orchestra. The work in both the first and second parts of the symphony was especially fine in shading and finish, affording a striking contrast to the brilliancy and vigor of execution with which the final movement was carried through.

In the third part the solemn hush, which is at first broken only by the myriad chirping night-voices of the woods, is presently invaded by the mysterious harmonics that give intimation of the approaching hunt, and the movement gradually becomes more agitated in character and the theme is strengthened by the successive addition of all the instruments, the whole firmly held together by the pedal point on F, which is sustained by the bass viols, until a splendid burst of full instrumentation ushers in the hunt, which moves forward in an impressive crescendo, and with a sort of tramp-like rythm that gives a distinctive character to this part of the movement. There is an exquisite bit of melody beautifully instrumentated just where the sound of the hunt dies away, and an exhilarating suggestion of the cool, invigorating breath of morning, and the awakening life of the woods in the passages that immediately precede the close.

Instead of movement from the Brahms concerto for violin, which was to have been played by Mr. Kneisel, a Rondo Coppreccecoso, by Roff, a composition full of melody and an airy grace and daintiness, was given by Mr. Admanowski, with marvelous finish and delicacy of touch. His phrasing was so clean, tone so clear, and there was such etherial lightness of touch in his execution that his solo furnished a most charming diversion in the midst of the more serious work of the orchestra.

The impression made by Miss Marie Jahn was in the highest degree favorable. Her first selection was an air from Tanhauser, "O, Lovely Hall," which she sang with much spirit and effectiveness. Her voice is a soprano of more than ordinary power, with a strong dramatic equality, which found an opportunity for force and breadth of expression in the air which she sang with feeling and artistic discrimination. The three songs of lighter character, which came later in the evening, were also admirably sung.

The Greig Suite Peer was given by the orchestra here last year. The music was originally written for a stage production of Ibsen's drama of the same name, and the suite is but a small part of the voluminous music written for that occasion. In its present shape it consists of a very beautiful allegro, pastoral in character, representing daybreak; a funeral march entitled the "Death of Aase," which is most beautifully expressive of departing life, fainting away at the close like a lost sigh; a charmingly graceful mazurka and a final movement, very grotesque and in march time which represents the experience of Peer Gynt in the Hall of the Mountain King, where he falls in love with the King's daughter and is punished for his presumption by being turned over to the Imps, who torment him to their satisfaction, and finally turn him out of the palace. The first three movements are melodious, quiet and graceful, requiring great delicacy of execution, while the third, in strong constrst to these, is single crescendo rising toward the close with a steadily increasing tempo, that presents a wonderfully grotesque effect and the performance of it as given by the Boston Orchestra is a feat in execution. Mr. Nikisch added the prelude to Wagner's Meistersinger to the programme as originally published. This number furnished an impressive close for the concert. The Orchestra gave it with all the pomp of instrumentation and orchestral color for which Wagner is distinguished, even in what is called his "early period."

A number not to be passed over was the symphonic poem of Saint Saens, the Youth of Hercules. It was based upon a legend to the effect that Hercules in his youth was beset by the Nymphs [illegible] who sought to entice

T. Adamowski, the violinist. He was originally a member of the celebrated Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, but afterward played with Emma Thursby and later with the Clara Louise Kellogg Concert Company.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist, has a national reputation. Mr. Charles Mole, first flute, and Mr. A. Sautel, the first oboe, are among the latest and most valued acquisitions to the orchestra, having been secured after the destruction by fire of the Opera Comique in Paris. Mr. A. Hackebrath, first horn, was formerly with Thomas' Orchestra. Pierre Muller, first trumpet, was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra, Paris. The following violinists, who are now members of the Boston Orchestra, were formerly of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna: Otto Roth, L. Snecenski, A. Moldauer, E. Fieldler, and E. Grunberg.

Mr. Nikisch is the youngest leader ever at the head of the orchestra. He is not yet thirty-five years of age, but looks older. He is the third leader of the orchestra, the other two having been George Henschel, who occupied the position for three years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who was conductor for the next five. Since Mr. Nikisch assumed charge, two years ago, the organization has advanced in every way. Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian. His voice is soft, and though he does not pose as a singer, yet when he attempts a part for the instruction of others, his tones show remarkable qualities of sweetness and expression. As soon as the chorus was placed at the rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr. Nikisch was introduced to the members by Mr. Shackleton. He apologized for his inability to speak pure English, but added that he would be understood, as there was one language common to musicians, that of the heart. The chorus and members of the orchestra applauded his graceful speech, which he acknowledged in a few words.

At the close of the rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch was seen by a reporter. Speaking of the local talent displayed in the chorus, he said: "Louisville must be a great musical center judging both from the quantity and quality of the chorus I have been conducting this afternoon. When I heard that the members had been rehearsing for only three months I was astonished, for the promptness in which the members make their entrance and the modulations of their tones is marvelous. It is the best chorus I have yet found upon a first rehearsal. I had to correct them but twice, and made them repeat only a few more times. Their training has been excellent."

"I have noticed one thing peculiar to the American people. They have a wonderful amount of musical energy. They accomplish much more in a short period than Europeans can do. They take hold of a part with a vim and never stop until it is mastered.

"I have been greatly satisfied with my reception at every place I have been. I find that the average American audience is far more appreciative of classical music than a European, and especially a German audience. It is a common thing to hear musicians abroad speak in slighting terms of American music, and, in fact, before coming here I was imbued with the same idea. Now I would much prefer to play classical music before an American audience than before a European."

Mr. Nikisch added that he considered Boston the ideal music city.

Times, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/18

THE GREAT FESTIVAL

Nikisch, the Wizard of the Baton Is in the City.

Everything is in readiness for the great May festival.

Rows upon rows of seats rise high on the stage at Music hall and everything has been arranged for the comfort and convenience of those who are to take part in this interesting event. The stage is surrounded by a canopy of canvass which cannot but be of great assistance to the chorus for it is so constructed that the great volume of sound is thrown into the vast auditorium. Mr. John Allen, the enterprising janitor of Music hall designed and constructed the arrangement, and his work will be greatly appreciated by all who take part in the festival.

Herr Nikisch and his talented wife have an elegant suite of apartments at the Iroquois.

The wizard of the baton was pacing restlessly up and down the tiled floor of the lobby of the hotel when a TIMES reporter accosted him.

"I am waiting for a carriage to take me to Music hall now," he said, "for I want to get my bearings and have everything ready for the rehearsal this evening. Yes, I like Buffalo, for my receptions here have been of the most kind and considerate character and I hope it may be my pleasure to come to your beautiful city for many years to come. It has been a very successful season for us wherever we have appeared."

"What are your plans for the future?"

"On June 2 I am going to Europe with Mrs. Nikisch for a brief sojourn. Our programe of arrangements for next season is nearly completed.

Mr. Nikisch spoke enthusiastically of the prospects of the festival, and prophesied that it would be the most successful ever held in this city.

The souvenir book of the festival, containing the English text and analytical and descriptive notes of the works to be presented this week, are on sale at Peter Paul & Bro.'s, Weed & Co.'s, Besser Bro.'s, Wahle & Son's, Benton & Cottier's, and at Music hall.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Sunday Morning, May 24, 1891.

ONLY A REMEMBRANCE

CLOSING EVENTS OF THE GREAT MAY FESTIVAL.

The Matinee and Evening Performances--The Fest Was a Musical but Not a Financial Success.

Last night's concert at Music Hall brought to a close Buffalo's fifth Music Festival, given under the direction of the Buffalo Musical Association. Musically, the Festival has been a grand success. No better orchestra exists in this country than the Boston Symphony, and their work throughout the Festival has won the admiration of all. The excellent work of the Festival chorus has probably never been equaled here. While the soloists were not as strong as those who have appeared here in one or two of the former festivals, they represented the leading artists at present in this country, and their work gave much satisfaction. The Festival will not only prove an impetus to artistic progress in this community, but an important factor in advancing the musical interests of the public, which will undoubtedly be shown in a large increase in the number of subscribing members to next season's Orchestra concerts.

Financially speaking, the balance will be on the wrong side of the ledger. The deficit is not large, however, and those in position to know say that only 5 per cent. of the guarantee fund will have to be called on.

That the association has erred in its apparent desire to give the public a musical feast by overdoing it is fully realized. The programmes have been generally too long, and three evening performances and a Saturday matinee would have been ample. But the fault of offering too much for the money is one that is readily to be condoned, and the local public has been placed under renewed obligations to the Musical Association for a week of elevating pleasure. The proceedings of yesterday are herewith treated with appropriate fullness.

COMMERCIAL-ADVERTISER. Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/21

THE MAY FESTIVAL.

THE FIRST GRAND CONCERT A SUCCESS

The Hall Decorations—Soloists and Their Work—Boston Symphony Orchestra—Massenett's "Eve"—Festival Notes, Tonight's Concert, etc., etc.

The fifth music festival given in this city was begun last evening under circumstances the most auspicious. Though Music Hall was not filled to its utmost capacity, the audience was nevertheless a large one, and it was a beautiful sight from the front rows, as all seemed in festival mood and were dressed in accordance therewith. It was a most enthusiastic assemblage of music-loving people, as all who took part in the program were heartily received and applauded.

The hall decorations were very tasty. The stage was covered with white canvas, prepared to serve as a sounding board, which it did admirably. Four chandeliers were hung over the stage, and these naturally gave the chorus singers plenty of light, but this light, increased by reflection from the white overhead, made the beautiful setting of the chorus appear to better advantage. All the ladies were dressed in white and the gentlemen, of course, in black, the latter in the centre completely surrounded by the former. This arrangement not only added to the beauty of the scene, but also made the singing more effective.

Palms and ferns filled the orchestra pit and the boxes had beautiful curtains of green with bunches of roses here and there, and little electric sparks scattered around making a striking effect. Thanks to those having the decoration in charge, the rods, which have so long been an eye-sore, hanging over the proscenium have been removed and in their stead the word "Euterpe" the name of the goddess of lyric poetry and music. No matter in what direction the eye was turned a scene of beauty was presented, none of which was more pleasant than the one so constantly meeting the eye—the chorus. Though the weather was somewhat warm it in no sense detracted from the appreciation of the

MAGNIFICENT PROGRAM.

A hearty greeting was given Conductor Arthur Nikisch when he mounted the stand, baton in hand, to open what will prove to be one of the most successful festivals ever given in this city.

The "Leonore" overture, No. 8, is a composition very appropriate for an occasion like that of last evening. For years it has been admired by professional and amateur musicians, and its beauties are likewise discerned by those who, while not making a study of music, nevertheless appreciate its beauties and wonderful power. The interpretation of the overture left nothing to be desired.

After this number Mrs. Wyman sang the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The aria received a careful rendition, and the three songs which appeared later on the program, "Enchantment," by Massenet; "Heart's Fancies," by Thomas, and "Dormez-vous," by Welkerlin, were equally well rendered.

Mr. Francis Fischer Powers followed with another aria of Verdi's, "O tu Palermo," from the "Sicilian Vespers." Mr. Powers has a fine voice and sings well, and [illegible] soloist.

[153]

Courier-Journal

JOURNAL: LOUISVILLE, WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 13, 1891.

MAY MUSIC.

The Festival At the Amphitheater Auditorium Formally Opened.

43

A Splendid Audience and An Evening of Delightful Entertainment.

Selections By the Orchestra and Soli By Miss Marie Jahn.

Mr. Shackleton's Chorus To Make Its Appearance This Evening.

DIRECTOR NIKISCH.

The May Music Festival opened last evening at the Auditorium with a grand concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the whole can be judged by the opening night the festival is to be a grand success. Never before has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Auditorium than the one last evening, which greeted Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the leader, as he stepped upon the stage. The hopes of the most sanguine were realized by the reception accorded the orchestra and the chorus talent of this city.

The parquette and dress circle were crowded, and the stage presented a glittering effect. The scenery was so arranged as to from an octagon shaped hall, with portals at the rear of the stage opening upon mountain scenery and lakes. The ceiling was handsomely frescoed scenery, of a dome-shaped appearance, and was dazzling with myriads of incandescent lights

The orchestra was placed in the front of the stage, with Mr. Nikisch in the center with his back turned to the audience. The members of the chorus, who will sing Friday and Saturday, were seated immediately in the rear of the orchestra, on tiers, rising one above the other. The female members of the chorus were dressed in white, the men, wearing full dress suits.

The audience showed its appreciation for classical music from the opening overture to the close. During the rendition of the selections, absolute quiet was observed.

Conspicuous in one of the boxes was Mrs Nikisch, who will take the leading vocal part this afternoon and evening.

THE CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme and a Finished and Satisfactory Performance.

The concert was a highly satisfactory one in all respects; the programme was interesting; the orchestra in good condition, and the audience in an excellent humor. Even the failure of Mr. Kueisel, the violinist, to appear as announced, did not cast a gloom over the occasion. The gap in the programme was so acceptably filled by Mr. Timothee Adamowski, that the change did not take the color of disappointment. The orchestra, both in the high order of the music presented as well as in the execution of the numbers, was fully up to the stanadrd of excellence that has left such favorable impression behind on the previous visits of the organization to this city, and the enthusiasm of the audience, while it lacked the unreasoning persistence in the demand for encores that is sometimes exhibited, was warmly and intelligently appreciative.

The orchestra is finely balanced, and the work, which was excellent all through, was most impressive in the Raff Symphony, and the prelude to the Meistersinger, which was added to the original programme, though the charming Greig Suite, which is evidently a favorite with the orchestra, and is always given by them with keen appreciation of its good points, was admirably done.

The programme opened with Golmark's overture to Sakuntala, which was given here last year by the Boston Orchestra. This is more properly a symphonic poem, full of the color and sentiment of the Oriental subject, and with a sufficient Hungarian flavor to indicate the nationality of the composer. It was the [illegible] overture that made Golmark's [illegible] that he had [illegible] well [illegible] Sakuntala devoted to that episode is more romantic and mysterious than terrible.

The first two movements giving the "impressions and sensations" of daytime and twilight in the woods are instinct with a reposeful and poetic beauty, which, without being in the least imitative, or even similar in treatment, suggests Beethoven's Pastoral symphony. None of the composers from Schumann down have recorded their impressions of the woods in a more poetic vein, or with more seriousness of purpose. The attitude of the composer is announced in the solemn opening chord of the allegro. The first theme is uttered by the strings, and the second is reached through a singular and striking modulation from G to Bb. A salient feature of the first movement is the passage of the horn very full and melodious. The entire movement is beautifully expressive of the idyllic surroundings and full of poetic suggestiveness.

There are two movements in the second part; the first finally suggests the deepening twilight and the hum of insect voices. There is a short prelude which leads into the principal theme, which, after slight digression, is repeated, the horn and violas taking the melody, while the remaining strings accompany them pizzicato with a very charming effect. A fresh feature is introduced with a change of key and temps, into which the principal theme of the movement is brought by one violincello, while the flutes and muted strings keep up a chirping and fluttering that suggest a similar episode in Seigfried. The scherzo of the second part, which represents the Dryads Dance, ushers in a lively theme for the flutes, supported by a pizzicato accompaniment for all the strings, which is repeated several times, ending always in a different key from that in which it started. The orchestration of this part is a striking feature, and the effects were very beautifully brought out by the orchestra. The work in both the first and second parts of the symphony was especially fine in shading and finish, affording a striking contrast to the brilliancy and vigor of execution with which the final movement was carried through.

In the third part the solemn hush, which is at first broken only by the myriad chirping night-voices of the woods, is presently invaded by the mysterious harmonics that give intimation of the approaching hunt, and the movement gradually becomes more agitated in character and the theme is strengthened by the successive addition of all the instruments, the whole firmly held together by the pedal point on F, which is sustained by the bass viols, until a splendid burst of full instrumentation ushers in the hunt, which moves forward in an impressive crescendo, and with a sort of tramp-like rythm that gives a distinctive character to this part of the movement. There is an exquisite bit of melody beautifully instrumentated just where the sound of the hunt dies away, and an exhilarating suggestion of the cool, invigorating breath of morning, and the awakening life of the woods in the passages that immediately precede the close.

Instead of movement from the Brahms concerto for violin, which was to have been played by Mr. Kueisel, a Rondo Coppreccoso, by Roff, a composition full of melody and an airy grace and daintiness, was given by Mr. Admanowski, with marvelous finish and delicacy of touch. His phrasing was so clear, his tone so clear, and there was such etherial lightness of touch in his execution that his solo furnished a most charming diversion in the midst of the more serious work of the orchestra.

The impression made by Miss Marie Jahn was in the highest degree favorable. Her first selection was an air from Tanhauser, "O, Lovely Hall," which she sang with much spirit and effectiveness. Her voice is a soprano of more than ordinary power, with a strong dramatic equality, which found an opportunity for force and breadth of expression in the air which she sang with feeling and artistic discrimination. The three songs of lighter character, which came later in the evening, were also admirably sung.

The Greig Suite Peer was given by the orchestra here last year. The music was originally written for a stage production of Ibsen's drama of the same name, and the suite is but a small part of the voluminous music written for that occasion. In its present shape it consists of a very beautiful allegro, pastoral in character, representing daybreak; a funeral march entitled the "Death of Aase," which is most beautifully expressive of departing life, fainting away at the close like a lost sigh; a charmingly graceful mazurka and a final movement, very grotesque and in march time which represents the experience of Peer Gynt in the Hall of the Mountain King, where he falls in love with the King's daughter and is punished for his presumption by being turned over to the Imps, who torment him to their satisfaction, and finally turn him out of the palace. The first three movements are melodious, quiet and graceful, requiring great delicacy of execution, while the third, in strong constrst to these, is single crescendo rising toward the close with a steadily increasing tempo, that presents a wonderfully grotesque effect and the performance of it as given by the Boston Orchestra is a feat in execution. Mr. Nikisch added the prelude to Wagner's Meistersinger to the programme as originally published. This number furnished an impressive close for the concert. The Orchestra gave it with all the pomp of instrumentation and orchestral color for which Wagner is distinguished, even in what is called his "early period."

A number not to be passed over was the symphonic poem of Saint Saens, the Youth of Hercules. It was based upon a legend to the effect that Hercules in his youth was beset by the Nymphs and [illegible] who sought to [illegible]

T. Adamowski, the violinist. He was originally a member of the celebrated Bilse Orchestra at Berlin, but afterward played with Emma Thursby and later with the Clara Louise Kellogg Concert Company.

Mr. Anton Hekking, the first 'cellist, has a national reputation. Mr. Charles Mole, first flute, and Mr. A. Sautel, the first oboe, are among the latest and most valued acquisitions to the orchestra, having been secured after the destruction by fire of the Opera Comique in Paris. Mr. A. Hackebrath, first horn, was formerly with Thomas' Orchestra. Pierre Muller, first trumpet, was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra, Paris. The following violinists, who are now members of the Boston Orchestra, were formerly of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Vienna: Otto Roth, L. Snecenski, A. Moldauer, E. Fieldler, and E. Grunberg.

Mr. Nikisch is the youngest leader ever at the head of the orchestra. He is not yet thirty-five years of age, but looks older. He is the third leader of the orchestra, the other two having been George Henschel, who occupied the position for three years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who was conductor for the next five. Since Mr. Nikisch assumed charge, two years ago, the organization has advanced in every way. Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian. His voice is soft, and though he does not pose as a singer, yet when he attempts a part for the instruction of others, his tones show remarkable qualities of sweetness and expression. As soon as the chorus was placed at the rehearsal yesterday afternoon Mr. Nikisch was introduced to the members by Mr. Shackleton. He apologized for his inability to speak pure English, but added that he would be understood, as there was one language common to musicians, that of the heart. The chorus and members of the orchestra applauded his graceful speech, which he acknowledged in a few words.

At the close of the rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch was seen by a reporter. Speaking of the local talent displayed in the chorus, he said: "Louisville must be a great musical center judging both from the quantity and quality of the chorus I have been conducting this afternoon. When I heard that the members had been rehearsing for only three months I was astonished, for the promptness in which the members make their entrance and the modulations of their tones is marvelous. It is the best chorus I have yet found upon a first rehearsal. I had to correct them but twice, and made them repeat only a few more times. Their training has been excellent."

"I have noticed one thing peculiar to the American people. They have a wonderful amount of musical energy. They accomplish much more in a short period than Europeans can do. They take hold of a part with a vim and never stop until it is mastered.

"I have been greatly satisfied with my reception at every place I have been. I find that the average American audience is far more appreciative of classical music than a European, and especially a German audience. It is a common thing to hear musicians abroad speak in slighting terms of American music, and, in fact, before coming here I was imbued with the same idea. Now I would much prefer to play classical music before an American audience than before a European."

Mr. Nikisch added that he considered Boston the ideal music city.

Times, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/

THE GREAT FESTIVAL

Nikisch, the Wizard of the Baton Is in the City.

Everything is in readiness for the great May festival.

Rows upon rows of seats rise high on the stage at Music hall and everything has been arranged for the comfort and convenience of those who are to take part in this interesting event. The stage is surrounded by a canopy of canvass which cannot but be of great assistance to the chorus for it is so constructed that the great volume of sound is thrown into the vast auditorium. Mr. John Allen, the enterprising janitor of Music hall designed and constructed the arrangement, and his work will be greatly appreciated by all who take part in the festival.

Herr Nikisch and his talented wife have an elegant suite of apartments at the Iroquois.

The wizard of the baton was pacing restlessly up and down the tiled floor of the lobby of the hotel when a TIMES reporter accosted him.

"I am waiting for a carriage to take me to Music hall now," he said, "for I want to get my bearings and have everything ready for the rehearsal this evening. Yes, I like Buffalo, for my receptions here have been of the most kind and considerate character and I hope it may be my pleasure to come to your beautiful city for many years to come. It has been a very successful season for us wherever we have appeared."

"What are your plans for the future?"

"On June 2 I am going to Europe with Mrs. Nikisch for a brief sojourn. Our programe of arrangements for next season is nearly completed.

Mr. Nikisch spoke enthusiastically of the prospects of the festival, and prophesied that it would be the most successful ever held in this city.

The souvenir book of the festival, containing the English text and analytical and descriptive notes of the works to be presented this week, are on sale at Peter Paul & Bro.'s, Weed & Co.'s, Besser Bro.'s, Wahle & Son's, Benton & Cottier's, and at Music hall.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Sunday Morning, May 24, 1891.

ONLY A REMEMBRANCE

CLOSING EVENTS OF THE GREAT MAY FESTIVAL.

The Matinee and Evening Performances--The Fest Was a Musical but Not a Financial Success.

Last night's concert at Music Hall brought to a close Buffalo's fifth Music Festival, given under the direction of the Buffalo Musical Association. Musically, the Festival has been a grand success. No better orchestra exists in this country than the Boston Symphony, and their work throughout the Festival has won the admiration of all. The excellent work of the Festival chorus has probably never been equaled here. While the soloists were not as strong as those who have appeared here in one or two of the former festivals, they represented the leading artists at present in this country, and their work gave much satisfaction. The Festival will not only prove an impetus to artistic progress in this community, but an important factor in advancing the musical interests of the public, which will undoubtedly be shown in a large increase in the number of subscribing members to next season's Orchestra concerts.

Financially speaking, the balance will be on the wrong side of the ledger. The deficit is not large, however, and those in position to know say that only 5 per cent. of the guarantee fund will have to be called on.

That the association has erred in its apparent desire to give the public a musical feast by overdoing it is fully realized. The programmes have been generally too long, and three evening performances and a Saturday matinee would have been ample. But the fault of offering too much for the money is one that is readily to be condoned, and the local public has been placed under renewed obligations to the Musical Association for a week of elevating pleasure. The proceedings of yesterday are herewith treated with appropriate fullness.

COMMERCIAL-ADVERTISER. Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/21

THE MAY FESTIVAL.

THE FIRST GRAND CONCERT A SUCCESS

The Hall Decorations—Soloists and Their Work—Boston Symphony Orchestra—Massenett's "Eve"—Festival Notes, Tonight's Concert, etc., etc.

The fifth music festival given in this city was begun last evening under circumstances the most auspicious. Though Music Hall was not filled to its utmost capacity, the audience was nevertheless a large one, and it was a beautiful sight from the front rows, as all seemed in festival mood and were dressed in accordance therewith. It was a most enthusiastic assemblage of music-loving people, as all who took part in the program were heartily received and applauded.

The hall decorations were very tasty. The stage was covered with white canvas, prepared to serve as a sounding board, which it did admirably. Four chandeliers were hung over the stage, and these naturally gave the chorus singers plenty of light, but this light, increased by reflection from the white overhead, made the beautiful setting of the chorus appear to better advantage. All the ladies were dressed in white and the gentlemen, of course, in black, the latter in the centre completely surrounded by the former. This arrangement not only added to the beauty of the scene, but also made the singing more effective.

Palms and ferns filled the orchestra pit and the boxes had beautiful curtains of green with bunches of roses here and there, and little electric sparks scattered around making a striking effect. Thanks to those having the decoration in charge, the rods, which have so long been an eye-sore, hanging over the proscenium have been removed and in their stead the word "Euterpe" the name of the goddess of lyric poetry and music. No matter in what direction the eye was turned a scene of beauty was presented, none of which was more pleasant than the one so constantly meeting the eye—the chorus. Though the weather was somewhat warm it in no sense detracted from the appreciation of the

MAGNIFICENT PROGRAM.

A hearty greeting was given Conductor Arthur Nikisch when he mounted the stand, baton in hand, to open what will prove to be one of the most successful festivals ever given in this city.

The "Leonore" overture, No. 3, is a composition very appropriate for an occasion like that of last evening. For years it has been admired by professional and amateur musicians, and its beauties are likewise discerned by those who, while not making a study of music, nevertheless appreciate its beauties and wonderful power. The interpretation of the overture left nothing to be desired.

After this number Mrs. Wyman sang the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The aria received a careful rendition, and the three songs which appeared later on the program, "Enchantment," by Massenet; "Heart's Fancies," by Thomas, and "Dormez-vous," by Welkerlin, were equally well rendered.

Mr. Francis Fischer Powers followed with another aria of Verdi's, "O tu Palermo," from the "Sicilian Vespers." Mr. Powers has a fine voice and sings well, and [illegible] soloist.

153

Brilliant Opening of the Great Festival of Song.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

Splendid Work on the Part of Conductors, Soloists, Orchestra and Chorus—Concerts This Afternoon and Evening.

Music hall has been the scene of much festivity, but for beauty and brilliancy last evening the opening of the May festival eclipsed all former occasions. It was a grand and inspiring sight that met the eye as one entered the great hall with its magnificent decorations the vast assemblage which filled nearly every seat, and the sea of faces which rose tier upon tier on the stage.

Miniature electric lights twinkled like so many stars in the waxen foliage of the mountain laurel which hangs in draperies and garlands from the boxes, while clusters of bright-hued flowers relieve the great mass of greenery.

Promptly at 8 o'clock Herr Nikisch took his place, and with one wave of his magnetic baton the great May festival was inaugurated, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, that organization [illegible] off into the sweet and delightful [illegible] of the initial number. There were plenty of late comers who had to content themselves by waiting outside until the last notes of the first number had died away. It was Bethoven's famous "Lenore" overture No. 3, and it received magnificent treatment at the hands of the orchestra, as did the beautiful "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg which is such a prime favorite in Buffalo. In every number there was that exactness and precision of movement which is a crowning characteristic of this unequalled organization.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman was the first of the vocalists on the programme, and as she had already firmly established herself in the hearts of the people of this city, her appearance was greeted with prolonged applause. She sang in splendid voice and with sweet and tender expression and was accorded three enthusiastic recalls. Later she sang three songs, all of which were beautifully rendered.

The mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" was the first number contributed by Miss Clementine DeVere, and this charming vocalist was afforded ample opportunity to display the wonderful flexibility and range of her beautiful voice.

Mr. Francis Fisher Powers sang Verdi's aria, "O tu Palermo" very effectively. He has a very pleasing and powerful baritone voice, which he uses with care and discretion.

Then, after a brief intermission, came Massenet's "Eve," and when Mr. Lund took his place he was accorded a most cordial greeting. He lead the orchestra and the large and splendidly drilled chorus through the difficult passages with marked ability and execution. The solo parts in this work were sung by Miss De Vere, Mr. Powers and Mr. W. H. Rieger, and all acquitted themselves in a manner well deserving of the many compliments which were bestowed on every side. Mr. Rieger's part was not calculated to bring out the full resources of his beautiful voice, but his singing was greatly admired and he did full justice to the work. The orchestra played the accompaniments faultlessly and the chorus singing was undoubtedly the best that has ever been heard in Buffalo.

It was a fine audience, the majority of the ladies and gentlemen being in full evening dress. The arrangements are perfect in every detail and the army of ushers never did better work than last evening.

The following gentlemen under the direction of E. H. Rounds, chairman of the hall committee, acted as ushers: Murray Smith, Frank C. Reid, E. C. Rumrill, Selden Munger, H. E. Choate, Frank C. Perew, Harold Sidway, William Meadows, Burt Wheeler, F. C. Trubee, Frank Kimberly, George Himmelsback, Fred Deming, Nat Hall, Joe Hadcock, C. D. Fowler, Howard Cornwell, D. Newhall, Jr., George P. Keating, Ned Newhall, Arthur Hayes, C. H. Williams, W. A. Wheeler, William S. Barnett, George Bettis and John Oglevie.

The occupants of the lower boxes were as follows:

Box A—Mr. and Mrs. Wilson S. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Scatcherd, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin, Mrs. Sturges, Mrs. Cary, Miss Love, Miss Winnifred Scatcherd, and Miss Wood.

Box B—Gen. and Mrs. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Hayes, Miss Ussher, Miss Fowler, the Rev. Dr. John W. Brown, formerly of St. Paul's, now of St. Thomas', New York.

Box E—Mr. and Mrs. Willis O. Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Griffin, the Rev. Henry A. Adams, Miss McKenna, Mr. Arthur Coffey, Miss Martin and Miss Gray.

Box F—This was reserved for the distinguished soloists during their intervals of rest. The upper boxes, G, H and D, were occupied by ladies of the Buffalo seminary, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams and Miss Hemenway.

Box G—Misses Ovens, Chittenden, Grace Jewett, Georgie Jewett, Murray, Williams and Eaton, and Mr. J. J. McWilliams.

Box H—Misses Snipman, Peabody, Hawkins' Briggs, Wilhelm, Davis and Norton, and Mrs J. J. McWilliams.

Box D—Misses Hemenway, Geismer, Marcus, Wride, Hammond, Walbridge, Cook and McWilliams.

Box C—Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pardee, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Hunsicker, Judge and Mrs Daniels.

The following is the programme for the concert this evening:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" ..... Van Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle ..... John Lund
Miss Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra ..... Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell song—"Lakme" ..... Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato ..... Molto
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—"The Nightingale" ..... Alibieff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
"Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. E. C. Bushnell and Mr. Franz Rummel, who will be heard at today's concerts, occupied the lower right-hand box.

Among the out-of-town visitors present last evening was Miss Jessica Porter of Rochester, one of the most promising pianists of the Flower city.

Judge Sted divided his time during the recess studying the name of the Greek goddess. It puzzled him almost as much as LeGrand Marvin's will.

Mr. F. C. M. Lautz, Mr. Hobart Weed and many other members of the Musical association were in high glee over the success of the opening of the festival.

Miss Mary Howe the beautiful and accomplished soprano, will make her initial bow to Buffalo this evening. She was an interested spectator last evening.

Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Miss De Vere and Mrs. Nikisch were given a drive around the park yesterday afternoon by Messrs. Harry Hamlin and Edmund Hayes. The four-in-hand turn outs attracted considerable attention. After the drive lunch was served at the Country club.

COMMERCIAL-ADVERTISER. Buffalo, N. Y.
Date 5/22

INTEREST INCREASING.

THE PROGRAMS SUPERBLY RENDERED.

The Prices Reduced—The Afternoon Program—Mrs. Nikisch's Success—The Evening's Program—Lund's War Song—Miss Fremstad.

The programs presented at the matinee and evening concert of the festival yesterday were charming. The audience in the afternoon was not a large one, about half filling the hall, but in the evening it was larger than at either of the previous concerts the hall being well filled.

The price of general admission has been reduced to $1 for the evening concerts and 75 cents for the matinee tomorrow; children's tickets for the latter will be 50 cents. No more money will be made by this reduction but it will be possible for a larger number to take advantage of this opportunity of hearing good music well rendered.

Liszt's "Grand Polonaise" was the opening number in the afternoon. It is well known to pianists but very few had heard it given by an orchestra. The musicians did full justice to the composition which was orchestrated by Berghaus.

Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the conductor, was the first soloist. She sang an aria from th "Magic Flute" instead of the Maillard number, and later sang three short songs: "Die Quelle" by Goldmark, Florian's Song, by Godard, and one by Brahms. Mrs. Nikisch proved a most acceptable singer although not one of rare accomplishments.

The orchestra played Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Godard's "Oriental Symphony," and the familiar "Midsummer Night's Dream," music by Mendellsohn. Anything rendered by this orchestra is thoroughly enjoyable, it is under the perfect control of Mr. Nikisch who is a skilled conductor, and has under him a company of artists.

Franz Rummel, the celebrated pianist, won the honors of the afternoon by his masterly interpretation of the Liszt E flat concerto. It is to be regretted that this artist is not to be heard a second time during the festival.

Mr. Behrens sang the aria from "La Juive," by Halevy, and the "Linden Tree," and "Wanderer," by Schubert, and of him it is sufficient to say he is an artist, and was as cordially received and as thoroughly enjoyed as when he sang last winter, especially in the two short songs.

The overture to "Oberon," by Weber, was first on the evening's program. It is a beautiful work beginning with the light, fairy-like music, here and there bringing in heavier and more martial, and then returning to the original strains. The Lalo Rhapsody for orchestra was a delightful number, and the "Rustic Wedding," symphony by Goldmark, was also superbly played, but parts were uninteresting. In both of these numbers the wind instruments were prominent, and it was a revelation to many to note the thoroughly artistic manner in which they were used. The two Wagner numbers "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan," concluded the orchestral numbers.

Miss Jahn proved a delightful singer, although she substituted the aria from the "Freischutz" for that from Oberon. It is a satisfaction to know she will be heard again.

The March to Battle by Mr. Lund was well received. Miss Jahn sang the soprano solo beautifully and Mr. Bushnell did justice to the short baritone solo allotted to him, while the male chorus was the finest ever heard in the city. The singers were determined to bring out the beauties of the composition and sang like true warriors. Again and again were the soloists called out and their calls for "Lund, Lund," brought the modest conductor himself when he was cheered enthusiastically.

Miss Mary Howe sang the Bell Song from "Lakme" and the "Nightingale." She proved a disappointment to many who had read accounts of her abilities, while to those who take a little salt with such high sounding praise she was what was expected—a singer having a good voice, but devoid of sympathy. A fine execution, however, well adapted for such selections as she chooses. However, had it not been for the no encore rule she would have sung again as she was recalled many times.

---

the chorus from "Euryanthe," "Sweet as the Smile of Woman." This was substituted for the "Meistersinger" chorale as the orchestral score for the latter is not here.

If it is not too late it would be well to shorten the remaining programs somewhat as those thus far have been too long. Miss Fox is quite ill in New York and her physician forbids her coming. The association has secured Miss Fremstad, a Swedish singer, who, it is said, will make a fine impression, though she is but 20 years of age. The program for this evening is as follows:

Symphonic poem—
"Lancelot and Elaine," ..... MacDowel
Overture—Fantasie—
"Romeo and Juliet," ..... Tschalkowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) "Loveliest Flower" ..... Price
(b) "In the East" ..... Mulligan
Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Solo—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil" ..... David
Miss Mary Howe.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn, and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried and Gotterdammerung." Wagner.
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) "Still as the Night" ..... Bohm
(b) "Happiest Day" ..... Hellmund
Miss Fremstad.
Symphonie in C Minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo—"Echo Song" ..... Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus—"To Thee, O Country" ..... Eichberg
Festival Chorus.

NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y.
Date 5/21

SWEET MAY MUSIC

The First of the Brilliant May Festival Concerts.

IT WAS A GLOWING SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Soloists Warmly Greeted by Buffalo Friends—The Chorus' Good Singing.

Seldom has a more brilliant or enthusiastic audience gathered in Music Hall than was present last night at the opening of the fifth season of the Buffalo Musical Association's May Festival. The audience could have been larger, but there were something over 2000 people present and the hall presented a scene of gaiety and kaleidascopic coloring which was pleasing and graceful.

The decorations were simple, and in their simplicity lay their charms. The boxes were wreathed and draped with evergreen streamers in which, at odd intervals, gleamed tiny electric lights, and the floor in front of the stage was banked high with palms. Away up overhead, where Music Hall habitues have been accustomed to look and see a row of ugly bars, the ceiling was decorated with a strange device in evergreen.

The chorus, nearly 500 strong, presented a splendid sight, the women in white, the men in evening dress, and the sounding board which was hung up over head proved its effectiveness when the chorus sung.

When Mr. Nikisch appeared he was greeted splendidly, and with an unassuming grace which was charming he took his place in the midst of his splendid orchestra and raised bis baton. The scene was inspiring. Nikisch, long-haired and solemn, a perfect controlling power over the 70 odd musicians, the banked up chorus, the lights, the pretty costumes, all made a pretty May Festival picture.

Never was sweeter music heard in Buffalo than when Nikisch, the wizard of the baton, led his men through the beauties and grandeur of Beethoven's Lenore overture No. 3; and as the last note of this most beautiful composition died away a burst of applause filled the hall rolling and echoing from wall to ceiling.

Mrs. Julia E. Wymans was received cordially. She is so well known and so well liked here that she was greeted as an old friend. She sung Verdi's aria from "Don Carlos" most charmingly and with a nice finish, which was enthusiastically applauded.

It was unjust to Mr. Francis Fiske Powers to accompany him on the piano, for, although Miss Bianca Fleischman presided in a most correct manner, Mr. Powers would have appeared to much better advantage had he had the orchestra accompaniment. In spite of this his singing was all that could be desired.

The orchestra's rendition of Gregg's suite "Peer Gynt" brought the audience to a realization of the power which lay hidden in the strings, the brass and the reeds, which the skilled touch of the artists brought forth.

The enthusiasm, however, reached its height when Miss Clementina De Vere, charming as ever, and clad in a graceful, girdled gown, appeared and sang Thomas' mad scene from "Hamlet." Miss De Vere has been heard in Buffalo before and is a strong favorite here, but last night she sung her way into a permanent place in the hearts of the music loving people of Buffalo. Never, it may be safely said, has better singing been heard in this city. The interest was intense and the admiration profound, and when her song was ended the charming artist received an ovation as has never been given a singer in Music Hall before. It was grand, it was inspiring and Miss DeVere had cause to feel proud of her reception in the city of her friends, for all are her friends here in Buffalo.

Part II. of the programme was given up to Massanet's "Eve," and here the chorus was heard to splendid advantage. They sang well, barring an occasional flatting when unaccompanied. The volume was excellent, the expression good and Mr. Lund deserves great credit for the admirable manner in which he has trained the chorus, big and unwieldy [illegible]

Box A—Mr. and Mrs. John N. Scatcherd, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson S. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin, Mrs. Sturges, Mrs. Cary, Miss Love, Miss Winnifred Scatcherd and Miss Wood.

Box B.—Mr. and Mrs. Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Edumd Hayes, Gen. and Mrs. Fields, Miss Ussher, Miss Fowler, Rev. Dr. John W. Brown, formerly of St. Paul's.

Box C—Judge and Mrs. Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pardee, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Hunsicker.

Box D—Misses Hammond, Hemenway, Geismer, Marcus, Wride, Walbridge, Cook and McWilliams.

Box E—Rev. Henry A. Adams of St Paul's Mr. and Mrs. Patrick H. Griffin, Mr. and Mrs. Willis O. Chapin, Miss McKenna, Mr. Arthur Coffey, Miss Martin and Miss Gray.

Box F—Was reserved for the soloists. The upper boxes G, H and D were occupied by ladies of the Buffalo Female Academy, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams and Miss Hemehway.

Among others present were the following: Mr. and Mrs. George P. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Ansley Wilcox, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Movius, George Hibbard, J. Adam Lautz, F. C. M. Lautz, O. C. Reed, H. D. Folinsbee, William Hamlin, Dr. and Mrs. Cronyn, Misses Cronyn, George Sandrock, Edward H. Hawley, Hobart Weed, Dr. Roswell Park, Judge Allen, E. Carlton Sprague, Spencer Clinton, William Meadows, James Madson, P. P. Pratt, William C. Cornwall, James M. Smith, Gen. and Mrs. John C. Graves, Thomas Cary, James P. White, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Cary, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Altman, Judge Jacob Stern, John W. Fisher, Hon. Philip Becker, Hon. and Mrs. William F. Sheehan, Hon. D. H. McMillan, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Torrington of Toronto, Walter D'Enyer, Clarence Bushnell, Henry W. Box, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. Townsend Davis, Miss Saidee Abel, Mr. and Mrs. Sherman, Miss Lottie Sherman, Adolph Finck, Dexter P. Rumsey, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Newman, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Loomis, J. Ambrose Butler, S. S. Spaulding, Gustav Fleischman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Ramsdell, Philo D. Beard, Henry Marcus, D. C. Beard, E. Howard Hutchinson, Norris Morley, Henry W. Sprague, John C. Gard, George Brownell, Dr. Herman Hayd, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Jewett, Miss Jewett, Miss Charlotte Inman, Mr. and Mrs. William Hengerer, Henry Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Sloan, Alfred J. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Graves, Charles H. Gibson, George B. Matthews, Mr. and Mrs. William D. Taylor and others.

The complete programme for tonight is as follows:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" —from "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle ..... John Lund
Miss Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra ..... Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell Song—"Lakme" ..... Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding) op 26... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato.
Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—"The Nightingale" ..... Alibieff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
"Vorspiel und Liebested," from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Die Meistersinger," ..... Wagner
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

Clipping from
NEWS, Salem, Mass.
Date 6/1

DEATH OF A MUSICIAN.

He Was One of the Original Members of Gilmore's Salem Band.

Wm. C. Nichols, a well-known musician, died yesterday at his home in Dorchester. He was born in Beverly, Sept. 25, 1828. He was educated in his native place, and early sought a musical profession, being one of the original members of Gilmore's Salem band. He remained with Gilmore for some time after he went to Boston with his band, at that time the leading one of the country. When the war broke out Mr. Nichols enlisted in the band of which Mr. Gilmore was leader, with the New England guards, Twenty-fourth regiment, M. V. M., Col. Thomas G. Stevenson, and remained in service until the band was mustered out. On his return from war Mr. Nichols was again associated with Gilmore for two years. Later on he was elected a member of the Germania band, and for 24 years was a business manager for that organization. Upon the formation of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Nichols was elected a member and librarian, and held the position at the time of his death. Mr. Nichols has resided in Boston since 1863, removing to Dorchester in 1888, since which time he had been in failing health. Of late he had been interested with his oldest son, William F. Nichols, in the manufacturing of custom shirts. He was the president and one of the charter members of the Boston Musician's Relief Fund society, holding office at time of death. He was a member of Charles Russell post 7, G. A. R., and of Star of Bethlehem lodge, F. and A. M., of Chelsea. Mr. Nichols leaves three children.

[illegible] found in Hindo mythology, [illegible]'s motive is of the broad and simple character that lends itself readily to musical treatment. Sakuntala, the daughter of the giant Viswamitro and the water nymph Menaka, being abandoned by her parents is adopted by the saint Kanwa. The King Dushyanta goes hunting in the forest, falls in love with Sakuntala, and persuades her to marry him according to the rites of the Gandharva marriage, promising to make her queen in the royal city and her son heir to the throne. The King, however, forgot his promise, and Sakuntala, after waiting for him to send for her until the boy is six years old, goes to seek him at his palace, but is repudiated by the King until a voice from heaven proclaims the boy his lawful son.

The composition opens with a slow introduction, followed by a movement in quicker tempo, in which the violoncellos and clarionets give out the principal theme which recurs frequently through the work. It is a grand, rich melody, broken in upon [illegible] trivials during the first part of the [illegible] are by the trumpet call that suggests the hunting party. All the instruments in turn take up the melody, which is variously treated and relieved by an [illegible] instrumentation that gives [illegible] touches of color and variety. There is a second theme which is taken [illegible] the violins and oboes, and later [illegible] flutes accompanied by the figure [illegible] preceding subject, until a new [illegible] more prominent theme given out [illegible] brass gradually absorbs the whole [illegible]. A harp accompaniment is [illegible] very fine effect where the original [illegible] is brought in by the full [illegible] in a new and slightly accelerated [illegible]. The finale rises in a splendid [illegible] crendo toward the close, and the [illegible] ture of the latter part is the [illegible] instrumentation by which it [illegible] up.

[illegible]m Walde" symphony, though [illegible]brated as the "Lenore," is a far more attractive composition [illegible]cks the gruesome suggestiveness [illegible] more familiar work, and [illegible]troduction of the wild hunt [illegible]to offer an opportunity for [illegible] fantastic, the movement [illegible] from the path of glory, in spite [illegible] of which he chose struggle and combat [illegible] that follow the idea conveyed in the [illegible] legend, and are worked up toward the [illegible] close in a fine crescendo. It was a [illegible] interesting number and was given [illegible] characteristic interpretation by the Orchestra. The programme for this afternoon is as follows:

Overture—Mignon—Ambroise Thomas.
Selection—From "Symphonie Orientale"—B. Godard. (A) "Nikia's Dream." (B) "In the Hammock."
Songs with Piano: (A) "Florian's Song" —Godard. (B) Vergebliches Standchen—Brahms. (C. "Fruhlingsnacht"—Schumann. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Rhapsodie—For Orchestra, in A—Lalo. Andantino. Allegretto Presto.
Symphonic Poem—"Tasso, Lament and Triumph"—Liszt.
Cavatina—From "Faust"—Gounod.
Concerto Allegro for Violin—"Perpetual Motion"—Paganini.
Overture—Tannhauser—Wagner.

The programme for to-night will consist of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," together with some of the solos in both works. The choruses in the "Stabat Mater" are wonderfully scored for orchestra in the modern style, and there is probablp nothing in the whole range of music by a living composer that has been so well received by connoiseurs. The performance tonight will be preparatory to the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will afford an opportunity to study the peculiar beauties of the composition.

The "Elijah" choruses are always effective, and they will be given with the recitatives so as to preserve the dramatic connection, and enable the audience to understand the motive of the work.

The incidental solo parts in both works will be sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Something About Its Personnel—A Talk With Conductor Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of musicians from all the great cities of Europe and includes a number from the most famous musical organizations on the continent. Of these [illegible] are better known in this country

---

[illegible] contains many of the best [illegible] Buffalo.

[illegible] Cornwell's classical motto is a little [illegible] for Buffalo.

[illegible] arrangement of the chorus is very effective.

The beaming face of Gus Schneider is conspicuous [illegible]

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra was delighted with [illegible]

[illegible]'s sounding board accomplished all that was expected of it. It is a decided improvement.

The young women of St. Margaret's school will occupy the upper boxes at to-night's performance.

The male soloists of the festival were entertained at the Buffalo club last evening after the performance.

Hon. E. Carleton Sprague was one of the most enthusiastic spectators last evening. He is a great lover of music.

Miss Bianca Fleishman played the accompaniments last evening in a faultless manner as she does upon all occasions.

The programme for this afternoon is an extra fine one. The soloists are Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Behrens, and Franz Rummel.

C. W. Torrington, the well known conductor of Toronto, accompanied by his wife,

[154]

Brilliant Opening of the Great Festival of Song.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

Splendid Work on the Part of Conductors, Soloists, Orchestra and Chorus—Concerts This Afternoon and Evening.

Music hall has been the scene of much festivity, but for beauty and brilliancy last evening the opening of the May festival eclipsed all former occasions. It was a grand and inspiring sight that met the eye as one entered the great hall with its magnificent decorations the vast assemblage which filled nearly every seat, and the sea of faces which rose tier upon tier on the stage.

Miniature electric lights twinkled like so many stars in the waxen foliage of the mountain laurel which hangs in draperies and garlands from the boxes, while clusters of bright-hued flowers relieve the great mass of greenery.

Promptly at 8 o'clock Herr Nikisch took his place, and with one wave of his magnetic baton the great May festival was inaugurated, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, that organiza[illegible] dashed off into the sweet and delightful [illegible] of the initial number. There were plenty of late comers who had to content themselves by waiting outside until the last notes of the first number had died away. It was Bethoven's famous "Lenore" overture No. 3, and it received magnificent treatment at the hands of the orchestra, as did the beautiful "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg which is such a prime favorite in Buffalo. In every number there was that exactness and precision of movement which is a crowning characteristic of this unequalled organization.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman was the first of the vocalists on the programme, and as she had already firmly established herself in the hearts of the people of this city, her appearance was greeted with prolonged applause. She sang in splendid voice and with sweet and tender expression and was accorded three enthusiastic recalls. Later she sang three songs, all of which were beautifully rendered.

The mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" was the first number contributed by Miss Clementine DeVere, and this charming vocalist was afforded ample opportunity to display the wonderful flexibility and range of her beautiful voice.

Mr. Francis Fisher Powers sang Verdi's aria, "O tu Palermo" very effectively. He has a very pleasing and powerful baritone voice, which he uses with care and discretion.

Then, after a brief intermission, came Massenet's "Eve," and when Mr. Lund took his place he was accorded a most cordial greeting. He lead the orchestra and the large and splendidly drilled chorus through the difficult passages with marked ability and execution. The solo parts in this work were sung by Miss De Vere, Mr. Powers and Mr. W. H. Rieger, and all acquitted themselves in a manner well deserving of the many compliments which were bestowed on every side. Mr. Rieger's part was not calculated to bring out the full resources of his beautiful voice, but his singing was greatly admired and he did full justice to the work. The orchestra played the accompaniments faultlessly and the chorus singing was undoubtedly the best that has ever been heard in Buffalo.

It was a fine audience, the majority of the ladies and gentlemen being in full evening dress. The arrangements are perfect in every detail and the army of ushers never did better work than last evening.

The following gentlemen under the direction of E. H. Rounds, chairman of the hall committee, acted as ushers: Murray Smith, Frank C. Reid, E. C. Rumrill, Selden Munger, H. E. Choate, Frank C. Percy, Harold Sidway, William Meadows, Burt Wheeler, F. C. Trubee, Frank Kimberly, George Himmelsback, Fred Deming, Nat Hall, Joe Hadcock, C. D. Fowler, Howard Cornwell, D. Newhall, Jr., George P. Keating, Ned Newhall, Arthur Hayes, C. H. Williams, W. A. Wheeler, William S. Barnett, George Bettis and John Oglevie.

The occupants of the lower boxes were as follows:

Box A—Mr. and Mrs. Wilson S. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Scatcherd, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin, Mrs. Sturges, Mrs. Cary, Miss Love, Miss Winnifred Scatcherd, and Miss Wood.

Box B—Gen. and Mrs. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Hayes, Miss Ussher, Miss Fowler, the Rev. Dr. John W. Brown, formerly of St. Paul's, now of St. Thomas', New York.

Box E—Mr and Mrs. Willis O. Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Griffin, the Rev. Henry A. Adams, Miss McKenna, Mr. Arthur Coffey, Miss Martin and Miss Gray.

Box F—This was reserved for the distinguished soloists during their intervals of rest. The upper boxes, G, H and D, were occupied by ladies of the Buffalo seminary, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams and Miss Hemenway.

Box G—Misses Ovens, Chittenden, Grace Jewett, Georgie Jewett, Murray, Williams and Eaton, and Mr. J. J. McWilliams.

Box H—Misses Sulpman, Peabody, Hawkins' Briggs, Wilhelm, Davis and Norton, and Mrs J. J. McWilliams.

Box D—Misses Hemenway, Geismer, Marcus, Wride, Hammond, Walbridge, Cook and McWilliams.

Box C.—Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pardee, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Hunsicker, Judge and Mrs Daniels.

The following is the programme for the concert this evening:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" ..... Van Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle ..... John Lund
Miss Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra ..... Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell song—"Lakme" ..... Delibe
Miss Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding), op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato ..... Molto
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—"The Nightingale" ..... Alibieff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
"Vorspeil und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Die Meistersinger," ..... Wagner
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

The chorus contains many of the best singers in Buffalo.

Mr. Cornwell's classical motto is a little high for Buffalo.

The seating arrangement of the chorus is very effective.

The beaming face of Gus Schneider is conspicuous [illegible] of the chorus.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra was delighted with Music hall.

Allen's sounding board accomplished all that was expected of it. It is a decided improvement.

The young women of St. Margaret's school will occupy the upper boxes at to-night's performance.

The whole soloists of the festival were entertained at the Buffalo club last evening after the performance.

Hon. E. Carleton Sprague was one of the most enthusiastic spectators last evening. He is a great lover of music.

Miss Bianca Fleishman played the accompaniments last evening in a faultless manner as she does upon all occasions.

The programme for this afternoon is an attractive one. The soloists are Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. Behrens, and Franz Rummel.

C. W. Torrington, the well known conductor of Toronto, accompanied by his wife, [illegible] past week in the interest of the festival.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. E. C. Bushnell and Mr. Franz Rummel, who will be heard at today's concerts, occupied the lower right-hand box.

Among the out-of-town visitors present last evening was Miss Jessica Porter of Rochester, one of the most promising pianists of the flower city.

Judge Ste[illegible] divided his time during the recess studying the name of the Greek goddess. It puzzled him almost as much as LeGrand Marvin's will.

Mr. F. C. M. Lautz, Mr. Hobart Weed and many other members of the Musical association were in high glee over the success of the opening of the festival.

Miss Mary Howe the beautiful and accomplished soprano, will make her initial bow to Buffalo this evening. She was an interested spectator last evening.

Miss Mary Howe, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Miss De Vere and Mrs. Nikisch were given a drive around the park yesterday afternoon by Messrs. Harry Hamlin and Edmund Hayes. The four-in-hand turn outs attracted considerable attention. After the drive lunch was served at the Country club.

COMMERCIAL-ADVERTISER, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/21

INTEREST INCREASING.

THE PROGRAMS SUPERBLY RENDERED.

The Prices Reduced—The Afternoon Program—Mrs. Nikisch's Success—The Evening's Program—Lund's War Song—Miss Fremstad.

The programs presented at the matinee and evening concert of the festival yesterday were charming. The audience in the afternoon was not a large one, about half filling the hall, but in the evening it was larger than at either of the previous concerts the hall being well filled.

The price of general admission has been reduced to $1 for the evening concerts and 75 cents for the matinee tomorrow; children's tickets for the latter will be 50 cents. No more money will be made by this reduction but it will be possible for a larger number to take advantage of this opportunity of hearing good music well rendered.

Liszt's "Grand Polonaise" was the opening number in the afternoon. It is well known to pianists but very few had heard it given by an orchestra. The musicians did full justice to the composition which was orchestrated by Berghaus.

Mrs. Nikisch, wife of the conductor, was the first soloist. She sang an aria from th "Magic Flute" instead of the Maillard number, and later sang three short songs: "Die Quelle" by Goldmark, Florian's Song, by Godard, and one by Brahms. Mrs. Nikisch proved a most acceptable singer although not one of rare accomplishments.

The orchestra played Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso, Godard's "Oriental Symphony," and the familiar "Midsummer Night's Dream," music by Mendellsohn. Anything rendered by this orchestra is thoroughly enjoyable, it is under the perfect control of Mr. Nikisch who is a skilled conductor, and has under him a company of artists.

Franz Rummel, the celebrated pianist, won the honors of the afternoon by his masterly interpretation of the Liszt E flat concerto. It is to be regretted that this artist is not to be heard a second time during the festival.

Mr. Behrens sang the aria from "La Juive," by Halevy, and the "Linden Tree," and "Wanderer," by Schubert, and of him it is sufficient to say he is an artist, and was as cordially received and as thoroughly enjoyed as when he sang last winter, especially in the two short songs.

The overture to "Oberon," by Weber, was first on the evening's program. It is a beautiful work beginning with the light, fairy-like music, here and there bringing in heavier and more martial, and then returning to the original strains. The Lalo Rhapsody for orchestra was a delightful number, and the "Rustic Wedding," symphony by Goldmark, was also superbly played, but parts were uninteresting. In both of these numbers the wind instruments were prominent, and it was a revelation to many to note the thoroughly artistic manner in which they were used. The two Wagner numbers "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan," concluded the orchestral numbers.

Miss Jahn proved a delightful singer, although she substituted the aria from the "Freischutz" for that from Oberon. It is a satisfaction to know she will be heard again.

The March to Battle by Mr. Lund was well received. Miss Jahn sang the soprano solo beautifully and Mr. Bushnell did justice to the short baritone solo allotted to him, while the male chorus was the finest ever heard in the city. The singers were determined to bring out the beauties of the composition and sang like true warriors. Again and again were the soloists called out and their calls for "Lund, Lund," brought the modest conductor himself when he was cheered enthusiastically.

Miss Mary Howe sang the Bell Song from "Lakme" and the "Nightingale." She proved a disappointment to many who had read accounts of her abilities, while to those who take a little salt with such high sounding praise she was what was expected—a singer having a good voice, but devoid of sympathy. A fine execution, however, well adapted for such selections as she chooses. However, had it not been for the no encore rule she would have sung again as she was recalled many times.

The closing program concluded with the chorus from "Eve" "At the first sweet smile of Woman." This was substituted for the "Meistersinger" chorale as the orchestral score for the latter is not here.

If it is not too late it would be well to shorten the remaining programs somewhat as those thus far have been too long. Miss Fox is quite ill in New York and her physician forbids her coming. The association has secured Miss Fremstad, a Swedish singer, who, it is said, will make a fine impression, though she is but 20 years of age. The program for this evening is as follows:

Symphonic poem—
"Lancelot and Elaine," ..... MacDowel
Overture—Fantasie—
"Romeo and Juliet," ..... Tschalkowsky
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) "Loveliest Flower" ..... Price
(b) "In the East" ..... Mulligan
Mr. W. H. Rieger.
Solo—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil" ..... David
Miss Mary Howe.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn, and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried and Gotterdammerung." Wagner.
(Arranged by Dr. Hans Richter.)
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Songs—
(a) "Still as the Night" ..... Bohm
(b) "Happiest Day" ..... Hellmund
Miss Fremstad.
Symphonie in C Minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale).
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Solo—"Echo Song" ..... Eckert
Miss Howe.
Chorus—"To Thee, O Country" ..... Eichberg
Festival Chorus.

[illegible] NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 6/21

SWEET MAY MUSIC

The First of the Brilliant May Festival Concerts.

IT WAS A GLOWING SUCCESS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Soloists Warmly Greeted by Buffalo Friends—The Chorus' Good Singing.

Seldom has a more brilliant or enthusiastic audience gathered in Music Hall than was present last night at the opening of the fifth season of the Buffalo Musical Association's May Festival. The audience could have been larger, but there were something over 2000 people present and the hall presented a scene of gaiety and kaleidascopic coloring which was pleasing and graceful.

The decorations were simple, and in their simplicity lay their charms. The boxes were wreathed and draped with evergreen streamers in which, at odd intervals, gleamed tiny electric lights, and the floor in front of the stage was banked high with palms. Away up overhead, where Music Hall habitues have been accustomed to look and see a row of ugly bars, the ceiling was decorated with a strange device in evergreen.

The chorus, nearly 500 strong, presented a splendid sight, the women in white, the men in evening dress, and the sounding board which was hung up over head proved its effectiveness when the chorus sung.

When Mr. Nikisch appeared he was greeted splendidly, and with an unassuming grace which was charming he took his place in the midst of his splendid orchestra and raised his baton. The scene was inspiring. Nikisch, long-haired and solemn, a perfect controlling power over the 70 odd musicians, the banked up chorus, the lights, the pretty costumes, all made a pretty May Festival picture.

Never was sweeter music heard in Buffalo than when Nikisch, the wizard of the baton, led his men through the beauties and grandeur of Beethoven's Lenore overture No. 3; and as the last note of this most beautiful composition died away a burst of applause filled the hall rolling and echoing from wall to ceiling.

Mrs. Julia E. Wymans was received cordially. She is so well known and so well liked here that she was greeted as an old friend. She sung Verdi's aria from "Don Carlos" most charmingly and with a nice finish, which was enthusiastically applauded.

It was unjust to Mr. Francis Fiske Powers to accompany him on the piano, for, although Miss Bianca Fleischman presided in a most correct manner, Mr. Powers would have appeared to much better advantage had he had the orchestra accompaniment. In spite of this his singing was all that could be desired.

The orchestra's rendition of Gregg's suite "Peer Gynt" brought the audience to a realization of the power which lay hidden in the strings, the brass and the reeds, which the skilled touch of the artists brought forth.

The enthusiasm, however, reached its height when Miss Clementina De Vere, charming as ever, and clad in a graceful, girdled gown, appeared and sang Thomas' mad scene from "Hamlet." Miss De Vere has been heard in Buffalo before and is a strong favorite here, but last night she sung her way into a permanent place in the hearts of the music loving people of Buffalo. Never, it may be safely said, has better singing been heard in this city. The interest was intense and the admiration profound, and when her song was ended the charming artists received an ovation as has never been given a singer in Music Hall before. It was grand, it was inspiring and Miss DeVere had cause to feel proud of her reception in the city of her friends, for all are her friends here in Buffalo.

Part II. of the programme was given up to Massanet's "Eve," and here the chorus was heard to splendid advantage. They sang well, barring an occasional flatting when unaccompanied. The volume was excellent, the expression good and Mr. Lund deserves great credit for the admirable manner in which he has trained the chorus, big and unwieldy [illegible] of its size to be [illegible]

Mr. [illegible] and Mr. Rieger was the [illegible] was grandly done and received the recognition due a work of its excellence. Mr. Rieger made his first appearance in "Eve," and he did not disappoint. His voice is clear and free and he sang with much feeling.

The only drawbacks to the closing parts of "Eve" was the hasty departure of a number of people from the hall while Miss De Vere was singing. It may have been their delicate sense of modesty was shocked by the sweet story of love, but they marred to a certain extent the beauty of the closing songs by creating noise.

The boxes were occupied by the following people:

Box A—Mr. and Mrs. John N. Scatcherd, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson S. Bissell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Hamlin, Mrs. Sturges, Mrs. Cary, Miss Love, Miss Winnifred Scatcherd and Miss Wood.

Box B.—Mr. and Mrs. Wagner, Mr. and Mrs. Edumd Hayes, Gen. and Mrs. Fields, Miss Ussher, Miss Fowler, Rev. Dr. John W. Brown, formerly of St. Paul's.

Box C—Judge and Mrs. Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pardee, Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Dodge of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Hunsicker.

Box D—Misses Hammond, Hemenway, Geismer, Marcus, Wride, Walbridge, Cook and McWilliams.

Box E—Rev. Henry A. Adams of St Paul's Mr. and Mrs. Patrick H. Griffin, Mr. and Mrs. Willis O. Chapin, Miss McKenna, Mr. Arthur Coffey, Miss Martin and Miss Gray.

Box F—Was reserved for the soloists. The upper boxes G, H and D were occupied by ladies of the Buffalo Female Academy, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. McWilliams and Miss Hemehway.

Among others present were the following: Mr. and Mrs. George P. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Ansley Wilcox, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Movius, George Hibbard, J. Adam Lautz, F. C. M. Lautz, O. C. Reed, H. D. Folinsbee, William Hamlin, Dr. and Mrs. Cronyn, Misses Cronyn, George Sandrock, Edward H. Hawley, Hobart Weed, Dr. Roswell Park, Judge Allen, E. Carlton Sprague, Spencer Clinton, William Meadows, James Madson, P. P. Pratt, William C. Cornwall, James M. Smith, Gen. and Mrs. John C. Graves, Thomas Cary, James P. White, Dr. and Mrs. Charles Cary, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Altman, Judge Jacob Stern, John W. Fisher, Hon. Philip Becker, Hon. and Mrs. William F. Sheehan, Hon. D. H. McMillan, Mr. and Mrs. C. W, Torrington of Toronto, Walter D'Enyer, Clarence Bushnell, Henry W. Box, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. Townsend Davis, Miss Saidee Abel, Mr. and Mrs. Sherman, Miss Lottie Sherman, Adolph Finck, Dexter P. Rumsey, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Newman, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Loomis, J. Ambrose Butler, S. S. Spaulding, Gustav Fleischman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Ramsdell, Philo D. Beard, Henry Marcus, D. C. Beard, E. Howard Hutchinson, Norris Morley, Henry W. Sprague, John C. Gard, George Brownell, Dr. Herman Hayd, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Jewett, Miss Jewett, Miss Charlotte Inman, Mr. and Mrs. William Hengerer, Henry Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Sloan, Alfred J. Wright, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Graves, Charles H. Gibson, George B. Matthews, Mr. and Mrs. William D. Taylor and others.

The complete programme for tonight is as follows:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Boston Symphony orchestra.
Aria—"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" —from "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss Jahn.
The March to Battle ..... John Lund
Miss Jahn, Mr. Bushnell and Male Chorus.
Rhapsody for orchestra ..... Lalo
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Bell Song—"Lakme" ..... Delibes
Miss Howe.
Symphony (Rustic Wedding) op 26 ... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato.
Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Song—"The Nightingale" ..... Alibieff
Miss Howe.
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
"Vorspeil und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Chorale, from "Die Meistersinger," ..... Wagner
Festival Chorus and Orchestra.

Clipping from
NEWS, Salem, Mass.

Date 6/[illegible]

DEATH OF A MUSICIAN.

He Was One of the Original Members of Gilmore's Salem Band.

Wm. C. Nichols, a well-known musician, died yesterday at his home in Dorchester. He was born in Beverly, Sept. 25, 1828. He was educated in his native place, and early sought a musical profession, being one of the original members of Gilmore's Salem band. He remained with Gilmore for some time after he went to Boston with his band, at that time the leading one of the country. When the war broke out Mr. Nichols enlisted in the band of which Mr. Gilmore was leader, with the New England guards, Twenty-fourth regiment, M. V. M., Col. Thomas G. Stevenson, and remained in service until the band was mustered out. On his return from war Mr. Nichols was again associated with Gilmore for two years. Later on he was elected a member of the Germania band, and for 24 years was a business manager for that organization. Upon the formation of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Nichols was elected a member and librarian, and held the position at the time of his death. Mr. Nichols has resided in Boston since 1863, removing to Dorchester in 1888, since which time he had been in failing health. Of late he had been interested with his oldest son, William F. Nichols, in the manufacturing of custom shirts. He was the president and one of the charter members of the Boston Musician's Relief Fund society, holding office at time of death. He was a member of Charles Russell post 7, G. A. R., and of Star of Bethlehem lodge, F. and A. M., of Chelsea. Mr. Nichols leaves three children.

[illegible] found in Hindo mythology, [illegible] its motive is of the broad and simple character that lends itself readily to musical treatment. Sakuntala, the daughter of the giant Viswamitre and the water nymph Menaka, being abandoned by her parents is adopted by the saint Kanwa. The King Dushyanta goes hunting in the forest, falls in love with Sakuntala, and persuades her to marry him according to the rites of the Gandharva marriage, promising to make her queen in the royal city and her son heir to the throne. The King, however, forgot his promise, and Sakuntala, after waiting for him to send for her until the boy is six years old, goes to seek him at his palace, but is repudiated by the King until a voice from heaven proclaims the boy his lawful son.

The composition opens with a slow introduction, followed by a movement in quicker tempo, in which the violoncellos and clarionets give out the principal theme which recurs frequently through the work. It is a grand, rich melody, broken in upon [illegible]als during the first part of the [illegible]ure by the trumpet call that suggests the hunting party. All the instruments in turn take up the melody, which is variously treated and relieved by an [illegible]ious instrumentation that gives [illegible]ive touches of color and variety. There is a second theme which is taken [illegible] the violins and oboes, and later [illegible] flutes accompanied by the figure [illegible] preceding subject, until a new [illegible]ore prominent theme given out [illegible] brass gradually absorbs the whole [illegible]ra. A harp accompaniment is [illegible] very fine effect where the orig[illegible]ne is brought in by the full [illegible] in a new and slightly accelerato. The finale rises in a splendo toward the close, and the [illegible]ture of the latter part is the [illegible] instrumentation by which it [illegible] up.

[illegible]m Walde" symphony, though [illegible]brated as the "Lenore," is a [illegible]far more attractive composi[illegible]eks the gruesome suggestive[illegible]e more familiar work, and [illegible]troduction of the wild hunt [illegible] to offer an opportunity for [illegible] fantastic, the movement [illegible] from the path of glory, in spit[illegible] of which he chose struggle and combat. The piece is developed from two themes that follow the idea conveyed in the legend, and are worked up toward the close in a fine crescendo. It was an interesting number and was given a characteristic interpretation by the Orchestra. The programme for this afternoon is as follows:

Overture—Mignon—Ambroise Thomas.
Selection—From "Symphonie Orientale"—B. Godard. (A) "Nikia's Dream." (B) "In the Hammock."
Songs with Piano: (A) "Florian's Song"—Godard. (B) Vergebliches Standchen—Brahms. (C. "Fruhlingsnacht"—Schumann. Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Rhapsodie—For Orchestra, in A—Lalo. Andantino · Allegretto Presto.
Symphonic Poem—"Tasso, Lament and Triumph"—Liszt.
Cavatina—From "Faust"—Gounod.
Concerto Allegro for Violin—"Perpetual Motion"—Paganini.
Overture—Tannhauser—Wagner.

The programme for to-night will consist of selected choruses from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," together with some of the solos in both works. The choruses in the "Stabat Mater" are wonderfully scored for orchestra in the modern style, and there is probablp nothing in the whole range of music by a living composer that has been so well received by connoiseurs. The performance tonight will be preparatory to the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will afford an opportunity to study the peculiar beauties of the composition.

The "Elijah" choruses are always effective, and they will be given with the recitatives so as to preserve the dramatic connection, and enable the audience to understand the motive of the work.

The incidental solo parts in both works will be sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. Shackleton, Mr. T. Grant Slaughter and Mr. Lewis Williams.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Something About Its Personnel—A Talk With Conductor Nikisch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is composed of musicians from all the great cities of Europe and includes a number from the most famous musical organizations on the continent. Of these [illegible] are better known in this country [illegible]

[154]

SOUVENIR - MAY FESTIVAL.

JOHN LUND.

MENU.

DINNER, 12 TO 2 P. M.

Little Neck Clams.

SOUPS.

Mock Turtle Soup — Consomme Alphabet

HORS D'OEUVRES.

Sliced Cucumbers — Radishes — Olives — Gherkins — Chow-chow

Sliced Bermuda Onions

FISH.

Boiled Salmon with Shrimp sauce, Pommes au beurre

BOILED.

Boiled Turkey with egg sauce

ENTREES.

Sweet Bread Sautee a l'Espagnole

Chicken Croquettes with new Peas

Broiled Shad Roe with tomato sauce

Braised Veal with Spinach

Asparagus with melted butter

Lamb Chops a la Soubise

ENTREMET.

Rolled Pancakes with Apricots

ROAST.

Ribs of Beef — Lamb with mint sauce — Chicken

PUNCH AU CUROCOA

VEGETABLES

Mashed Potatoes — Plain Boiled Potatoes

New String Beans — New Squash — Spinach — Oyster Plant

Beets — Rice — Onions — Corn — Tomatoes

SALADS.

Lettuce — Lobster

DESSERT.

Raspberry Pudding with whipped cream

Apple Pie — Lemon Meringue Pie

Chocolate Cream Puffs — Macaroons — Angel Food — Othellos

Champagne Jelly

Ice Cream Tortoni

Mixed Fruits — Raisins and Nuts

American Cheese — Cold Water Crackers — Brie Cheese

Coffee

Sunday, May 24, '91.

MENU.

DINNER, 12 TO 2 P. M.

Little Neck Clams.

SOUPS.

Mock Turtle Soup — Consomme Alphabet

HORS D'OEUVRES.

Sliced Cucumbers — Radishes — Olives — Gherkins — Chow-chow

Sliced Bermuda Onions

FISH.

Boiled Salmon with Shrimp sauce, Pommes au beurre

BOILED.

Boiled Turkey with egg sauce

ENTREES.

Sweet Bread Sautee a l'Espagnole

Chicken Croquettes with new Peas

Broiled Shad Roe with tomato sauce

Braised Veal with Spinach

Asparagus with melted butter

Lamb Chops a la Soubise

ENTREMET.

Rolled Pancakes with Apricots

ROAST.

Ribs of Beef — Lamb with mint sauce — Chicken

PUNCH AU CUROCOA

VEGETABLES

Mashed Potatoes — Plain Boiled Potatoes

New String Beans — New Squash — Spinach — Oyster Plant

Beets — Rice — Onions — Corn — Tomatoes

SALADS.

Lettuce — Lobster

DESSERT.

Raspberry Pudding with whipped cream

Apple Pie — Lemon Meringue Pie

Chocolate Cream Puffs — Macaroons — Angel Food — Othellos

Champagne Jelly

Ice Cream Tortoni

Mixed Fruits — Raisins and Nuts

Cold Water Crackers

American Cheese — Coffee — Brie Cheese

Sunday, May 24, '91.

Buffalo Express.
SUNDAY, MAY 24, 1891.

THE LAST CHORD.

Close of Buffalo's Fourth Great Musical Festival.

GUARANTORS LOSE FIVE PER CENT

Nikisch and His Orchestra and Lund's and Baker's Choruses Complimented—Soloists.

The Music Festival was ended last night with a splendid concert, and the audience was one of the largest that has yet gathered in Music Hall.

Everybody who knows anything about music concedes that the Festival has been pre-eminently an artistic success. Owing to various causes the audiences have not been so large as should be looked for in a city of a quarter of a million population, nor so numerous as the projectors of the Festival expected.

Yesterday, before the afternoon concert, Mr. Lautz said that he did not believe that more than 7 per cent. of the guaranty fund would be called for, and he hoped that the last two concerts might help the backers out of their financial hole. Happily this was so; the afternoon audience was great and the evening audience a paying one, and it is stated that no more of the guaranty fund will be called for beyond the 5 per cent. that has already been paid in.

The reduction in price increased the number of general admissions, but they were not so many as to make much difference in the matter of receipts; that is the revenue derived under the first arrangement would have been about the same, though fewer listeners would have gained the benefit of hearing the concerts.

The afternoon concert was a great success in every way, and the chorus of 600 children made as pretty a back-ground to the Orchestra as anyone could conceive. The parents of the little ones began coming at 1 o'clock and at 2 o'clock there was a line dozens long at the ticket window, and the lobby was crowded.

Of course there was great enthusiasm, for every mother in her mind's ear heard her own offspring piping above the rest, and tried to pick them out from among the throng. Mr. Baker was in his element, and his face shone with rapture.

In the evening the men and women chorus was heard again with great delight. During a pause in "King Rother," Miss Charlotte Tilden and Mrs. Martin Lautz came out from the chorus ranks with a great tray of roses on which they bore a wreath of laurel. They advanced with this and laid it at the feet of Mr. Lund, who was so surprised he didn't know what to do. Two ribbons bound the wreath of laurel. On one was "John Lund, Director"; on the other "Festival Chorus, 1891." Certainly Mr. Lund deserves the laurel. The Festival has borne triumphant testimony to his ability.

Afternoon Concert.

The children's Festival chorus attracted a large audience yesterday afternoon, and the programme pleased a great many older people immensely. A more active, wide-awake, yet well-behaved group of little people it would be difficult to find, and the audience was proud of them for keeping so quiet. They are the future singers of the city, and they deserve to be complimented for their debut performance yesterday. Each of the selections was sung with spirit, and in Mr. E. L. Baker's composition there was some very good shading. The popular teacher was received with loud applause, and received a basket of roses at the conclusion of the first chorus. "The Banner of the Free" ended with the waving of diminutive American flags, an effect that pleased everybody who is patriotic, and where is there a man "with soul so dead," who is not?

Miss Campbell sang her solo very well indeed in the anthem, and a second young girl, Miss Caroline Mann from No. 18f likewise left a pleasant impression of a good voice which ought to be trained. A lad with phenomenal lungs, who sang an entire solo without taking breath, also covered himself with youthful glory. Mr. Baker was a proud and happy man, and he deserved to be.

The soloists upon the programme were Miss Jahn, who gave her Wagner aria an artistic voicing; Mr. Mole, a flutist, and Messrs. Rieger and Bushnell. It is rare to hear the flute played in concert in this time, and Mr. Mole had therefore, an attentive audience. He is a virtuoso without doubt. Mr. Rieger presented two worthless songs in a manner that deserved better music, and Mr. Bushnell followed with even a more pitiably weak composition which excited a smile throughout the house. Buffalo is not New York, but it knows the best vocal music written, and such poor compositions do not please here, whatever they may do in the metropolis. Mr. Bushnell happily blotted out the remembrance of the "Old Stone Wall" with Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." Neither vocalist should ever present such music to any audience unless they wish to be known as appealing to a low taste.

The Orchestra gave two numbers, and in the "Tannhäuser" overture played more brilliantly than at any previous concert. It was a masterly performance from beginning to end. [illegible]

[illegible] in the hands of [illegible] fully appreciated the power of the strings for the long sweep of the bows brought out most ravishing tone. No one can make this Orchestra live and breathe however but the Leipzig man who is happily its conductor. Handel's "Largo" played by all the violins, was a principal feature of the concert, and most heartily applauded, and the programme closed with Van Weber's graceful "Eurayanthe" overture.

The Evening Concert.

The last concert of the Festival opened with a performance of Liszt's symphonic poem entitled "Tasso." No composer more thoroughly enjoyed Italy than the famous Abbe, who brought so little honor to his church, but so much to the world's library of composition. He loved the dolce far niente life of the South, and while there brought out much that has delighted his devotees since. "Tasso" was a prolific theme upon which to work, with its broad scope for fierce temper, melancholy thoughts, and passionate love. He recognized the enormous possibilities before him, and laid hold upon them with a strong hand. The Orchestra's treatment was magnificent, Mr. Nikisch bringing out the full powers of each instrument. When he struck the last beat the house rang with applause, which he was obliged to acknowledge again and again.

The next number was from Wagner's "Lohengrin," and introduced Mr. Dippel, the now famous tenor. He is a thorough exponent of the Wagner school, and it was a delight to hear "Lohengrin's Narrative" sung so dramatically. His voice is high, full, and of tenor robusto quality, admirably adapted for the solo. It is a pity that Mr. Dippel has not appeared more often at the Festival as he was undoubtedly the strongest solo attraction offered. He carried one back to the famous time of Winkelmann and Scaria, and created the longing for more of Wagner's vocal music. His reception was most marked, the audience comprehending after his first phrase that he was a singer of undoubted ability.

Mrs. Nikisch followed Mr. Dippel in three German songs, and was accompanied by her husband upon the piano. They were all compositions of a high order, and she sang them with better voice and more pleasing effect than at the Thursday concert. As Mr. Nikisch left the stage there was an unpleasant feeling that the Festival had lost its central figure. The personality of the man is very strong and makes itself felt wherever he is.

The programme closed with the performance of "King Rother" the discriptive cantata by Joseph Krug. Since late in the autumn of last year the chorus has been rehearsing two hours each week upon its very simple, but refined music, and a better performance could scarcely have been given. The voices blended well, the sopranos did not shriek, and the tenors were equally moderate in taking high notes. As a whole it was a thoroughly enjoyable presentation of a very beautiful subject. Owing to the lateness of the hour, Mr. Lund had to cut the cantata, a ruthless necessity, and one which musicians deeply regretted. The work should be given completely, and the few repetitions permitted, because the music is so attractive. There are places in the cantata that are montonous, but they could be brightened by a little sharper time being given the singers. It was obvious that in several instances this would have improved the effect, but the ensemble was too good to criticise for such a minor fault.

"King Rother" is a work of pure intent and depicts the highest sentiment that can possess the mind and heart of man, namely, love, affection, and fidelity. Krug has added to musical literature a really beautiful work which will always interest scholars and challenge their respect. A single hearing does not, however, make the impression which it deserves, for there is no time to appreciate the excellencies that familiarity discloses. It is to be regretted that "King Rother" must be laid aside with the one performance and only the chorus fully understanding its true musical value.

Miss De Vere as Queen Oda, and Mr. Bushnell as Rother, are to be highly complimented. The latter had the lion's share of the solo work and sang his part royally. His voice has most pleasant qualities, and is managed well, making him a most acceptable singer. In the descriptive solo at the bridal feast, and later when he stigmatizes the deed of the Emperor, he rose to a splendid dramatic effect which deserves the highest praise. In the less declamatory parts the voice took a tender tone that was strikingly effective. Mr. Bushnell needs to be told that he is too good a singer to allow the tremolo to spoil his tone. The upper notes above D already show the effect and will more so as time passes if it is not corrected. Miss De Vere has won many compliments in Buffalo for her efforts, the last being possibly her very best. The singer is completely tired out with hard work, having had a long season of constant traveling and singing. She will go to Europe immediately to rest and fill some engagements in London. Miss Philippbaar and Mr. Sheehan also both appeared to advantage in their short solos.

A word more is due the splendid chorus that disbanded last night. It has been, with the exception of the Orchestra, the bright particular feature of the Festival, and has made a reputation for the man who trained it so patiently. The public has enjoyed every note of the music sung, because it has been given with such rare good taste and fine comprehension of effective singing. A universal vote of thanks goes out to the individual members for their enthusiasm in preparing the cantatas and for the genuine pleasure they have given. The Boston Symphony, its effectual coadjutor, returns home laden with new honors, for the concerts have been a succession of triumphs, one more pronounced than the other. A more artistic, well-arranged [illegible] could not have been [illegible] cause of taste who deserve the honor of its conception should be written in letters of gold. In every particular, the details have been marvelously well managed, and the Musical Association has again put the music-loving public in its debt.

Notes.

The harp in the orchestra carried you back to Tara's Halls.

That Musical Association is the most good-natured body. They beam as pleasantly in an empty house as in one chock full.

Nobody knows yet, even approximately, what the receipts for the Festival were. They were large, but they kicked the beam to the expenditures.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, became a great favorite during his stay here by his unfailing courtesy and unassuming behavior.

The Musical Courier.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 20, 1891.

A Glance at the Past Season.

MR. E. I. STEVENSON cleverly sums up the past musical season as follows in last Saturday's "Evening Sun:"

A retrospect over the active portion of the local musical season, now merging into the comparatively quiescent period, gives one the impression that since last October it is less actual musical occurrences themselves than three or four matters connected with music that distinguish the season of 1890–1. There had been the accustomed plethora of orchestral concerts, serial and other; a great deal of choral music from a dozen different societies, some opera in English, much opera in German (at the Metropolitan), light opera enough, chamber music in plenty from four or five clubs, a large batch of piano recitals and, indeed, recitals of many sorts, some notable foreign musicians visiting the United States, a goodly list of independent and detached concerts and musical entertainments. But nothing done in all their immediate connection exceeds the significance of Theodore Thomas' withdrawal from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic Society and Anton Seidl's election in his stead last month, or the sudden decision of the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House to discontinue performances in German during next season, substituting either Italian or French music and singers, as shall be the case; or the moving of the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society into the new music hall on Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue; or the opening of that imposing and conveniently situated auditorium for what general public usefulness shall be its privilege.

It has not been a particularly brilliant orchestral season, either as to very interesting novelties brought out or as to any resorting to favorite and standard scores. The Boston Symphony Orchestra once more has shown all the symphonic bands of the city how it surpasses them in precise, refined and solid performance; the Philharmonics became a shade more lethargic even than during the last four or five years; the Symphony Society has continued to do its too perfunctory duty under Mr. Damrosch; Mr. Thomas has given a long list of more or less enjoyable Sunday night concerts with admirable programs but until lately by no means satisfactory playing. Of new scores the record is short: "Prometheus Vinctus," a fine overture by Goldmark; a new violin concerto by the same hand; "Ivan the Terrible," a character picture by Anton Rubinstein; the same composer's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture; Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture fantasy; a violin concerto by Joachim; a concerto by Mr. Burmeister, an American musician, and some additional scores covering the list. Not one new symphony has been performed in New York city this winter!—an uncommon fact. Chorally it has been a feeble and dull year; for one reason, the Oratorio Society's special rehearsals for the Music Hall festival concerts made that able organization's season a slim and tame matter. In opera the Metropolitan adhered to a repertory varied significantly from other seasons by only two works. Chamber music and small concerts have been no more interesting, in the majority, than would serve the performance's turn.

In the following notes are mentioned those features of each month's musical scope that are somewhat outside of the regular and appointed entertainments of our seasons. To include all that is applicable to such a list is equally impracticable. What is mentioned is less as a chronicle than a mental fillip.

In October a season of grand opera and opera comique sung in English was entered upon in Harlem by Oscar Hammerstein, manager of the opera house called after him. It continued several weeks with considerable artistic success, but proving unprofitable was speedily discontinued. "Poor Jonathan," a very poor comic opera, the music by Milloecker, was produced at the Casino handsomely, and thereafter ran the season through.

The Jankó keyboard, a new and remarkably ingenious arrangement of the keys of organ or piano, was exhibited publicly and privately. The rumor that Anton Rubinstein expected to visit the United States on a concert tour was active, but therewith authoritatively quashed. Theodore Thomas began his long series of Sunday night concerts at the Lenox Lyceum. Mr. Seidl ended those he led for some weeks at the Madison Square Garden.

In November Franz Rummel, the pianist, made his New York rentrée, after an absence of many years, in concerts with an orchestra, and also in recitals. Anton Seidl began his Brooklyn orchestral concerts that proved very successful throughout the series. Nahan Franko began a brief set of orchestral concerts. The Philharmonic Society of New York and the Symphony Society started in for their season's work, as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Brooklyn began the Philharmonics of that city (to all intents and purposes the last of them, as it proved), and a series of concerts by C. Mortimer Wiske, conductor. At the Metropolitan, grand opera, sung in German, opened its seventh season with an uncommonly efficient company, headed by Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Ritter-Goetze, Miss Jahn, Miss Huhn and the Messrs. Gudehus, Dippel, Reichmann, Fischer and Behrens. The opera of "Azrael," a remarkably interesting work by Franchetti, was produced in this country for the first time on the first night of the season. The Oratorio Society of New York, Walter Damrosch conductor, sang Haydn's "Creation" at its first concert for a winter in which its usual number of public entertainments was reduced owing to early preparations for the recent dedication festival in the new Music Hall.

In December the New York Chorus Society was revived, rather ineffectively but courageously, by Mr. Wiske, and Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" cantata sung at the outstarting. Under the same leader the Schubert Club, a choral organization for women's voices, began a set of public concerts, continued during succeeding months. The Manuscript Society did likewise. At the Metropolitan was brought out for the first time in America, with little popular success, a remarkable tragic opera, "The Vassal of Szigeth," by Smareglia. The Church Choral Society gave the first of two notable concerts of ecclesiastical music, under the direction of Richard Henry Warren in St. Thomas' Church. Mr. Max Spicker's interesting series of orchestral concerts was added to those already current in Brooklyn.

In January Xaver Scharwenka came to New York, in his public capacity, and he was heard as composer and pianist in concert and in recitals. "Diana of Solange," a respectable, dull opera of antique German pattern, by Ernst II., Duke of Saxe-Coburg, was brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House, and, after strong signs of critical and popular disapproval, was shelved after two representations. Immediately after this incident came the announcement that a German company of singers would not be retained for the 1891–2 season of grand opera at the Metropolitan and that Mr. Henry E. Abbey was engaged to provide an Italian or French troupe, without any adherence to the repertory hitherto indicated for the house. There was much astonishment and comment at this announcement, the practical results of which are yet to be determined when next November comes.

It is worth while, however, to say here that the management of the Metropolitan had made the public less disposed to grieve over the proposed change by their adherence to a policy of Wagnerizing the repertory quite disproportionately; by not establishing it in a broad and truly perceptive manner; by not producing either old or new operas, either Wagnerian or other, in a style at once faithful to model representations or to the intentions of the librettos; and, last, by making it a sine qua non that the city's German public and its naturally strong Wagnerian bias should render a given opera remunerative and an object to the Metropolitan's treasury, or else it must be at once dropped from the repertory as an error and superfluity.

To the Opera House the public have said: "You sing well, and seem to care about singing well only Wagner; therefore only to Wagnerian operas will we go." The German public have said: "Only Wagner do we care for; therefore to Wagnerian opera particularly will we go." The Opera House has said to the public on its side: "Only to Wagnerian operas do you come in sufficient force, and as the German public of the city have to make our week's performances pay, therefore we will let all other operas, all other music, be counted pretty much as stubble for Wagner and to gratify a large German public." Those persons who are so unlucky as actually yet to be unawakened to Wagner's noble charm, or those who are averse to the complete Wagnerizing and, so to say, Teutonizing of the Opera House's repertory and of all things connected with the Opera House, therefore have managed to turn and overturn the arbitrary conditions of things most chaotically.

In view of the efficient company of this last season and of the admirable way in which the services of many artists in it might be utilized in a broad repertory it is a pity that so open a revolution and so radical a one has occurred. A moderate amount of provision and tact might have prevented it, had those qualities been exercised carefully in the arrangements for the past three seasons. After the promulgation of its decision as to the change of policy at the opera house, the direction promptly abandoned all intentions and pledges as to the repertory's reinforcement, and devoted the rest of the season to Wagnerian opera and music drama; with, naturally, an immediate financial advantage to the house and many admirable performances of the predominating composer's works; the season mutating into another emphatically Wagnerian one.

In February Mrs. Minnie Hauk revisited the United States, singing at the Metropolitan in "Carmen" and "L'Africaine." It was stated that two new orchestras, endowed, were to be organized, one by the National Conservatory of Music, the other by a subscription which Mr. Walter Damrosch undertook to further. (The last named appears like to be an accomplished fact.) A concert performance of considerable effectiveness of Wagner's "Parsifal" was given, Anton Seidl directing, at the Metropolitan Opera House, the like being done later in the spring in Brooklyn. The meeting was called to found a social musical club. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society decided to discontinue the concerts from the orchestra known by its name, and for the season of 1891–2 to hire the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its winter's course of entertainments—a wise move.

In March the farewell performances of grand opera in German at the Metropolitan continued, with large audiences and much enthusiasm—the usual Wagnerian partial cyclus being taken up. Gounod's "Redemption" was revived under Mr. Wiske in Brooklyn. The complete occupancy of the new Music Hall by the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society was prefaced by the completion of Recital Hall, the smaller auditorium in the edifice. The rehearsals for the dedication festival were continued with the Oratorio Society's chorus this month very actively. Mr. Bernhard Listemann and his chamber music club visited New York for the first time. With the last week of March came the usual Easter music of the city's churches, elaborate, good, bad and indifferent, but nearly always pretentious.

In April came the concluding concerts in the serial ones of the winter. Arthur Friedheim, the pianist, made his first appearance in America. A great quantity of piano recitals came with the month. Among the pianists thus occupied before the public were Mr. De Pachmann, Mr. Friedheim, Mr. Ansorge, Mr. Rummel, Mr. Scharwenka, A. Victor Benham and others. A testimonial benefit of an operatic sort was tendered Mr. Edmund C. Stanton of the Metropolitan Opera House. The Lenox Lyceum's popular Sunday night concerts ended with much success. Maximillian Vogrich's oratorio, "The Captivity," was produced for the first time by the Metropolitan Musical Society. The American Composers' Choral Association's and the Manuscript Society's concerts also deserve mention.

The first week in May was occupied with the opening to the city of the new Music Hall and by the dedicatory concerts given with the co-operation of the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society, with the conductorial help of Mr. Walter Damrosch and the special participation of Mr. Peter Tschaikowsky, the distinguished Russian composer, who made for this purpose his first visit to the United States. Mr. Charles Santley, the famous English baritone, was heard in a single concert, he happening to pass through New York on returning to England. "Apollo," a new light opera, music by Helmesberger, began a presumptively long run at the Casino, and sundry other operettas are now brought forward for the spring and summer.

Such is a very brief outline of what has been noteworthy in the season, chiefly outside of the regular current of events. In activity and in interests, if of a somewhat different nature, the coming season is expected to exceed considerably its predecessor, and it can easily achieve that honor.

Buffalo Courier.

SUNDAY, MAY 24, 1891.

THE LAST CHORD.

Close of Buffalo's Fourth Great Musical Festival.

GUARANTORS LOSE FIVE PER CENT

Nikisch and His Orchestra and Lund's and Baker's Choruses Complimented—Soloists.

The Music Festival was ended last night with a splendid concert, and the audience was one of the largest that has yet gathered in Music Hall.

Everybody who knows anything about music concedes that the Festival has been pre-eminently an artistic success. Owing to various causes the audiences have not been so large as should be looked for in a city of a quarter of a million population, nor so numerous as the projectors of the Festival expected.

Yesterday, before the afternoon concert, Mr. Lautz said that he did not believe that more than 7 per cent. of the guaranty fund would be called for, and he hoped that the last two concerts might help the backers out of their financial hole. Happily this was so; the afternoon audience was great and the evening audience a paying one, and it is stated that no more of the guaranty fund will be called for beyond the 5 per cent. that has already been paid in.

The reduction in price increased the number of general admissions, but they were not so many as to make much difference in the matter of receipts; that is the revenue derived under the first arrangement would have been about the same, though fewer listeners would have gained the benefit of hearing the concerts.

The afternoon concert was a great success in every way, and the chorus of 600 children made as pretty a back-ground to the Orchestra as anyone could conceive. The parents of the little ones began coming at 1 o'clock and at 2 o'clock there was a line dozens long at the ticket window, and the lobby was crowded.

Of course there was great enthusiasm, for every mother in her mind's ear heard her own offspring piping above the rest, and tried to pick them out from among the throng. Mr. Baker was in his element, and his face shone with rapture.

In the evening the men and women chorus was heard again with great delight. During a pause in "King Rother," Miss Charlotte Tilden and Mrs. Martin Lautz came out from the chorus ranks with a great tray of roses on which they bore a wreath of laurel. They advanced with this and laid it at the feet of Mr. Lund, who was so surprised he didn't know what to do. Two ribbons bound the wreath of laurel. On one was "John Lund, Director"; on the other "Festival Chorus, 1891." Certainly Mr. Lund deserves the laurel. The Festival has borne triumphant testimony to his ability.

Afternoon Concert.

The children's Festival chorus attracted a large audience yesterday afternoon, and the programme pleased a great many older people immensely. A more active, wide-awake, yet well-behaved group of little people it would be difficult to find, and the audience was proud of them for keeping so quiet. They are the future singers of the city, and they deserve to be complimented for their debut performance yesterday. Each of the selections was sung with spirit, and in Mr. E. L. Baker's composition there was some very good shading. The popular teacher was received with loud applause, and received a basket of roses at the conclusion of the first chorus. "The Banner of the Free" ended with the waving of diminutive American flags, an effect that pleased everybody who is patriotic, and where is there a man "with soul so dead," who is not?

Miss Campbell sang her solo very well indeed in the anthem, and a second young girl, Miss Caroline Mann from No. 18f likewise left a pleasant impression of a good voice which ought to be trained. A lad with phenomenal lungs, who sang an entire solo without taking breath, also covered himself with youthful glory. Mr. Baker was a proud and happy man, and he deserved to be.

The soloists upon the programme were Miss Jahn, who gave her Wagner aria an artistic voicing; Mr. Mole, a flutist, and Messrs. Rieger and Bushnell. It is rare to hear the flute played in concert in this time, and Mr. Mole had therefore, an attentive audience. He is a virtuoso without doubt. Mr. Rieger presented two worthless songs in a manner that deserved better music, and Mr. Bushnell followed with even a more pitiably weak composition which excited a smile throughout the house. Buffalo is not New York, but it knows the best vocal music written, and such poor compositions do not please here, whatever they may do in the metropolis. Mr. Bushnell happily blotted out the remembrance of the "Old Stone Wall" with Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." Neither vocalist should ever present such music to any audience unless they wish to be known as appealing to a low taste.

The Orchestra gave two numbers, and in the "Tannhauser" overture played more brilliantly than at any previous concert. It was a masterly performance from beginning [illegible] made a different composition in the hands of a fine orchestra. The house fully appreciated the power of the strings, for the long sweep of the bows brought out most ravishing tone. No one can make this Orchestra live and breathe however but the Leipzig man who is happily its conductor. Handel's "Largo" played by all the violins, was a principal feature of the concert, and most heartily applauded, and the programme closed with Van Weber's graceful "Eurayanthe" overture.

The Evening Concert.

The last concert of the Festival opened with a performance of Lisst's symphonic poem entitled "Tasso." No composer more thoroughly enjoyed Italy than the famous Abbe, who brought so little honor to his church, but so much to the world's library of composition. He loved the dolce far niente life of the South, and while there brought out much that has delighted his devotees since. "Tasso" was a prolific theme upon which to work, with its broad scope for fierce temper, melancholy thoughts, and passionate love. He recognized the enormous possibilities before him, and laid hold upon them with a strong hand. The Orchestra's treatment was magnificent, Mr. Nikisch bringing out the full powers of each instrument. When he struck the last beat the house rang with applause, which he was obliged to acknowledge again and again.

The next number was from Wagner's "Lohengrin," and introduced Mr. Dippel, the now famous tenor. He is a thorough exponent of the Wagner school, and it was a delight to hear "Lohengrin's Narrative" sung so dramatically. His voice is high, full, and of tenor robusto quality, admirably adapted for the solo. It is a pity that Mr. Dippel has not appeared more often at the Festival as he was undoubtedly the strongest solo attraction offered. He carried one back to the famous time of Winkelmann and Scaria, and created the longing for more of Wagner's vocal music. His reception was most marked, the audience comprehending after his first phrase that he was a singer of undoubted ability.

Mrs. Nikisch followed Mr. Dippel in three German songs, and was accompanied by her husband upon the piano. They were all compositions of a high order, and she sang them with better voice and more pleasing effect than at the Thursday concert. As Mr. Nikisch left the stage there was an unpleasant feeling that the Festival had lost its central figure. The personality of the man is very strong and makes itself felt wherever he is.

The programme closed with the performance of "King Rother" the discriptive cantata by Joseph Krug. Since late in the autumn of last year the chorus has been rehearsing two hours each week upon its very simple, but refined music, and a better performance could scarcely have been given. The voices blended well, the sopranos did not shriek, and the tenors were equally moderate in taking high notes. As a whole it was a thoroughly enjoyable presentation of a very beautiful subject. Owing to the lateness of the hour, Mr. Lund had to cut the cantata, a ruthless necessity, and one which musicians deeply regretted. The work should be given completely, and the few repetitions permitted, because the music is so attractive. There are places in the cantata that are montonous, but they could be brightened by a little sharper time being given the singers. It was obvious that in several instances this would have improved the effect, but the ensemble was too good to criticise for such a minor fault.

"King Rother" is a work of pure intent and depicts the highest sentiment that can possess the mind and heart of man, namely, love, affection, and fidelity. Krug has added to musical literature a really beautiful work which will always interest scholars and challenge their respect. A single hearing does not, however, make the impression which it deserves, for there is no time to appreciate the excellencies that familiarity discloses. It is to be regretted that "King Rother" must be laid aside with the one performance and only the chorus fully understanding its true musical value.

Miss De Vere as Queen Oda, and Mr. Bushnell as Rother, are to be highly complimented. The latter had the lion's share of the solo work and sang his part royally. His voice has most pleasant qualities, and is managed well, making him a most acceptable singer. In the descriptive solo at the bridal feast, and later when he stigmatizes the deed of the Emperor, he rose to a splendid dramatic effect which deserves the highest praise. In the less declamatory parts the voice took a tender tone that was strikingly effective. Mr. Bushnell needs to be told that he is too good a singer to allow the tremolo to spoil his tone. The upper notes above D already show the effect and will more so as time passes if it is not corrected. Miss De Vere has won many compliments in Buffalo for her efforts, the last being possibly her very best. The singer is completely tired out with hard work, having had a long season of constant traveling and singing. She will go to Europe immediately to rest and fill some engagements in London. Miss Philippbaar and Mr. Sheehan also both appeared to advantage in their short solos.

A word more is due the splendid chorus that disbanded last night. It has been, with the exception of the Orchestra, the bright particular feature of the Festival, and has made a reputation for the man who trained it so patiently. The public has enjoyed every note of the music sung, because it has been given with such rare good taste and fine comprehension of effective singing. A universal vote of thanks goes out to the individual members for their enthusiasm in preparing the cantatas and for the genuine pleasure they have given. The Boston Symphony, its effectual coadjutor, returns home laden with new honors, for the concerts have been a succession of triumphs, one more pronounced than the other. A more artistic, well-arranged Festival could not have been projected [illegible] association of public-spirited men, and the names of those who deserve the honor of its conception should be written in letters of gold. In every particular, the details have been marvelously well managed, and the Musical Association has again put the music-loving public in its debt.

Notes.

The harp in the orchestra carried you back to Tara's Halls.

That Musical Association is the most good-natured body. They beam as pleasantly in an empty house as in one chock full.

Nobody knows yet, even approximately, what the receipts for the Festival were. They were large, but they kicked the beam to the expenditures.

Mr. C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, became a great favorite during his stay here by his unfailing courtesy and unassuming behavior.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 20, 1891.

A Glance at the Past Season.

MR. E. I. STEVENSON cleverly sums up the past musical season as follows in last Saturday's "Evening Sun:"

A retrospect over the active portion of the local musical season, now merging into the comparatively quiescent period, gives one the impression that since last October it is less actual musical occurrences themselves than three or four matters connected with music that distinguish the season of 1890-1. There had been the accustomed plethora of orchestral concerts, serial and other; a great deal of choral music from a dozen different societies, some opera in English, much opera in German (at the Metropolitan), light opera enough, chamber music in plenty from four or five clubs, a large batch of piano recitals and, indeed, recitals of many sorts, some notable foreign musicians visiting the United States, a goodly list of independent and detached concerts and musical entertainments. But nothing done in all their immediate connection exceeds the significance of Theodore Thomas' withdrawal from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic Society and Anton Seidl's election in his stead last month, or the sudden decision of the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House to discontinue performances in German during next season, substituting either Italian or French music and singers, as shall be the case; or the moving of the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society into the new music hall on Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue; or the opening of that imposing and conveniently situated auditorium for what general public usefulness shall be its privilege.

It has not been a particularly brilliant orchestral season, either as to very interesting novelties brought out or as to any resorting to favorite and standard scores. The Boston Symphony Orchestra once more has shown all the symphonic bands of the city how it surpasses them in precise, refined and solid performance; the Philharmonics became a shade more lethargic even than during the last four or five years; the Symphony Society has continued to do its too perfunctory duty under Mr. Damrosch; Mr. Thomas has given a long list of more or less enjoyable Sunday night concerts with admirable programs but until lately by no means satisfactory playing. Of new scores the record is short: "Prometheus Vinctus," a fine overture by Goldmark; a new violin concerto by the same hand; "Ivan the Terrible," a character picture by Anton Rubinstein; the same composer's "Antony and Cleopatra" overture; Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture fantasy; a violin concerto by Joachim; a concerto by Mr. Burmeister, an American musician, and some additional scores covering the list. Not one new symphony has been performed in New York city this winter!—an uncommon fact. Chorally it has been a feeble and dull year; for one reason, the Oratorio Society's special rehearsals for the Music Hall festival concerts made that able organization's season a slim and tame matter. In opera the Metropolitan adhered to a repertory varied significantly from other seasons by only two works. Chamber music and small concerts have been no more interesting, in the major ity, than would serve the performance's turn.

In the following notes are mentioned those features of each month's musical scope that are somewhat outside of the regular and appointed entertainments of our seasons. To include all that is applicable to such a list is equally impracticable. What is mentioned is less as a chronicle than a mental fillip.

In October a season of grand opera and opera comique sung in English was entered upon in Harlem by Oscar Hammerstein, manager of the opera house called after him. It continued several weeks with considerable artistic success, but proving unprofitable was speedily discontinued. "Poor Jonathan," a very poor comic opera, the music by Milloecker, was produced at the Casino handsomely, and thereafter ran the season through.

The Jankó keyboard, a new and remarkably ingenious arrangement of the keys of organ or piano, was exhibited publicly and privately. The rumor that Anton Rubinstein expected to visit the United States on a concert tour was active, but therewith authoritatively quashed. Theodore Thomas began his long series of Sunday night concerts at the Lenox Lyceum. Mr. Seidl ended those he led for some weeks at the Madison Square Garden.

In November Franz Rummel, the pianist, made his New York rentrée, after an absence of many years, in concerts with an orchestra, and also in recitals. Anton Seidl began his Brooklyn orchestral concerts that proved very successful throughout the series. Nahan Franko began a brief set of orchestral concerts. The Philharmonic Society of New York and the Symphony Society started in for their season's work, as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In Brooklyn began the Philharmonics of that city (to all intents and purposes the last of them, as it proved), and a series of concerts by C. Mortimer Wiske, conductor. At the Metropolitan, grand opera, sung in German, opened its seventh season with an uncommonly efficient company, headed by Mrs. Mielke, Mrs. Ritter-Goetze, Miss Jahn, Miss Huhn and the Messrs. Gudehus, Dippel, Reichmann, Fischer and Behrens. The opera of "Azrael," a remarkably interesting work by Franchetti, was produced in this country for the first time on the first night of the season. The Oratorio Society of New York, Walter Damrosch conductor, sang Haydn's "Creation" at its first concert for a winter in which its usual number of public entertainments was reduced owing to early preparations for the recent dedication festival in the new Music Hall.

In December the New York Chorus Society was revived, rather ineffectively but courageously, by Mr. Wiske, and Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" cantata sung at the outstarting. Under the same leader the Schubert Club, a choral organization for women's voices, began a set of public concerts, continued during succeeding months. The Manuscript Society did likewise. At the Metropolitan was brought out for the first time in America, with little popular success, a remarkable tragic opera, "The Vassal of Szigeth," by Smareglia. The Church Choral Society gave the first of two notable concerts of ecclesiastical music, under the direction of Richard Henry Warren in St. Thomas' Church. Mr. Max Spicker's interesting series of orchestral concerts was added to those already current in Brooklyn.

In January Xaver Scharwenka came to New York, in his public capacity, and he was heard as composer and pianist in concert and in recitals. "Diana of Solange," a respectable, dull opera of antique German pattern, by Ernst II., Duke of Saxe-Coburg, was brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House, and, after strong signs of critical and popular disapproval, was shelved after two representations. Immediately after this incident came the announcement that a German company of singers would not be retained for the 1891-2 season of grand opera at the Metropolitan and that Mr. Henry E. Abbey was engaged to provide an Italian or French troupe, without any adherence to the repertory hitherto indicated for the house. There was much astonishment and comment at this announcement, the practical results of which are yet to be determined when next November comes.

It is worth while, however, to say here that the management of the Metropolitan had made the public less disposed to grieve over the proposed change by their adherence to a policy of Wagnerizing the repertory quite disproportionately; by not establishing it in a broad and truly perceptive manner; by not producing either old or new operas, either Wagnerian or other, in a style at once faithful to model representations or to the intentions of the librettos; and, last, by making it a sine qua non that the city's German public and its naturally strong Wagnerian bias should render a given opera remunerative and an object to the Metropolitan's treasury, or else it must be at once dropped from the repertory as an error and superfluity.

To the Opera House the public have said: "You sing well, and seem to care about singing well only Wagner; therefore only to Wagnerian operas will we go." The German public have said: "Only Wagner do we care for; therefore to Wagnerian opera particularly will we go." The Opera House has said to the public on its side: "Only to Wagnerian operas do you come in sufficient force, and as the German public of the city have to make our week's performances pay, therefore we will let all other operas, all other music, be counted pretty much as stubble for Wagner and to gratify a large German public." Those persons who are so unlucky as actually yet to be unawakened to Wagner's noble charm, or those who are averse to the complete Wagnerizing and, so to say, Teutonizing of the Opera House's repertory and of all things connected with the Opera House, therefore have managed to turn and overturn the arbitrary conditions of things most chaotically.

In view of the efficient company of this last season and of the admirable way in which the services of many artists in it might be utilized in a broad repertory it is a pity that so open a revolution and so radical a one has occurred. A moderate amount of provision and tact might have prevented it, had those qualities been exercised carefully in the arrangements for the past three seasons. After the promulgation of its decision as to the change of policy at the opera house, the direction promptly abandoned all intentions and pledges as to the repertory's reinforcement, and devoted the rest of the season to Wagnerian opera and music drama; with, naturally, an immediate financial advantage to the house and many admirable performances of the predominating composer's works; the season mutating into another emphatically Wagnerian one.

In February Mrs. Minnie Hauk revisited the United States, singing at the Metropolitan in "Carmen" and "L'Africaine." It was stated that two new orchestras, endowed, were to be organized, one by the National Conservatory of Music, the other by a subscription which Mr. Walter Damrosch undertook to further. (The last named appears like to be an accomplished fact.) A concert performance of considerable effectiveness of Wagner's "Parsifal" was given, Anton Seidl directing, at the Metropolitan Opera House, the like being done later in the spring in Brooklyn. The meeting was called to found a social musical club. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society decided to discontinue the concerts from the orchestra known by its name, and for the season of 1891-2 to hire the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its winter's course of entertainments—a wise move.

In March the farewell performances of grand opera in German at the Metropolitan continued, with large audiences and much enthusiasm—the usual Wagnerian partial cyclus being taken up. Gounod's "Redemption" was revived under Mr. Wiske in Brooklyn. The complete occupancy of the new Music Hall by the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society was prefaced by the completion of Recital Hall, the smaller auditorium in the edifice. The rehearsals for the dedication festival were continued with the Oratorio Society's chorus this month very actively. Mr. Bernhard Listemann and his chamber music club visited New York for the first time. With the last week of March came the usual Easter music of the city's churches, elaborate, good, bad and indifferent, but nearly always pretentious.

In April came the concluding concerts in the serial ones of the winter. Arthur Friedheim, the pianist, made his first appearance in America. A great quantity of piano recitals came with the month. Among the pianists thus occupied before the public were Mr. De Pachmann, Mr. Friedheim, Mr. Ansorge, Mr. Rummel, Mr. Scharwenka, A. Victor Benham and others. A testimonial benefit of an operatic sort was tendered Mr. Edmund C. Stanton of the Metropolitan Opera House. The Lenox Lyceum's popular Sunday night concerts ended with much success. Maximillian Vogrich's oratorio, "The Captivity," was produced for the first time by the Metropolitan Musical Society. The American Composers' Choral Association's and the Manuscript Society's concerts also deserve mention.

The first week in May was occupied with the opening to the city of the new Music Hall and by the dedicatory concerts given with the co-operation of the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society, with the conductorial help of Mr. Walter Damrosch and the special participation of Mr. Peter Tschaikowsky, the distinguished Russian composer, who made for this purpose his first visit to the United States. Mr. Charles Santley, the famous English baritone, was heard in a single concert, he happening to pass through New York on returning to England. "Apollo," a new light opera, music by Helmesberger, began a presumptively long run at the Casino, and sundry other operettas are now brought forward for the spring and summer.

Such is a very brief outline of what has been noteworthy in the season, chiefly outside of the regular current of events. In activity and in interests, if of a somewhat different nature, the coming season is expected to exceed considerably its predecessor, and it can easily achieve that honor.

[156]

[illegible] EXPRESS. Buffalo, N. Y.

[illegible] 26

THE CLOSING CONCERTS

JOSEPH KRUG'S "KING ROTHER."

The Children's Chorus—The Last Concert—Mr. Dippel—Mr. Lund Deservedly Complimented—Five Per Cent. Required from Guarantee Fund.

The last two concerts of the festival were given Saturday afternoon and evening, large audiences being in attendance, although that of the afternoon being the larger of the two.

The matinee was opened with the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and in no selection was the famous orchestra heard to better advantage. The beautiful Haendel Largo gave the audience just enough of Kneisel's solo playing to raise the question, "Why did we not have a violin solo from the well known artist." The "Euryanthe" overture concluded the orchestral numbers.

Miss Jahn delighted the audience by her rendering of "O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhaeuser," and Mr. Rieger and Mr. Bushnell each sang two short songs. Mr. Mole played a thoroughly enjoyable flute solo.

The feature of the matinee which brought many a mother, father, sister or brother, was the large children's chorus. Mr. Everett L. Baker must have worked hard to prepare the chorus to sing as well as the children did. They sang seven choruses in all, which, though well sung, were too many to place upon one program. Those singing the various solo parts, adults and childen alike, deserve praise.

The evening concert opened with Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Tasso." A composition with many beautiful musical pictures and played by the orchestra in its usual finished style.

Mr. Dippel sang for the first and only time, and in Lohengrin's narrative from the opera of that name by Wagner he displayed a beautiful tenor voice more of robusto style than one ordinarily hears. It is to be regretted that such artists as Mr. Dippel and Mr. Rummell were heard but once.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang three short songs in a charming manner, which together with those sung at a previous concert, made her one of the favorites of the festival soloists; the more so, perhaps, as not so much had been expected from her as from some others.

The festival concluded with Joseph Krug's Cantata "King Rother." It is a beautiful work, composed about two years ago, and, thanks to Mr. Lund, selected for our festival, for which it was especially translated into English and published by Schirmer, and given for the first time in this country last Saturday evening. The chorus has labored faithfully in preparing the cantata for presentation, and the efforts of Conductor Lund and those under him were crowned with unqualified success. The work is too well known, because of the description given in the papers and festival books, to need further comment upon its merits save to say that like the majority of similar works, it cannot be thoroughly understood nor appreciated at one hearing, but improves and new beauties come to the surface the more one studies it and the oftener it is heard. Miss De Vere made a beautiful Oda, and sang her part in a most praiseworthy manner. Mr. Bushnell made a capital Rother, singing with that manly dash and spirit so essential to the part. Mr. Sheehan did justice to the short solo allotted to him as Emperor, and Miss Phillipbar's voice rang out sharp and clear in the Herald's short solo. Well did Mr. Lund deserve the laurel wreath and beautiful floral design presented to him when he first mounted the conductor's stand to begin the cantata, for he has "worked like a Trojan," and has again proved himself a thoroughly capable musician and director.

Thus closed the fifth Musical Festival given by the Buffalo Musical Association, for the success of which none of its members have worked harder, perhaps not so hard, as Mr. Hobart Weed. The Association most certainly has the thanks of all musicians and music loving citizens, the one regret being that the receipts did not equal the expenses, though it might be worse as, we understand, but five per cent. of the guarantee fund will be required. At any rate the festival was a grand and unquestionable artistic success.

ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1891

The first night of the Music Hall promenade concerts on Monday will be a very fashionable event. The grand orchestra of fifty pieces will be under the lead of Mr. Timothie Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg. These concerts, which were much missed last summer, will doubtless be even more popular than in past seasons. They have never had so strong a society pull as they will have this year, and all of "Boston's best" who are within an hour of town in the summer will be often seen enjoying summer drinks and social talk as they listen to popular music in Music Hall, while to visitors and stay-at-homes they are a real blessing.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1891.

A May festival of unusual proportions was held in Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Commercial Club, an organization embracing some 1,500 of the leading citizens of Louisville. The festival extended over five days, and was carried on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by a chorus of 250 voices, formed three months ago by the club, with the assistance, as soloists, of Mrs. Nikisch, Fräulein Jahn, Miss De Vere and Messrs. Mockridge and Ludwig. "Elijah" and Dvorak's Stabat Mater were the choral works performed. The brilliant success of the festival, which closed last Saturday, proves that a lively appreciation of good music is not confined to the East. The Louisville Commercial Club, however, is entitled to the credit of having planned the affair, and having borne it to a prosperous termination.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 31.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

To morrow evening the summer concerts at Music Hall are to begin, and will continue until further notice. An orchestra of fifty performers, consisting of members of the Symphony Orchestra, and led by Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg, will be heard in popular programmes, assisted by able soloists. The price of admission is almost nominal, and there can be no doubt that there is a season of success for the enterprise and of pleasing and welcome entertainment for the public.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 31, 1891.

REVIVAL OF THE "POPS" AT MUSIC HALL.

The hosts of Bostonians who last season missed the Promenade concerts in Music hall are rejoicing that this delightful source of pleasure is not to be wanting this season. Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of Music hall, has arranged for a series of concerts to continue for six weeks, commencing tomorrow evening at popular prices. There will be popular programmes (including the composers' nights), able soloists, fine floral displays, light refreshments,—in fact, all the attractive features which the management provided in past seasons. Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Mr. Eugen Grunberg, both popular members of the Symphony orchestra, will be the conductors. The orchestra will consist of fifty members. The "Pops" will be given a generous reception.

For tomorrow evening, the opening night, the following varied programme will be given:

March, "Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Wiener Blut".....Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Largo.....Haendel
Allegro and intermezzo from the Suite in F.....Moszkowski
Loin du Bal.....Gillet
Polonaise.....Liszt
Waltz, "Pesther".....Lanner
Graceful dance.....Sullivan
Polka Mazourka, "Woman's Heart".....Strauss
March, "Hoch Habsburg".....Kral

Courier-Journal.

SUNDAY.....MAY 17, 1891

THE FESTIVAL CLOSED.

The Grand "Elijah" Oratorio Rendered By Orchestra and Chorus.

Successful Termination of the Series of Concerts—Mr. Shackleton Pleasantly Remembered.

There was a splendid audience at the Auditorium last night to hear Elijah given by the Boston orchestra and the local chorus. It was the largest house of the week, excepting, perhaps, that of Friday night, and the rendition of the orchestra was in every way worthy of the audience and the ready and warm applause with which each number was greeted.

It would scarcely be fair to say that the work of the chorus and orchestra was superior to that of Friday night, but it was more impressive and stirring, owing to the nature of the music, which affords greater range of interpretation than the Stahat Mater. The soloists were particularly effective; Mr. Ludwig, as Elijah, was almost ideal, and the contralto solos found beautiful expression through the rich and sympathetic voice of Miss Edmonds. Mr. Mockridge has been ill, but was in better voice last night than on Friday, and he sang with taste and feeling. The principal soprano part was admirably taken by Miss De Vere, whose voice was heard to good advantage in the recitative and quartets, and in the long air beginning "Hear, ye Israel." Too much can not be said in praise of Mr. Ludwig's Elijah. His splendid, deeply resonant bass is peculiarly adapted to the part, and there is a classic dignity in his interpretation, a power and pathos that makes his impersonation rarely effective. He was at his best in the two airs, "It is Enough," and "O Lord, I have Labored in Vain," which were full of a passionate indignation and despair that admirably bore out the spirit of the music. Quite different in effect, but equally beautiful in its way, was the short air, "Night Falleth Around Me," immediately following the incomparable contralto solo, "Rest in the Lord." This solo, as sung by Miss Edmonds, was in itself worth the price of the concert.

The double quartet was very beautifully sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. H. A. Cottell, Miss Emma Elliott, Mrs. C. H. Shackleton, Messrs. T. Grant Slaughter, Walter Hughes, Lewis Williams and Frank Seiler, who also sang the incidental solos of the choral numbers.

The work of the chorus was so good that it is difficult to say where it was best. In power it rose always to the demands of the music; in shading and unity of attack it was above reproach, and in the climaxes it was finely sustained against the full power of the orchestra. The public, which has from the first been so skeptical in regard to the chorus and its possible achievements, are ready to admit that it is a tremendous success, and the unanimous expression of opinion is to the effect that it should not be allowed to disband. Of course, much of the success is due to the splendid support of the orchestra and the ability and magnetism of the conductor, but the thing would have been impossible but for the patient and intelligent labor of Mr. Shackleton—A labor in which there is a tremendous expenditure of energy for a very small return of glory.

There was a very handsome expression last night of the appreciation of the public, and the members of the chorus for the work he has done. During the brief interval between the first and second parts of the oratoris there was a call for "Shackelton" from various parts of the Auditorium and the stage, and after a time Mr. Shackelton was drawn forward by Mr. Nikisch, and in a few brief sentences expressed his gratification at the appreciation of the public for his work, and thanked the Commercial Club and the chorus for making it possible. When he retired he was again called forward and presented with a superb silver clock, from the store of Rodgers & Pottinger, by Mr. T. Grant Slaughter, in the name of the chorus. It was an occasion of great good feeling all round, and Mr. Shackelton was so overwhelmed by this substantial evidence of it, that he could only bow his acknowledgements.

The music then went on with more spirit and enthusiasm than before. The two choral numbers which stand out most prominently in the remembrance of the performance, are the storm chorus at the close of the first part and "Behold God, the Lord, passed by," which was exquisite in shading and altogether beautiful in effect. The trio for angels, "Lift Thine Eyes," which was sung by Miss De Vere, Miss Edmonds and Mrs. Shackelton, was admirably sung, and was one of the most beautiful numbers of the week.

[157]

COMMERCIAL-ADVERTISER. Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 20

THE CLOSING CONCERTS

JOSEPH KRUG'S "KING ROTHER."

The Children's Chorus—The Last Concert—Mr. Dippel—Mr. Lund Deservedly Complimented—Five Per Cent. Required from Guarantee Fund.

The last two concerts of the festival were given Saturday afternoon and evening, large audiences being in attendance, although that of the afternoon being the larger of the two.

The matinee was opened with the Paris version of the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and in no selection was the famous orchestra heard to better advantage. The beautiful Haendel Largo gave the audience just enough of Kneisel's solo playing to raise the question, "Why did we not have a violin solo from the well known artist." The "Euryanthe" overture concluded the orchestral numbers.

Miss Jahn delighted the audience by her rendering of "O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhaeuser," and Mr. Rieger and Mr. Bushnell each sang two short songs. Mr. Mole played a thoroughly enjoyable flute solo.

The feature of the matinee which brought many a mother, father, sister or brother, was the large children's chorus. Mr. Everett L. Baker must have worked hard to prepare the chorus to sing as well as the children did. They sang seven choruses in all, which, though well sung, were too many to place upon one program. Those singing the various solo parts, adults and childen alike, deserve praise.

The evening concert opened with Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Tasso." A composition with many beautiful musical pictures and played by the orchestra in its usual finished style.

Mr. Dippel sang for the first and only time, and in Lohengrin's narrative from the opera of that name by Wagner he displayed a beautiful tenor voice more of robusto style than one ordinarily hears. It is to be regretted that such artists as Mr. Dippel and Mr. Rummell were heard but once.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch sang three short songs in a charming manner, which together with those sung at a previous concert, made her one of the favorites of the festival soloists; the more so, perhaps, as not so much had been expected from her as from some others.

The festival concluded with Joseph Krug's Cantata "King Rother." It is a beautiful work, composed about two years ago, and, thanks to Mr. Lund, selected for our festival, for which it was especially translated into English and published by Schirmer, and given for the first time in this country last Saturday evening. The chorus has labored faithfully in preparing the cantata for presentation, and the efforts of Conductor Lund and those under him were crowned with unqualified success. The work is too well known, because of the description given in the papers and festival books, to need further comment upon its merits save to say that like the majority of similar works, it cannot be thoroughly understood nor appreciated at one hearing, but improves and new beauties come to the surface the more one studies it and the oftener it is heard. Miss De Vere made a beautiful Oda, and sang her part in a most praiseworthy manner. Mr. Bushnell made a capital Rother, singing with that manly dash and spirit so essential to the part. Mr. Sheehan did justice to the short solo allotted to him as Emperor, and Miss Phillipbar's voice rang out sharp and clear in the Herald's short solo. Well did Mr. Lund deserve the laurel wreath and beautiful floral design presented to him when he first mounted the conductor's stand to begin the cantata, for he has "worked like a Trojan," and has again proved himself a thoroughly capable musician and director.

Thus closed the fifth Musical Festival given by the Buffalo Musical Association, for the success of which none of its members have worked harder, perhaps not so hard, as Mr. Hobart Weed. The Association most certainly has the thanks of all musicians and music loving citizens, the one regret being that the receipts did not equal the expenses, though it might be worse as, we understand, but five per cent. of the guarantee fund will be required. At any rate the festival was a grand and unquestionable artistic success.

...ON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1891

The first night of the Music Hall promenade concerts on Monday will be a very fashionable event. The grand orchestra of fifty pieces will be under the lead of Mr. Timothie Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg. These concerts, which were much missed last summer, will doubtless be even more popular than in past seasons. They have never had so strong a society pull as they will have this year, and all of "Boston's best" who are within an hour of town in the summer will be often seen enjoying summer drinks and social talk as they listen to popular music in Music Hall, while to visitors and stay-at-homes they are a real blessing.

[157]

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1891.

A May festival of unusual proportions was held in Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Commercial Club, an organization embracing some 1,500 of the leading citizens of Louisville. The festival extended over five days, and was carried on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by a chorus of 250 voices, formed three months ago by the club, with the assistance, as soloists, of Mrs. Nikisch, Fräulein Jahn, Miss De Vere and Messrs. Mockridge and Ludwig. "Elijah" and Dvorak's Stabat Mater were the choral works performed. The brilliant success of the festival, which closed last Saturday, proves that a lively appreciation of good music is not confined to the East. The Louisville Commercial Club, however, is entitled to the credit of having planned the affair, and having borne it to a prosperous termination.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 31.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

To morrow evening the summer concerts at Music Hall are to begin, and will continue until further notice. An orchestra of fifty performers, consisting of members of the Symphony Orchestra, and led by Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg, will be heard in popular programmes, assisted by able soloists. The price of admission is almost nominal, and there can be no doubt that there is a season of success for the enterprise and of pleasing and welcome entertainment for the public.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 31, 1891.

REVIVAL OF THE "POPS" AT MUSIC HALL.

The hosts of Bostonians who last season missed the Promenade concerts in Music hall are rejoicing that this delightful source of pleasure is not to be wanting this season. Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of Music hall, has arranged for a series of concerts to continue for six weeks, commencing tomorrow evening at popular prices. There will be popular programmes (including the composers' nights), able soloists, fine floral displays, light refreshments,—in fact, all the attractive features which the management provided in past seasons. Mr. Timothée Adamowski and Mr. Eugen Grunberg, both popular members of the Symphony orchestra, will be the conductors. The orchestra will consist of fifty members. The "Pops" will be given a generous reception.

For tomorrow evening, the opening night, the following varied programme will be given:

March, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz, "Wiener Blut" ..... Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus" ..... Offenbach
Largo ..... Haendel
Allegro and intermezzo from the Suite in F ..... Moszkowski
Loin du Bal ..... Gillet
Polonaise ..... Liszt
Waltz, "Pesther" ..... Lanner
Graceful dance ..... Sullivan
Polka Mazourka, "Woman's Heart" ..... Strauss
March, "Hoch Habsburg" ..... Kral

Courier-Journal.

SUNDAY.....MAY 17, 1891

THE FESTIVAL CLOSED.

The Grand "Elijah" Oratorio Rendered By Orchestra and Chorus.

Successful Termination of the Series of Concerts—Mr. Shackleton Pleasantly Remembered.

There was a splendid audience at the Auditorium last night to hear Elijah given by the Boston orchestra and the local chorus. It was the largest house of the week, excepting, perhaps, that of Friday night, and the rendition of the orchestra was in every way worthy of the audience and the ready and warm applause with which each number was greeted.

It would scarcely be fair to say that the work of the chorus and orchestra was superior to that of Friday night, but it was more impressive and stirring, owing to the nature of the music, which affords greater range of interpretation than the Stahat Mater. The soloists were particularly effective; Mr. Ludwig, as Elijah, was almost ideal, and the contralto solos found beautiful expression through the rich and sympathetic voice of Miss Edmonds. Mr. Mockridge has been ill, but was in better voice last night than on Friday, and he sang with taste and feeling. The principal soprano part was admirably taken by Miss De Vere, whose voice was heard to good advantage in the recitative and quartets, and in the long air beginning "Hear, ye Israel." Too much can not be said in praise of Mr. Ludwig's Elijah. His splendid, deeply resonant bass is peculiarly adapted to the part, and there is a classic dignity in his interpretation, a power and pathos that makes his impersonation rarely effective. He was at his best in the two airs, "It is Enough," and "O Lord, I have Labored in Vain," which were full of a passionate indignation and despair that admirably bore out the spirit of the music. Quite different in effect, but equally beautiful in its way, was the short air, "Night Falleth Around Me," immediately following the incomparable contralto solo, "Rest in the Lord." This solo, as sung by Miss Edmonds, was in itself worth the price of the concert.

The double quartet was very beautifully sung by Miss Katie Elliott, Mrs. H. A. Cottell, Miss Emma Elliott, Mrs. C. H. Shackleton, Messrs. T. Grant Slaughter, Walter Hughes, Lewis Williams and Frank Seiler, who also sang the incidental solos of the choral numbers.

The work of the chorus was so good that it is difficult to say where it was best. In power it rose always to the demands of the music; in shading and unity of attack it was above reproach, and in the climaxes it was finely sustained against the full power of the orchestra. The public, which has from the first been so skeptical in regard to the chorus and its possible achievements, are ready to admit that it is a tremendous success, and the unanimous expression of opinion is to the effect that it should not be allowed to disband. Of course, much of the success is due to the splendid support of the orchestra and the ability and magnetism of the conductor, but the thing would have been impossible but for the patient and intelligent labor of Mr. Shackleton—A labor in which there is a tremendous expenditure of energy for a very small return of glory.

There was a very handsome expression last night of the appreciation of the public, and the members of the chorus for the work he has done. During the brief interval between the first and second parts of the oratoris there was a call for "Shackelton" from various parts of the Auditorium and the stage, and after a time Mr. Shackelton was drawn forward by Mr. Nikisch, and in a few brief sentences expressed his gratification at the appreciation of the public for his work, and thanked the Commercial Club and the chorus for making it possible. When he retired he was again called forward and presented with a superb silver clock, from the store of Rodgers & Pottinger, by Mr. T. Grant Slaughter, in the name of the chorus. It was an occasion of great good feeling all round, and Mr. Shackelton was so overwhelmed by this substantial evidence of it, that he could only bow his acknowledgements.

The music then went on with more spirit and enthusiasm than before. The two choral numbers which stand out most prominently in the remembrance of the performance, are the storm chorus at the close of the first part and "Behold God, the Lord, passed by," which was exquisite in shading and altogether beautiful in effect. The trio for angels, "Lift Thine Eyes," which was sung by Miss De Vere, Miss Edmonds and Mrs. Shackelton, was admirably sung, and was one of the most beautiful numbers of the week.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia.

Monday Evening, April 27, at 8.

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Concordia Opera House, Baltimore,

Tuesday Evening, April 28, at 8.

PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Lincoln Music Hall, - Washington.

Wednesday Evening, April 29, at 8.

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

OLD CITY HALL, PITTSBURG.

Thursday Evening, April 30. Friday Evening, May 1.

TWO GRAND CONCERTS BY THE MOZART CLUB.

Mr. JAS. P. McCOLLUM, Conductor.

AND THE

PROGRAMME

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
Mrs. GENEVRA JOHNSTONE-BISHOP.
Miss LENA LITTLE.
Mr. PAUL ZIMMERMAN.
Dr. CARL MARTIN.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[158]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.

PROGRAMME

C A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

COLORED PAPER

STAR COURSE

[159]

University Hall, - Ann Arbor, Mich.

Tuesday Evening, May 5, at 8.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF

THE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

CHORAL UNION SERIES.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR OF THE

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Central Music Hall, - - Chicago,

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 7, at 8.
FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 8, at 8.
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 9, at 2.

PROGRAMME

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
Miss MARY HOWE.
Miss LENA LITTLE.
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

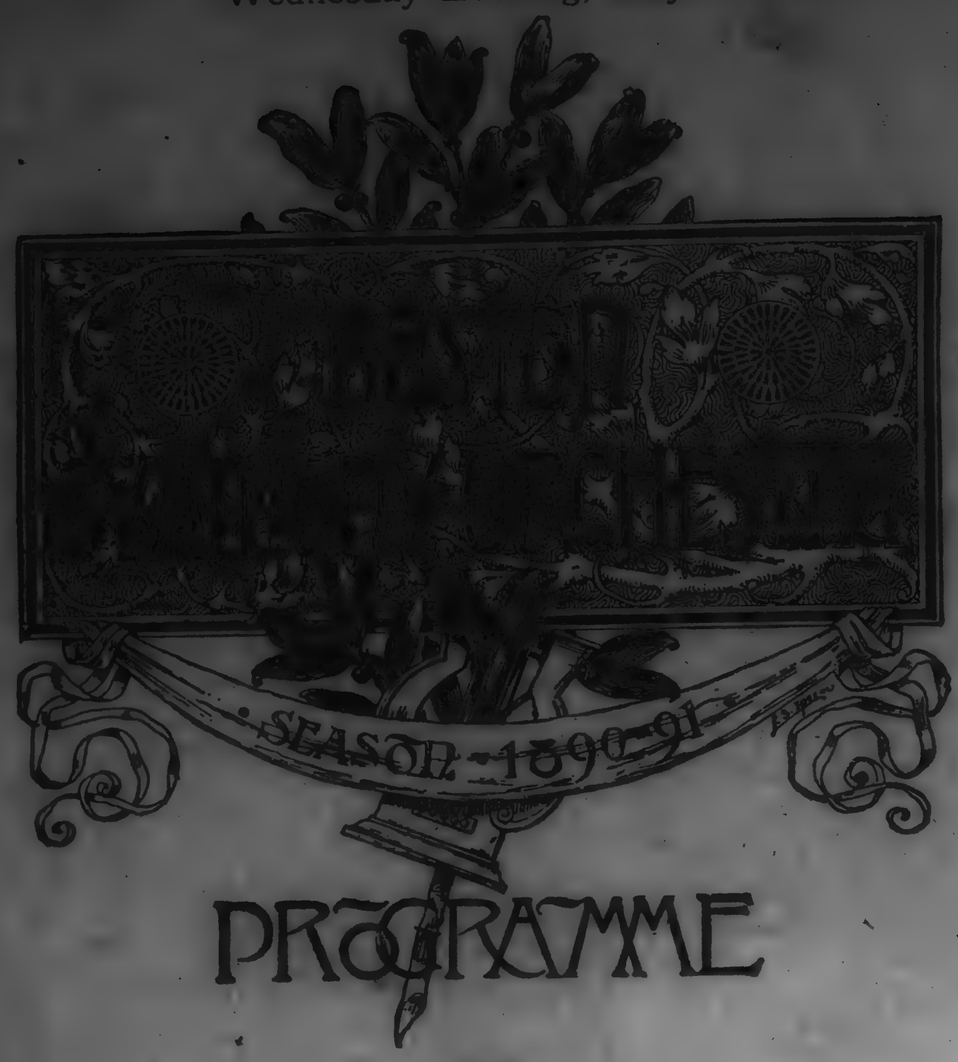
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall, on and after Wednesday, April 29.

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.



PROGRAMME

C A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

University Hall, - Ann Arbor, Mich.

Tuesday Evening, May 5, at 8.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF

THE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

CHORAL UNION SERIES.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR OF THE

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

SEASON 1891-92.

THE · CLEVELAND

STAR COURSE.

MR. & MRS. N. COE STEWART, Managers.

15 ∴ MAGNIFICENT ∴ 15
EVENING ENTERTAINMENTS.

15—OF THE GRANDEST—15

Concerts, Lectures, Readings, Etc.,

By the most noted Concert Organizations, Celebrated Artists and Universal Platform Favorites for

ONE DOLLAR AND FIFTY CENTS,

OR AN AVERAGE PRICE OF

TEN CENTS FOR EACH ENTERTAINMENT.

The General Admission to each Entertainment for those not having Season Tickets will be 50 cents, 75 cents and $1.00.

A Prospectus, stating attractions and dates, will be ready in September. Those wishing to have it mailed to them may address the managers.

Clark-Britton Ptg. Co., Cleveland, O.

FIFTH ANNUAL TOUR.

Central Music Hall, - - Chicago,

THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 7, at 8.
FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 8, at 8.
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 9, at 2.

PROGRAMME

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
Miss MARY HOWE.
Miss LENA LITTLE.
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

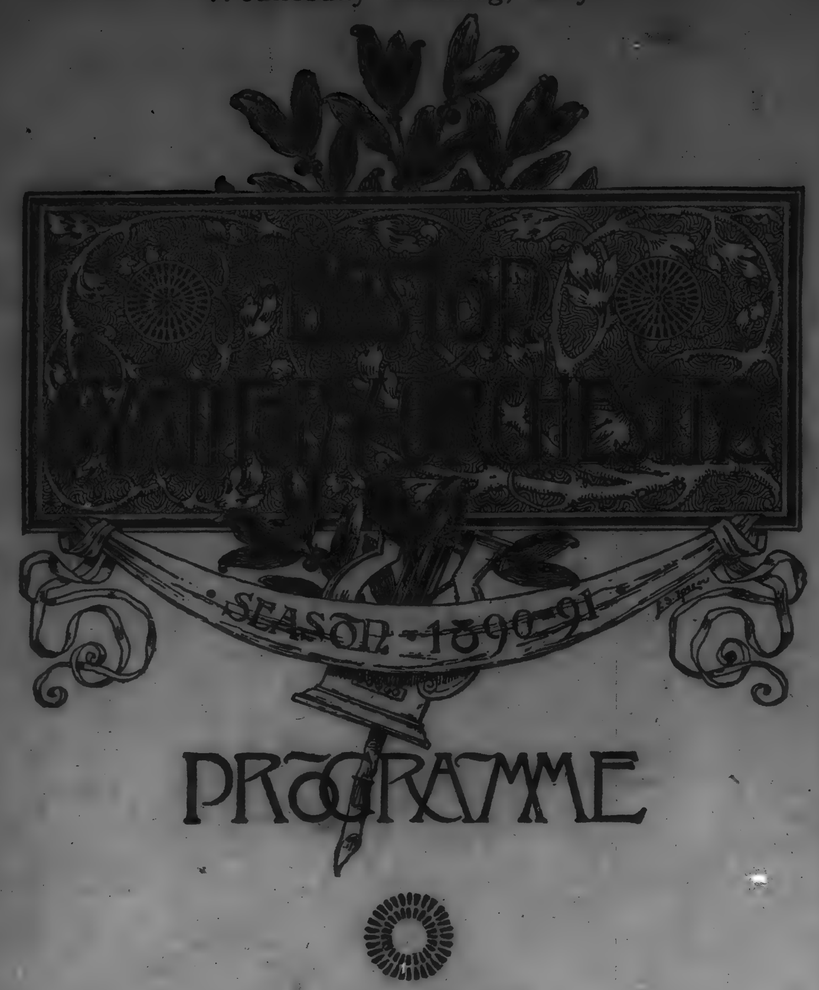
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall, on and after Wednesday, April 29.

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.



PROGRAMME

C A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

University Hall, - A

Tuesday Evening,

UNDER THE AU

THE UNIVERSITY M

CHORAL UNIO

FIFTH ANNUAL T

PROGRA

C. A. ELLIS,

F. R. COMEE, Assi

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MUSIC HALL,

CLEVELAND.

SEASON OF 1890-91.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, - - - - Conductor.

Saturday Evening, May 2, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

Weber . . . . . Overture, "Oberon"

Maillard . . . . . Aria from "Les Dragons des Villars"

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Grieg . . . . . Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46

"Daybreak."

"The Death of Aase."

"Anitra's Dance."

"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."

(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.

PROGRAMME CONTINUED ON PAGE FIVE.)

Everything New in Photography!

KODAKS

All . sizes, . including . the . new . 5x7 . folding . Kodak.

THE KAMARET,

The . very . latest . detective . Camera.

FOWLER & SLATER,

8 EUCLID AVENUE,

PHONE 2369. TAKE ELEVATOR.

J. F. & F. H. WENDT,

Real Estate Dealers and Brokers.

Property Rented and Rents Collected.

Room 351 The Arcade, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

FIRE INSURANCE PLACED IN FIRST-CLASS COMPANIES.

Visit

MADAM PEAL'S

HAIR DYEING, SHAMPOOING AND BLEACHING

PARLORS.

The Latest Eastern Style in Hair and Bang Cutting.

145 ARCADE, EUCLID AVE. ENTRANCE.

MANICURING A SPECIALTY.

COMPARE PRICES ON FINE
MILLINERY.

We have the most complete and magnificent stock of Millinery in the city, and prices positively the lowest. Ladies should not fail to call on us before purchasing your Spring or Summer Bonnet; we can save you money.

RICE'S MILLINERY

13 Woodland Ave.,

Near Central Market. Open Evenings.

FIFTH ANNUAL

Central Music Hall,

THURSDAY EVENING,
FRIDAY EVENING, M
SATURDAY AFTERNOON

PROGRA

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
Miss MARY HOWE.
Miss LENA LITT
Mr. F

C. A. ELLIS, Mana
F. R. COMEE, Assistant

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall on and

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.

PROGRAMME

C A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

University Hall, - A

Tuesday Evening,

UNDER THE AUS

THE UNIVERSITY M

CHORAL UNION

FIFTH ANNUAL TO

PROGRA

C. A. ELLIS,

F. R. COMEE, Assi

KNABE PIANOS. THE B. Dreher's Son's Co.

WE have been appointed the exclusive representatives throughout Northern Ohio for this celebrated piano. No piano is as fine in tone, style, action, case and finish. See our large display and buy no piano before. You can exchange your old square or cheap upright as part pay on a new Knabe Piano in Oak, Mahogany, Ebony, Birch, Walnut or Rosewood case. Great artists use and recommend the Knabe Pianos.

371-373 SUPERIOR ST. ARCADE B'LD'G.

Gen'l Agents FOR KNABE Pianos.

The B. Dreher's Sons Co. Gen'l Agents for KNABE, HAINES, DREHER, STERLING AND ALBRECHT PIANOS AND Sterling Organs.

OUR Store is the only place where the Knabe Piano is sold in this city, and parties in Portage, Cuyahoga, Summit, Stark, Medina, Ashtabula, Lake, Lorain, Erie, Geauga, Wayne, Ashland and Holmes counties can get full particulars regarding prices and terms by writing us for free catalogues, or our traveling agent will call on you.

OUR leading piano is the Knabe, and the enormous purchase recently enables us to offer special inducements to those who want a Strictly Standard Piano, without any equal in the world. Did you ever try the action in the Knabe Piano? It's wonderful!

LARGEST PIANO AND ORGAN House in Cleveland. SOLD FOR CASH OR PAYMENTS.

MANUFACTURED BY KNABE

PROGRAMME CONTINUED.

Saint-Saens . . . . . Rondo Capriccioso for Violin
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. C. K. Rogers . . . . . "Kiss my Eyelids" (with violin obligato)
b. Gade . . . . . "The Goldsmith"
c. O. Weil . . . . . "Roses" (with violin obligato)
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

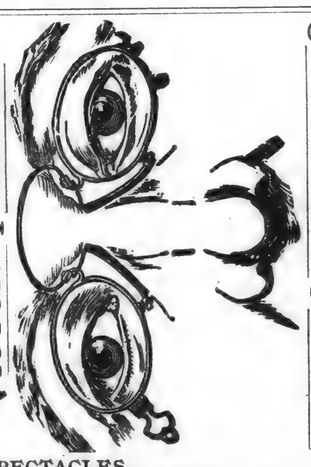
Schumann . . . . . Symphony No. 1
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Molto vivace.
Allegro animate grazioso.

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH. MR. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI.

KNABE PIANOS ARE USED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

VICTOR THRANE. OPHTHALMIC OPTICIAN.



SPECTACLES, EYE GLASSES, OPERA GLASSES And All Kinds of OPTICAL GOODS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The great progress in Optics the past few years has stimulated the necessity of establishing colleges for its study. Mr. Thrane, appreciating this fact, availed himself of this opportunity, and is now the ONLY graduate of the celebrated Chicago Ophthalmic College in this city. Special attention to fitting children and difficult cases.

No. 53 New Arcade Building.

The • Cleanfast • Hosiery • Co.,

57 EUCLID AVE.

The Cleanfast Black Stockings are the only stocking in the world that will positively not stain the feet or underclothing.

Perspiration will not turn them green or affect them in any way.

Specialties in spun silk, silk-plated and pure silk, at the very lowest prices; and Boys' Rib and Bicycle Stockings, also darning cotton of our dye.

The Cleanfast Black Stockings can be had only at our branch.

THE CLEANFAST HOSIERY CO.,

57 Euclid Ave., CLEVELAND, O.

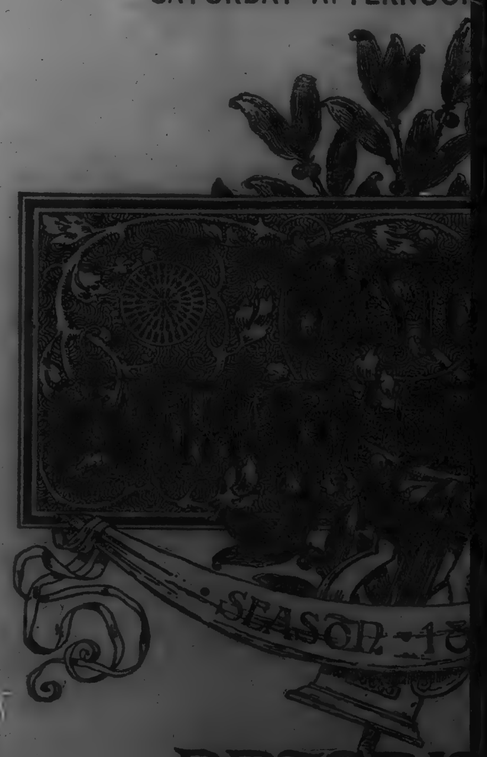
FIFTH ANNUAL

Central Music Hall,

THURSDAY EVENING,

FRIDAY EVENING, M

SATURDAY AFTERNOON



PROGRA

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Miss MARY HOWE.

Miss LENA LIT

Mr. F

C. A. ELLIS, Ma

F. R. COMEE, Assistan

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall, on

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.

PROGRAMME

C A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

University Hall, - A

Tuesday Evening,

UNDER THE AUS

THE UNIVERSITY M

CHORAL UNION

FIFTH ANNUAL TO

PROGRA

C. A. ELLIS,

F. R. COMEE, Assi

. . . THE . . .

FOLLOWING ATTRACTIONS

HAVE APPEARED IN THE

STAR · COURSE.

A FEW OF THE EMINENT SOLOISTS ARE MENTIONED.

ALFRED DESEVE.
CARL HILD.
OVIDE MUSIN.
HARRY DIMOND.
GLENN HALL.
RICHARD ARNOLD.
ALICE MAY ESTEY.
ANNA LOUISE TANNER.
PAULINE MONTEGRIFFO.
AUGUSTA OHRSTROM.
ARMINE PARK.
SENORA DE ORS.
LOUISE BALDWIN POWERS.
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
MADAME ROSE LINDE.
MADAME HELEN HASTREITER.

AND MANY OTHERS.

CONCERT COMPANIES.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAL CLUB.
MUSIN CONCERT CO.
VALDA CONCERT CO.
WEBER CONCERT CO.
NEW YORK SYMPHONY CLUB.
HILD-PARK CONCERT CO.
NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC CLUB.
BOSTON IDEAL BANJO, MANDOLIN AND GUITAR CLUB.
ODEON CLUB.
LOTUS GLEE CLUB.
HARVARD QUARTETTE.
SCHUBERT MALE QUARTETTE.
ARION QUARTETTE.
BALMORAL CHOIR.
ROYAL HAND-BELL RINGERS.
SWISS LADIES CO.

AND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
GILMORE'S BAND.
INNES N. Y. 13TH REG'T BAND.
ETC., ETC., ETC.

LECTURERS.

T. DE WITT TALMAGE—"SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL."
F. W. GUNSAULUS—"SAVONAROLA, A CHAPTER IN THE HISTORY OF LIBERTY."
RUSSELL CONWELL—"ACRES OF DIAMONDS."
GEO. R. WENDLING—"POPULAR DELUSIONS."
MRS. FRANK LESLIE—"ROYAL LEADERS OF SOCIETY."
JOHN B. DEMOTTE—"ELECTRICITY."
A. A. WILLITS—"SUNSHINE."
JAHU DE WITT MILLER—"USES OF UGLINESS.
H. H. EMMETT—"INDIAN QUESTION."
O. J. STAFFORD—"ELOQUENCE IN SHAKESPEARE."
H. H. RAGAN—"PARIS THE MAGNIFICENT." ILLUSTRATED.
ROBT McINTYRE—"SOLDIERING IN DIXIE."
JAS. HEDLEY—"SUNNY SIDE OF LIFE."
MISS MABEL JENNESS—"PHYSICAL CULTURE."
ETC., ETC., ETC.

READERS.

NELLA BROWN POND.
R. L. CUMNOCK.
LELAND T. POWERS.
MISS MINNIE MARSHALL.

WORLD-RENOWNED PIANISTS.

CHEVALIER DEKONTSKI.
XAVER SCHARWENKA.
WM. H. SHERWOOD.
CONSTANTINE STERNBERG.

Will the Star Course patrons kindly place a mark after the names of those attractions which they wish to hear another season, and mention any other attractions they may wish to hear, and send to 1364 Euclid Ave.? This will enable the management to arrange the program for next year in accordance with the wishes of the people.

DAN S. WERTHEIMER,

PUBLISHER FOR N. COE STEWART STAR COURSE.

MAKE YOUR CONTRACTS NOW FOR ADVERTISING

—IN—

OPERA PROGRAM, ...

STAR PROGRAM, ...

MUSIC HALL PROGRAM

Address

Dan S. Wertheimer,

45-46 Kendall Block,

106 EUCLID AVENUE.

J. W. SIMPSON. F. W. GOAKES.

Simpson

—AND—

Goakes,

457 THE ARCADE.

Real Estate

—AND—

Insurance.

Property bought, sold and rented.

East End Property a Specialty.

Opera House. One week only, beginning MONDAY, MAY 4, 1891.

The Hit of the Season.

The Greatest Novelty in Years.

The wonderful MIDGET ACTORS, supported by an excellent company.

THE LILIPUTIANS!

IN THEIR GRAND SPECTACULAR PLAY.

NOVEL, CLEAN, ENTERTAINING. | THE PUPIL IN MAGIC.

TWO GRAND BALLETS. More than 100 artists. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

GOOD BY, OLD FELLOW
AND DON'T FORGET TO GET SOME OF DR STORY'S FIVE MINUTE HEADACHE CURE AND TAKE WITH YOU. THEY DON'T HAVE IT IN LONDON.
10 CENTS A PACKAGE

Dr. Story's

Five Minute

Headache Cure.

10c. TEN CENTS A PACKAGE. For Sale by all Druggists. 10c.

—TRY · IT.—

TAKE NOTHING BUT DR. STORY'S.

IT WILL POSITIVELY CURE
Sick Headache in 5 minutes.
Nervous Headache in 5 minutes
Neuralgic Headache in 5 minutes.
Grip Headache in 5 minutes.

This is the Latest and Grandest Discovery known in Medical Science.

NO Antipyrine, Morphia Antifebrin, or Poisonous Drugs.

Perfectly Harmless.

OVER 90,000 of these Headache Powders used in this city in two weeks.
It has never failed to give relief instantly.
It is a Guaranteed Cure.
It is something that has Never Failed.
It is the only Headache Powder that is a Positive Cure.

FIFTH ANNUAL

Central Music Hall,

THURSDAY EVENING,
FRIDAY EVENING, M
SATURDAY AFTERNOON

PROGRA

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
Miss MARY HOWE.
Miss LENA LIT
Mr. J

C. A. ELLIS, Ma
F. R. COMEE, Assistan

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall, 20

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Monday Evening, May 4.

Wednesday Evening, May 6.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

University Hall, - A

Tuesday Evening,

UNDER THE AUSP

THE UNIVERSITY MU

CHORAL UNION

FIFTH ANNUAL TO

PROGRA

C. A. ELLIS,

F. R. COMEE, Assi

DECKER BROTHERS

THE BEST MADE . . . . .

IN THIS COUNTRY OR . . .

ELSEWHERE, ...

AND PREFERRED . . . . .

BY . . . . . .

LEADING ARTISTS. . . . . .

Theodore Thomas:—They are unsurpassed by any Piano-forte I have ever seen.

Reve King:—I prefer yours to all others, and will use no other for my concerts when I can obtain yours.

Why buy a Decker Bros.?

BECAUSE

1. Absolute evenness of touch. . . . .
2. Matchless in tone. . . . . . .
3. Incomparable in workmanship. . .
4. Improves with usage. . . . . . .
5. Most durable. . . . . . .

Kirsch, Meckel & Co.,

GENERAL AGENTS IN NORTHERN OHIO,

252-254 ERIE STREET,

NEAR EUCLID AVENUE. CLEVELAND, O.

FIFTH ANNUA

Central Music Hall,

THURSDAY EVENING,

FRIDAY EVENING, M

SATURDAY AFTERNOO

PROGRA

SOLOISTS

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Miss MARY HOWE.

Miss LENA LI

Mr.

C. A. ELLIS, Ma

F. R. COMEE, Assista

Tickets on sale at Central Music Hall, on

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 11th, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

✓ Berlioz, Overture Benvenuto Cellini
(By request.)

✓ Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

✓ Mo[illegible] Page's Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro"

✓ Tsc[illegible]

a. D[illegible]
b. W[illegible]
c. V[illegible]

✓ Wag[illegible]

✓ Wag[illegible]

✓ Wag[illegible]

Music · Festival

(Under the auspices of the Commercial Club.)

May 12th, 13th 14th, 15th and 16th.

AT AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM.

Operatic * Festival * Matinee

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 11th, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

✓ Berlioz, ... Overture Benvenuto Cellini
(By request.)

✓ Schumann, ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat

Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

[illegible] Page's Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro"

✓ Mo

✓ Tsc

a. D
b. W
c. V

✓ Wag

✓ Wag

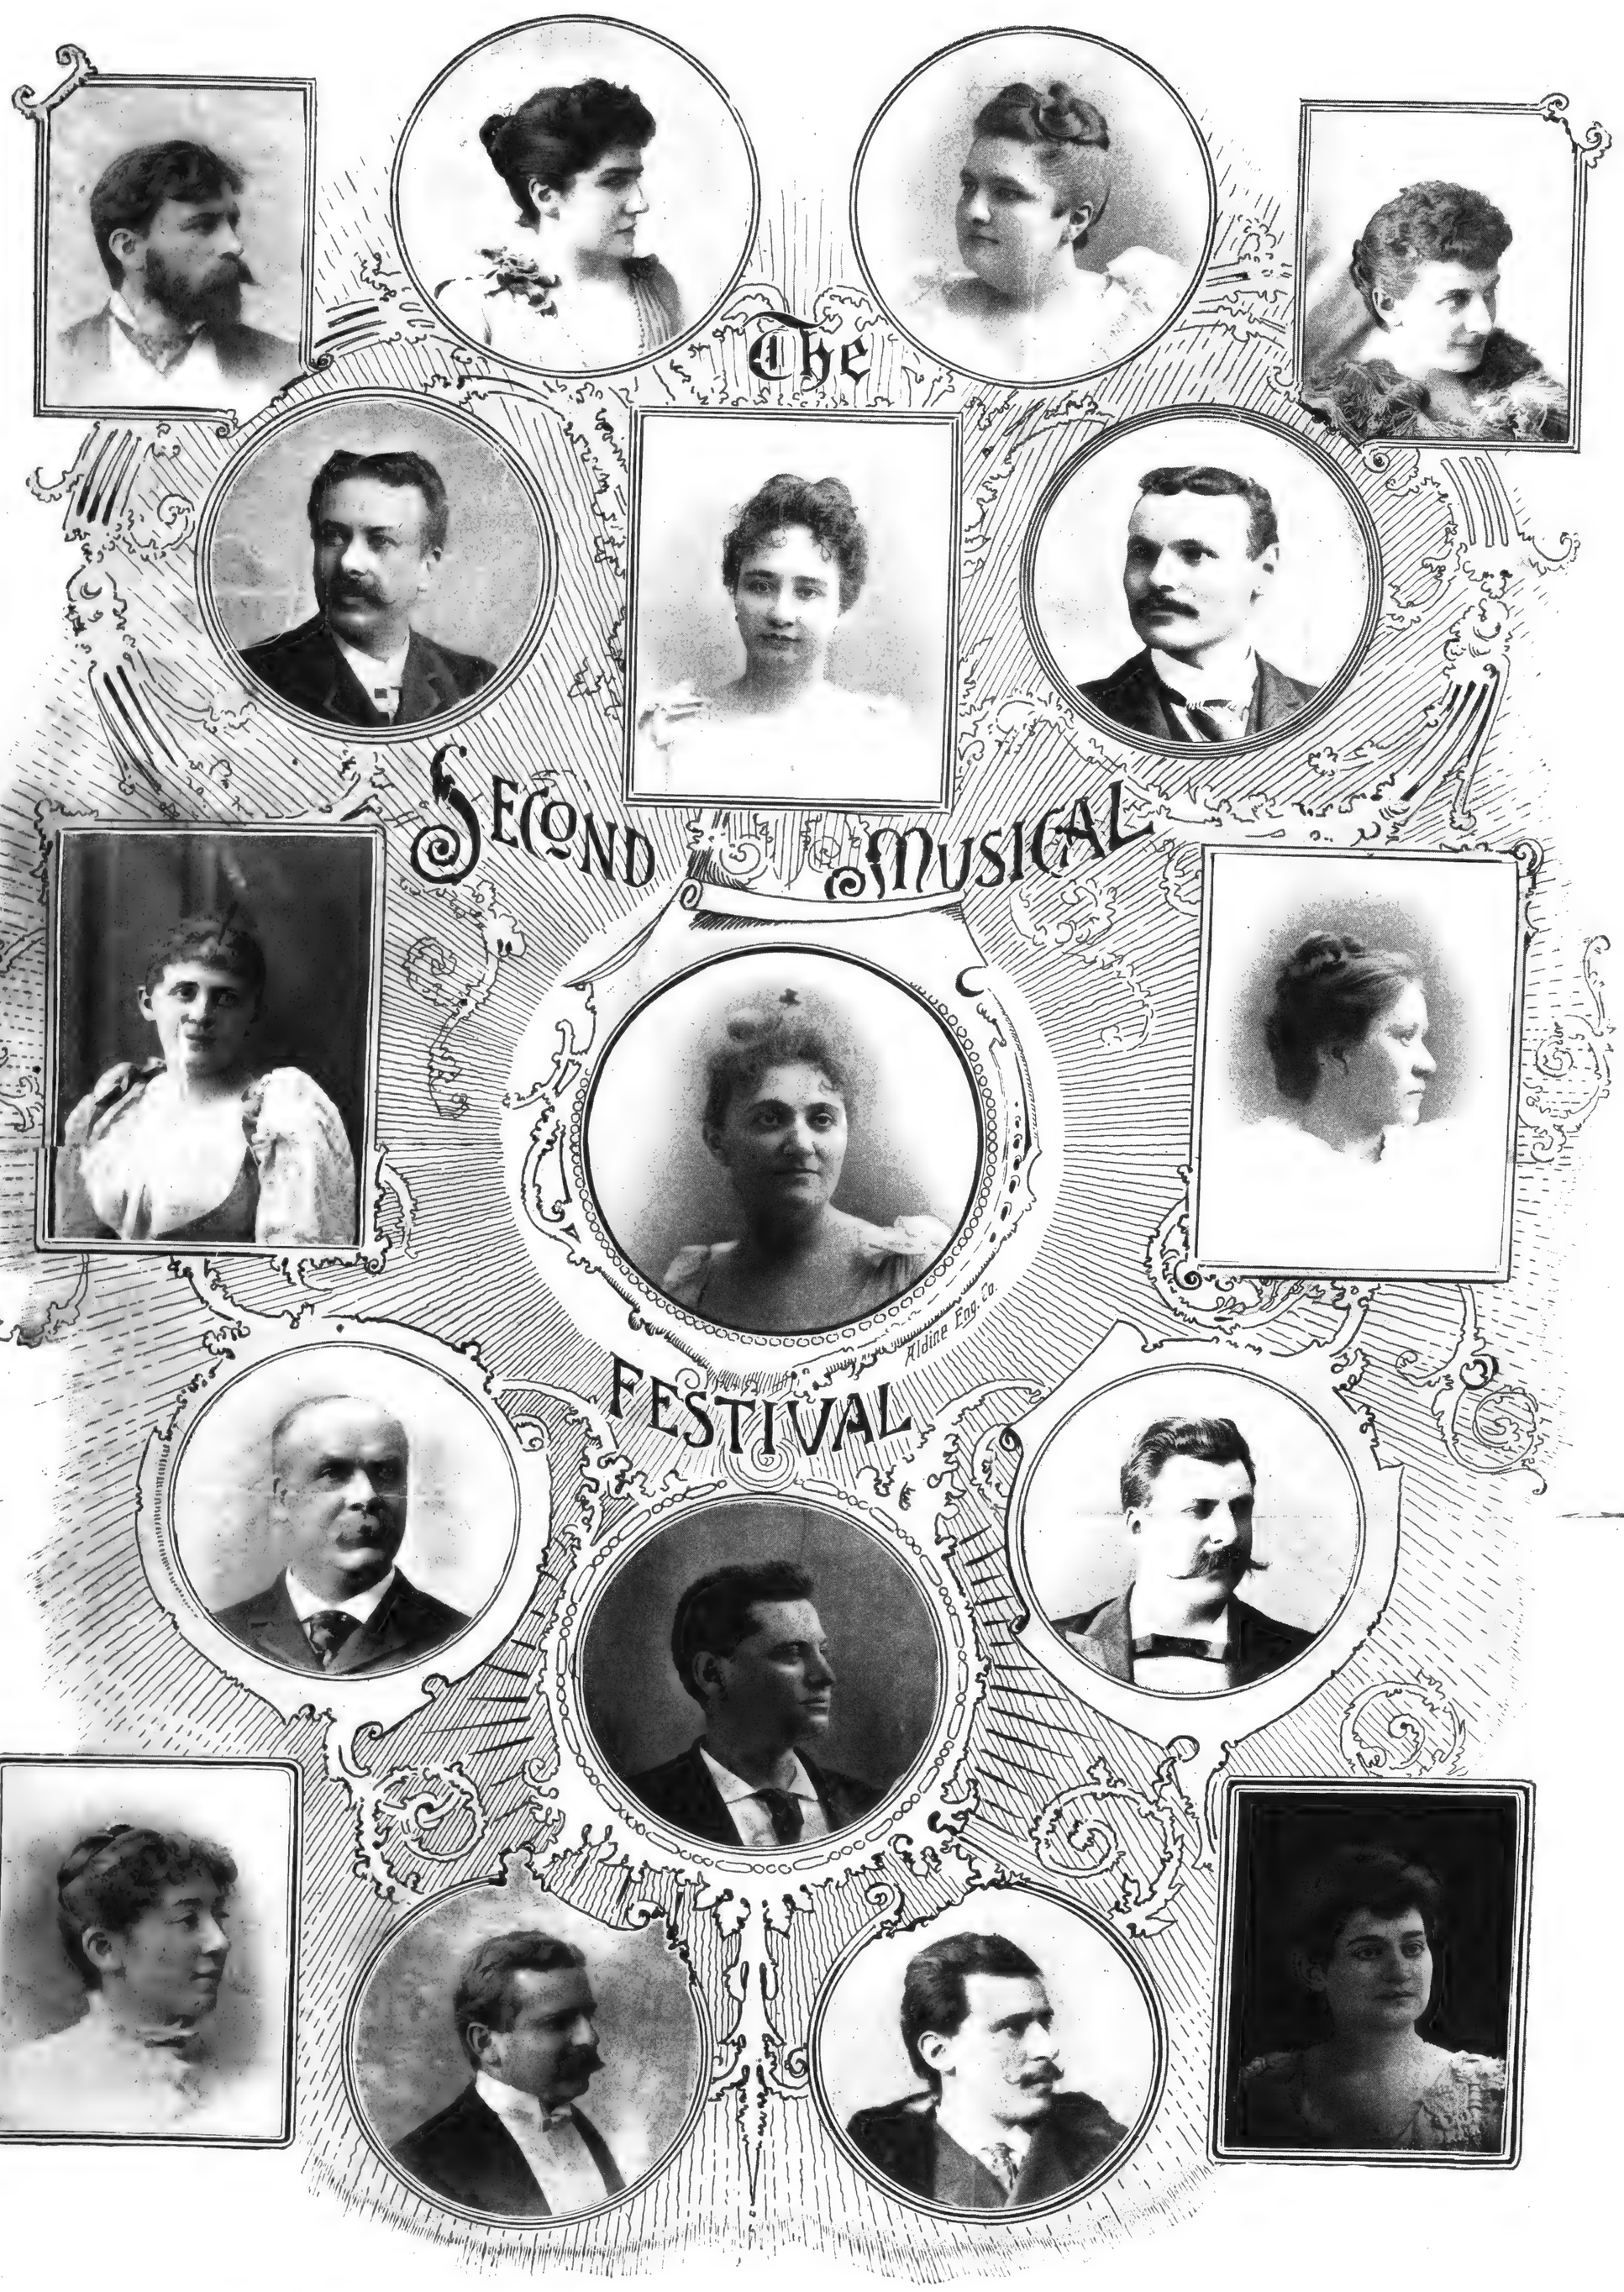
✓ Was

Music · Festival

(Under the auspices of the Commercial Club.)

May 12th, 13th 14th, 15th and 16th.

AT AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM.



Operatic * Festival * Matinee

OPERATIC FESTIVAL MATINEE

Music Hall, Saturday, April 4th, 1891

SOPRANO SOLOISTS

Clementina De Vere

Kathinka Paulsen-White

Jennie Patrick Walker

Laura M. Burnham
(Her First Appearance)

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch

CONTRALTO SOLOISTS

Clara Poole

Rosa Linde

Minna Van Buren

Gertrude Edmands

TENOR SOLOISTS

Herbert Johnson

Wilhelm G. Heinrich

C. C. Ferguson

BARITONE SOLOISTS

Guiseppe Del Puente

Guiseppe Campanari

BASS SOLOISTS

Myron W. Whitney

G. Rob Clark

INSTRUMENTALISTS

Albert Van Raalte, Violinist

B. L. Whelpley, Pianist

Frank Lynes, Organist

Mr. Arthur Nikisch
(Accompanist for Mrs. Nikisch)

MUSICAL DIRECTOR - MR. FRANK O. NASH

GRAND · ORCHESTRA · AND · OPERATIC · CHORUS

CONDUCTOR - - - MR. JOHN C. MULLALY

THE SPARRELL PRINT, 68 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON.

PROGRAM

PART ONE

OVERTURE	"Zampa" ORCHESTRA	Herold
ARIA	"Il Balen," from "Trovatore" SIG. DEL PUENTE	Verdi
ARIA	From "Herodiade" MRS. WALKER	Massenet
ARIA	"O Paradise Emerged from the Ocean," From "L'Africaine" MR. FERGUSON	Meyerbeer
PRIZE SONG	From the "Meistersingers" (Arranged for Piano, Liszt Organ and Violin by Hermann P. Chelius) MR. VAN RAALTE, MR. WHELPLEY, MR. LYNES	Wagner
"PAGE'S SONG"	From "Les Huguenots" MME. LINDE	Meyerbeer
PRAYER	From "Moses in Egypt" MRS. WALKER, MME. LINDE, MR. FERGUSON, DR. CLARK, OPERATIC CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA	Rossini

PART TWO

"M'APPARIA"	From "Martha" MR. JOHNSON	Flotow
AIR AND VARIATIONS	"Carnival of Venice" (Arranged by Jules Benedict) MISS BURNHAM (Her First Appearance)
ADAGIO	From Trio, op. 5 (Arranged for Piano and Liszt Organ) MR. WHELPLEY, MR. LYNES	Arthur Foote
ARIA	From "Aida" MLLE. DeVERE	Verdi
"TARANTELLA"	SIG. DEL PUENTE	Rossini
ARIA	a. "Vieni che poi Serano" b. "Habernara" "Carmen" MME. POOLE	Gluck Bizet

PART THREE

ARIA	"Les Dragons de Villars" MRS. NIKISCH (Accompanied by Mr. Nikisch)	Maillard
REC. ET ARIA	From "Ernani" SIG. CAMPANARI	Verdi
ARIA	"Ah Mon Fils," From the "Prophet" MISS EDMANDS	Meyerbeer
"LET ALL OBEY"	From the "Enchantress" DR. CLARK	Balfe
ARIA	"Ah Fors e Lui, from "Traviata" MME. PAULSEN-WHITE	Verdi
"I'M A ROAMER"	From "Son and Stranger" MR. WHITNEY	Mendelssohn
LIBERTY DUET	"Il Puritani" SIG. CAMPANARI, DR. CLARK	Bellini

PART FOUR

"MISERERE"	From "Trovatore" MR. JOHNSON AND CHORUS	Verdi
"AH QUEL GIORNO"	From "Semiramide" MISS VAN BUREN	Rossini
RECITATIVE ET ARIA	From "Joseph" MR. HEINRICH	Mehul
ARIA	"Caro Nome," from "Rigoletto" MLLE. DeVERE	Verdi
MARCH	"Athalie" ORCHESTRA	Mendelssohn

MASON & HAMLIN GRAND PIANOFORTES AND LISZT ORGANS USED

DUNNE & SHILLIDAY, Mgrs.
LECTURE AND MUSICAL AGENCY
64 Albion Build'g, 1 Beacon St., Boston

THE ODEON, CINCINNATI.

Boston Symphony Orchesrta.

SEASON OF 1890-91.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 11th, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz, ... Overture Benvenuto Cellini
(By request.)

Schumann, ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

Mozart, . Canzonetta, and Page's Aria, from "The Marriage of Figaro"

Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor

Songs with Piano.

a. Der Lindenbaum, ... Wallnofer
b. Waldwanderung, ... Grieg
c. Vergebliches Staendchen . . . . . Brahms

Wagner, ... Prelude, "Lohengrin"

Wagner, ... Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"

Wagner, ... Prelude, "Die Meistersinger"

Soloist, MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The piano used is a Steinway.

THE ODEON, CINCINNATI.

Boston Symphony Orchesrta.

SEASON OF 1890-91.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 11th, AT 8 O'CLOCK.

PROGRAMME.

✓ Berlioz, ... Overture Benvenuto Cellini
(By request.)

✓ Schumann, ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

✓ Mozart, . Canzonetta, and Page's Aria, from "The Marriage of Figaro"

✓ Tschaikowsky, Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor

Songs with Piano.

a. Der Lindenbaum, ... Wallnofer
b. Waldwanderung, ... Grieg
c. Vergebliches Staendchen . . . . . Brahms

✓ Wagner, ... Prelude, "Lohengrin"

✓ Wagner, ... Prelude, "Tristan and Isolde"

✓ Wagner, ... Prelude, "Die Meistersinger"

Soloist, MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The piano used is a Steinway.

LOUISVILLE, 1891.

FIRST GRAND

Music · Festival

(Under the auspices of the Commercial Club.)

May 12th, 13th 14th, 15th and 16th.

AT AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM.

ANALYTICAL PROGRAM.

OFFICIAL.

JNO. B. CASTLEMAN. A. G. LANGHAM,

BARBEE-CASTLEMAN,

FIRE INSURANCE OFFICE

. . IN . .

+ THE COMMERCE. +

MANAGERS:

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY,

And Agents for

HARTFORD,

LONDON,

LANCASHIRE,

NIAGARA,

SUN, AMERICAN

and ALLIANCE.

THE

EQUITABLE SOCIETY

holds

A LARGER SURPLUS, writes

A LARGER ANNUAL BUSINESS, and has

A LARGER AMOUNT OF ASSURANCE IN FORCE than any other Company in the world.

Its latest form of Policy is

INCONTESTABLE after one year,

UNRESTRICTED after two years,

"NON-FORFEITABLE" after three years,

AND PAYABLE WITHOUT DELAY.

ROE & LYON, Managers.
C. A. CURRAN, Cashier.
L. P. CAMPBELL, City Manager.

THOMAS & NORD,
J. Mc. N. PARKER,
F. H. HIBBERD.
} City Agents.

LOUISVILLE FLORAL BAZAAR

F. C. HAUPT, Proprietor.

Choice Cut Flowers and Fine Rose Buds

A SPECIALTY.

FLORAL DESIGNS and METAL DESIGNS.

247 WEST JEFFERSON STREET, Between 2d and 3d. LOUISVILLE, KY.

TELEPHONE 1578, RING 2.

METROPOLITAN

Shirt House,

IMPORTER OF

MEN'S FINE FIXINGS also SHIRT MAKERS.

LOUIS APPEL, Prop.

436 & 438 West Market Street, Bet 4th & 5th.

SMITH & NIXON,

ESTABLISHED 1843.

THE LEADING
PIANO DEALERS
OF LOUISVILLE.

IN OUR EXPERIENCE OF NEARLY HALF A CENTURY HAVE ESTABLISHED THE REPUTATION OF SELLING ONLY INSTRUMENTS OF THE —HIGHEST GRADES.—

LARGEST STOCK, LOWEST PRICES, Most Reasonable Terms.

Every Instrument fully warranted. Reliable Pianos sold on monthly and quarterly payments.

General representatives in the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Ohio and West Virginia, for the old reliable

CHICKERING PIANOS, Pre-eminetly the best made.

KURTZMANN PIANOS, Most popular uprights now manufactured.

SMITH & NIXON,

622 & 624 Fourth Ave., LOUISVILLE, KY.

108 South Jefferson Street, Dayton, Ohio.

24 & 26 W. Fourth Street, Cincinnati, O.

131 & 133 E. Main Street, Lexington, Ky.

A UNIQUE SOPRANO.

Through the kindness of a friend there has come into my possession a small volume, printed in London in 1834, entitled "Musical Reminiscences, from 1773 to 1834, by the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe."

The book is of very great interst, inasmuch as it deals with a period of musical history of which there is not much existing literature; and the style is so terse and the opinions are so well expressed that we are brought face to face with the music of a hundred years ago, just as if we read of it in the newspapers of to-day, with this difference, however, that his Lordship was a better musical critic than many of the reporters who are nowadays assigned to such work.

A few selections will show what strange things we would see and hear if we would be transported back to the last century.

The cast of an opera in those days usually consisted of the primo uomo (first man) soprano, prima donna and tenor, the secondo uomo (soprano) seconda donna and ultima parte, bass. Grand opera had rarely more characters than these, and choruses were seldom introduced.

The following is an account of a male singer who was very celebrated in London in his day: "In the season of 1778 and 1779 arrived Pachierotti, decidedly, in my opinion, the most perfect singer it ever fell to my lot to hear. Pachierotti's voice was an extensive soprano, full and sweet in the highest degree; his powers of execution were great, but he had in too good taste and too good sense to make a display of them where it would have been misapplied, confining it to one bravura song (aria di agilita) in each opera, conscious that the chief delight of singing and his own supreme excellence lay in touching expression and exquisite pathos. Yet he was so thorough a musician that nothing came amiss to him; every style to him was equally easy, and he could sing, at first sight, all songs of the most opposite characters, not merely with the facility and correctness which complete knowledge of music must give, but entering at once into the views of the composer and giving them all the appropriate spirit and expression. Such was his genius in his embellishments and cadences, that the variety was inexhaustible, yet he never introduced an ornament that was not judicious and appropriate to the composition.

"His shake, then considered an indispensable requisite, without which no one could be esteemed a perfect singer, was the very best it could be heard in every form in which that grace can be executed, whether taken from above or below, between whole or semitones, fast or slow it was always open, equal and distinct, giving the greatest brilliancy to his cadences, and often introduced in his passages with the happiest effect.

"I have often seen his auditors, even those the least musical, moved to tears while he was singing. Possessing a very large collection of music, he could give an infinite variety of songs by every master of reputation. I have more than once heard him sing a cantata of Haydn's, called 'Arianna a Naxos,' composed for a single voice, with only a pianoforte accompaniment, and that was played by Haydn himself; it is needless to say the perfrmance was perfect. To this detail of his merits and peculiar qualities as a singer, I must add that he was a worthy good man, modest and diffident, even to a fault."

The operas most admired during these seasons—1779–1783—were "Rinaldo," by Sacchini; "Quinto" Fabio, by Bertoni, and "L'Eroe Cinese," by Rauzzini. C. H. S

INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE.

The Sun Life Insurance Company

OF AMERICA.

HOME OFFICE, No. 502 W. MAIN STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Branch Offices: 580 Fourth Avenue, Louisville; Covington, Newport, Lexington, Henderson, Frankfort, Owensboro, Nashville, Knoxville, Memphis. Others being constantly opened. Agents wanted.

OFFICERS:

ALBERT S. WILLIS, President. M. W. ADAMS, Vice-President. GEO. H. LAKE, Secretary.

TELEPHONE 1093—2.

T. C. CAUMMISAR,

HEADQUARTERS FOR

BROOMS

AND BROOM MAKERS' SUPPLIES,

No. 168 FOURTH AVENUE.

EXCELSIOR! For Upholsterers, Mattress and Furniture Manufacturers, Carriage Makers, Undertakers and Packing Purposes.

Grand Performance.

(Under Auspices of American Accident Co., of Louisville, Ky.)

PROGRAM.

GRAND CHORUS.

ENDORSEMENT OF THE COMPANY'S PLANS AND METHODS,
By Ten Thousand Policy Holders.

LOCAL CHORUS.

SONG OF PRAISE,
By Three Thousand Policy Holders in Louisville Alone.

HALLELUJAH.

CHORUS OF 500 CLAIMANTS
Who Have Been Paid Promptly at Sight.

QUARTET.

BY MOTHER, WIFE, WIDOW AND FATHER,
To Whom Total Losses Have Been Recently Paid.

LOUISVILLE TRUST CO.,

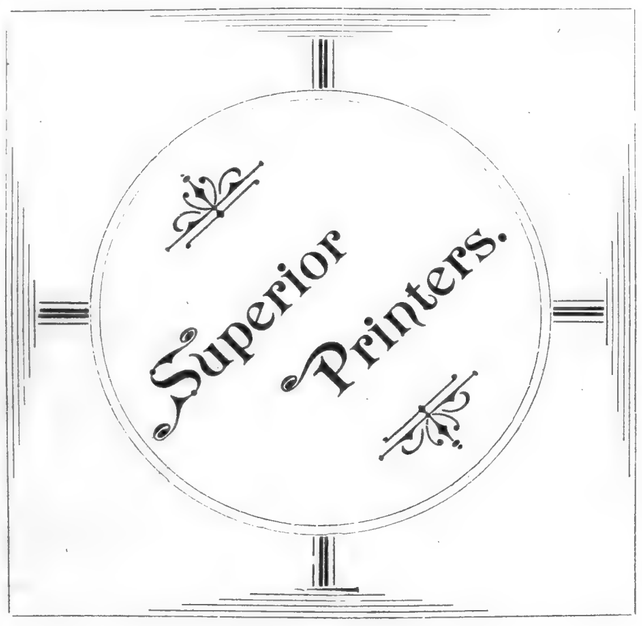
BACKS THIS ORGANIZATION WITH $100,000.00,
So that no Performer Need Fear Being "Stranded" on the Road, but will be Paid Promptly and Fully.

ROBT. SKENE, JR.,
SECRETARY AND GENERAL MANAGER,
No. 338 West Main Street. Louisville, Ky.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO.,

LOUISVILLE.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.



GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.

WHAT BOSTON PEOPLE PAY.

Last fall the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a series of twenty-four Friday afternoon performances, and the following shows the prices paid to hear the organization right at its home. Louisville people are more fortunate, for they are not forced to compete at an auction for desirable seats and pay big premiums, but can have first-class seats at less than $2 a performance:

"The sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenth season, took place yesterday at Music Hall, with a large attendance and spirited bidding. The highest premium received was $150, paid by Mr. Harland, for each of four end seats in K, the tenth row from the front.

"There were also two seats sold at $125, two more at a trifle less than that figure, and the price ranged from $30 to $60 for the large part of the floor until the seats in the rear, under the balcony, were reached, when the premium dropped to about $16 in some cases. The balcony seats sold at a high figure, the first seats sold bringing a premium of $13.50, and Mr. Wadsworth bought four seats in the right balcony at $70 and two at $74 premium, and several at about $50. There was a wide difference in the price of seats for the front row in the right balcony and in the opposite one, few in the 1 ft balcony bringing over $40 premium. Many ladies were present bidding for seats, and a large sprinkling of purchasers were of the fair sex. The premiums averaged much in advance of last year, the highest premium for any seat last year being less than $100. Every $12 seat was sold The premium for the rehearsal seats is usually more than for the evening concerts. This morning at 10 o'clock the $7.50 rehearsal seats will be sold at auction."

THE attention of piano buyers is called to Smith & Nixon's advertisement in this issue of the BULLETIN. They come forward with the lowest prices ever offered to piano buyers, and on a reliable grade of goods Fine upright pianos in mahogany, rosewood or ebonized finish, $249, $265, and $287. It will pay you to examine these bargains. Smith & Nixon give their guarantee with each piano.

1t

Columbia Finance and Trust Co.,

FIFTH AND MAIN STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Executors, Administrators, Trustees, Guardians, Receivers, Assignees and Financial Agents.

E. T. HALSEY, President. R. J. MENEFEE, Vice-President. W. W. HILL, Secretary.

"THE tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the week just ended," says the Boston Herald, "marks the highest point in both artistic and financial success that has been reached in the eleven years' existence of this organization, a fact which can but gratify all who take pride in Boston's musical enterprises; for, despite the fact that but one solitary citizen of Boston assumes all the responsibility of maintaining this great body of musicians, its existence has come to be claimed by the public as a sort of credit to the city at large.

"Only those who have followed year by year the development of the present popularity of this Boston Orchestra in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington can realize fully the amount of capital and labor represented in the present successful position occupied by the organization in other cities, but all Bostonians must be gratified with the success it has attained. A very pleasing feature of the series of concerts given in New York has been the eminently friendly spirit shown toward Mr. Nikisch and his band by the musical critics of that city, and the aid given the Boston Orchestra by these gentlemen has been an important factor in bringing about the present favorable attitude on the part of the public toward the organization in all the cities included in these occasional tours."

WHAT A VOCALION IS.

The first Vocalion ever seen in Louisville has arrived at the piano house of D. H. Baldwin & Co. It is a wonderful innovation in the organ line, and must be of particular interest to churches that can not afford big pipe organs. It is a noble instrument, presenting all the effects of a costly organ. An eight hundred and fifty dollar vocalion is practically equal in all its uses to a $2,000 pipe organ. The instrument will be on exhibition at Baldwin's, and its beauty will be shown by a competent musician. It was not manufactured by D. H. Baldwin & Co., although it may not be generally known that this company has an immense concern at Chicago, known as the Hamilton Organ Co., which, though only in the first year of its existence, will turn out fifteen hundred organs for its fiscal year.

THE new music house of Emil Wulschner is steadily working its way to the front, not through the means of advertising, but on the strength of the quality of the pianos and organs they carry, and their way of conducting business. The Knabe piano, for which they are sole agent, being recognized as the finest piano in the world; the Vose & Sons' piano, which is an old standard make, first-class in every respect, and which he is selling at a very reasonable price, in order to place it within reach of the majority wanting a first-class piano, but not willing to pay for a big reputation, and his having sold three hundred of this one make within eighteen months speaks for itself. His stock includes twelve additional makes of pianos and organs, and purchasers can always depend upon everything being as represented, which reputation he has established for himself in Indianapolis and other cities where he has been for years. 1t

MAKE A NOTE OF THIS.

Season tickets now sell at ten dollars each. On April 1st they will be advanced to fifteen dollars each. Secure seats now while desirable ones are to be had and before the price is advanced. Why not have the best seats at the cheapest rate? The office for the sale of seats is at the Commercial Club in the Commerce Building. Write to the Secretary for full information about the festival.

THE COMMERCIAL CLUB.

The Louisville Commercial Club is an alliance of business and professional men, having a membership of 1,325 members, and devoted to advancing the city's interests.

The vested choir of St. John's chapel, Trinity parish, New York city, reinforced by an orchestra under the direction of Prof. George F. Le Jeune, the organist and choirmaster of the chapel, went to Washington recently and sang before President Harrison. The trip was planned by Mr. Richard Mansfield, who paid the expenses.

***

Randegger, the great vocal teacher, is preparing for Novellos a concert edition of the solos from "Elijah," with all the cues and phrasing marked. It is designed especially for the use of soloists.

***

"Elijah" was given recently in Wellington, New Zealand, with Santley in the title role."

***

Now is the time to mark off Festival seats. The good ones are going.

NEW YORK LIFE,

ORGANIZED 1845

KENTUCKY BRANCH OFFICE,

Fourth Floor, THE COMMERCE.

SMITH & NIXON

OFFER GREAT

BARGAINS IN

MEDIUM PRICED

Upright Pianos.

Small Rosewood, Upright, 7⅓ octave, - - $249.
Medium Size Rosewood or Walnut, 7⅓ octave, 265.
Large Size Walnut, Mahogany or Rosewood, - 287.

* TERMS TO SUIT ALL CUSTOMERS. *

The above pianos fully warranted, Fine Cover and Stool included.

TUNED ONE YEAR and DELIVERED FREE.

These are the best bargains ever offered to Louisville buyers.

If you have an old square piano, we will accept it as part payment on a new upright.

Special prices to Teachers.

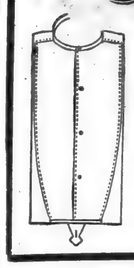
SMITH & NIXON,

622 & 624 FOURTH AVENUE.

W. Sid Platt Co.

MAKE TO ORDER THE

"APOLLO YOKE" SHIRT



A FULL LINE OF

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

LATEST AND BEST.

FOURTH AND MAIN.

THE

Hegan Wall Paper Co.

Have a large selection of the newest and most artistic designs in

WALL PAPER.

We invite you to call and examine these whether you contemplate purchasing or not. We are sole agents for M. H. Birge & Sons, and Thos. Strahan & Co.'s SPECIAL DESIGNS.

Pictures and Picture Frames.

JAS. H. BASSETT, JR.
GEO. E. SNYDER.
D. W. LANE.

HON. W. B. HOKE, Prest. GEO. W. GRIFFITHS, M.D., Medical Supt. W. T. MCCARLEY, Supt. W. H. MCKINLEY, Sec'y.

The Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company,

436 W. JEFFERSON STREET, LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

This Company offers Life and Accident Insurance at One-Half the Rates Charged by stock companies. Policies Non-Forfeitable, and Have a Cash Surrender or Paid-Up Insurance Value after Five Years' Membership.

COST PER $1,000 FOR LIFE INSURANCE, WITHOUT ACCIDENT BENEFITS.

Yearly Cost at age 25	$13 98	Yearly Cost at age 45	$19 86
Yearly Cost at age 30	14 82	Yearly Cost at age 50	24 84
Yearly Cost at age 35	15 96	Yearly Cost at age 55	32 46
Yearly Cost at age 40	17 40	Yearly Cost at age 60	44 00

Other Ages at Proportionate Rates. The above Amounts are Divided into Bi-Monthly Payments.

Accident Policies, $1,000 to $5,000. Preferred Occupations $12 per annum. For Hazardous occupations cost from $12 to $16 per annum. General and Local Agents wanted everywhere to represent the company, with whom liberal contracts will be made. Address

W. T. McCARLEY, Supt.

Kentucky Wagon Mfg. Co.

MANUFACTURERS

WORKS AT SOUTH LOUISVILLE.

CAPACITY. 35,000 WAGONS ANNUALLY.

"Old Hickory" and "Tennessee"

FARM AND FREIGHT WAGONS.

LOUISVILLE, - KENTUCKY.

QUARTET AND CHORUS.

Stabat mater dolorosa,
Juxta crucem lacrimosa,
Dum pendebat filius;
Cujus animam gementem,
Contristantem et dolentem,
Pertransivit gladius.

Stood the grief-struck mother weeping,
At the cross her vigil keeping,
Where her suffering son was bound;
And her heart with anguish groaning,
And his agony bemoaning,
Bleeds with every bleeding wound.

O quam tristis et afflicta,
Fuit illa benedicta,
Mater unigeniti;
Quæ mærebat et dolebat
Pia Mater cum videbat
Nati pœnas incliti.

Oh, what sorrow and affliction
She, the font of benediction,
Bore for her beloved son;
With what grief and what bewailing
And what trembling and heart failing,
Looked she on the martyred one.

II.—QUARTET.

Quis est homo qui non fleret
Christi Matrem si videret
In tanto supplicio?
Quis non posset contristari
Piam matrem contemplari
Dolentem cum filio?

Who could hold his tears from flowing
For Christ's stricken mother, knowing
All her misery and pain?
Who withhold his lamentation
In the mournful contemplation
Of her grieving for the slain?

Pro peccatis suæ gentis
Vidit Jesum in tormentis
Et flagellis subditum;
Vidit suum dulcem natum
Moriendo desolatum
Dum emisit spiritum.

She for sinner's sure salvation
Saw her son in condemnation,
Whipped with scourges, led to death;
Saw him without consolation,
In despair and desolation,
Utter his expiring breath.

III.—CHORUS.

Eia mater, fons amoris,
Me sentire vim doloris
Fac, ut tecum lugeam.

Thou O mother, love bestowing,
Make me, with thy grief o'erflowing,
Make me mourn and weep with thee.

IV.—BASS SOLO AND CHORUS.

Fac ut ardeat cor meum
In amando Christum Deum,
Ut sibi complaceam.

Fill my heart with love all burning,
Unto Christ his love returning,
That thy blessing fall on me.

Sancta mater, istud agas,
Crucifixo fige plagas,
Corde meo valide.

Holy mother, by thy favor
May the wounds of Christ forever
Be engraven on my heart.

V.—CHORUS.

Tui nati vulnerati,
Tam dignate, pro me pati,
Pœnas mecum divide.

Of his suffering and wounding,
May I, through thy grace abounding,
Though unworthy, bear a part.

VI.—TENOR SOLO AND CHORUS.

Fac me vere tecum flere,
Crucifixo condolere,
Donec ego vixero.
Juxta crucem tecum stare,
Te libenter sociare,
In planctu desidero.

Make my tears to thee consoling:
With the crucifix condoling
May I weep till life shall end.
Near the cross give me my station,
And with thee association,
That my griefs with thine may blend.

VII.—CHORUS.

Virgo virginum præclara,
Mihi jam non sis amara:
Fac me tecum plangere.

Virgin, o'er all virgins shining,
Let thy grace have no declining:
Make me always with thee mourn.

VIII.—SOPRANO AND TENOR DUET.

Fac ut portem Christi mortem:
Passionis fac consortem
Et plagas recolere.

Let Christ's suffering and ending
And the passion his soul rending
In my heart of hearts be borne.

Fac me plagis vulnerari,
Cruce hac inebriari,
Ob amorem filii.

With his wounds may I be sinking,
Of his cup may I be drinking,
[For the love that filleth me.]

IX.—ALTO SOLO.

Inflammatus et accensus
Per te Virgo, sim defensus
In dic judicii.

Lest by flames I be consumed
And in day of judgment doomed,
Virgin blest, I call on thee.

Fac me cruce custodiri,
Morte Christi præmuniri,
Confoveri gratia.

By the cross may I be guarded,
By Christ's death from danger warded,
Through his grave that open lies.

X.—QUARTET AND CHORUS.

Quando corpus morietur,
Fac ut animæ donetur
Paradisi gloria.
Amen.

When my dust to dust is given,
And my soul its bonds hath riven,
Give me place in Paradise.
Amen.

Capital, $300,000. Surplus, $80,000.

Farmers' & Drovers' Bank of Louisville

Pays Interest on Savings deposits and time Certificates. Solicits your account.

R. S. VEECH, PRESIDENT. J. W. NICHOLS, CASHIER.

J. H. LINDENBERGER, President. JNO. J. HARBISON, Vice-President.
WM. R. JOHNSON, Cashier. F. H. JOHNSON, Ass't Cashier.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK,

Capital, $500,000 LOUISVILLE, KY. Surplus and Profits, $200,130

GENERAL BANKING BUSINESS.

Solicits the accounts of MERCHANTS, MANUFACTURERS and INDIVIDUALS.

DANIEL QUILP, Sole Proprietor and Manager JAS. B. CAMP, Business Manager.

AMPHITHEATRE AUDITORIUM,

4th AND HILL STREETS,

ONLY FOR GREAT ATTRACTIONS.

Next attraction "THE SOUDAN," week March 30, 1891.

WEAVER'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

N. E. Cor. Fourth and Market Streets, Louisville, Ky.

ENTRANCE ON FOURTH ST.

BEN C. WEAVER, President. L. COMINGOR, Secretary.
CLARENCE M. GORDON, Principal of Shorthand Department.

Book keeping, Commercial Arithmetic, Penmanship, Shorthand, Typewriting, etc.

P. S. CAMPBELL, LOUISVILLE, KY. ROOM No. 806 THE COMMERCE.

Insurance Fire Adjuster

LOUISVILLE, NEW ALBANY AND JEFFERSONVILLE ONLY.

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS.

In the next edition of the FESTIVAL BULLETIN, there will be published a fine portrait of Miss Gertrude Edmands, the handsome and talented Boston contralto, who is to sing at the May Music Festival. A Petersburg paper says of her: "Miss Gertrude Edmands made her debut here, and with the very first note she demonstrated her title to rank among the best of contraltos. She sings with exquisite taste, phrases with rare intelligence and refinement, and her enunciation is delightfully distinct."

"THE SOUDAN" is by all odds the best melodrama of the many which have found their way from London to the American stage. It surpasses them all in the number and beauty of its scenic effects, its magnificent tableaux, its thrilling and exciting pictures, its fine spectecular effects, its realism, its truth to nature, in the care which the authors have taken not to outrage probability, consistency and interest. If it were a poor play, its many and stirring and beautiful scenes would make it a success, but, in addition to the spectacular effects which so strongly recommend it, it is a strong, picturesque, exciting and well-constructed drama, rich in carefully-drawn and sharply-contrasted characters; full of action and of absorbing interest.

Seats for this engagement are now on sale at Baldwin's, No. 236 Fourth avenue. 1t

A YOUNG SAMSON.

That is what the great home-maker, The United States Building and Loan Association, has been termed, and justly so, as their record for the first two months of their existence proves. In this time they have sold 10,000 shares of their stock, or one million dollars of its authorized capital stock, which is $50,000,000. They have loaned about $20,000 which amount has largely been used to secure homes for the wives and little ones, who will own them in seven years by paying about the same amount as their rent has cost them in the past. As an investment for surplus capital this association can not be equaled. On their paid-up stock they will be able to declare a dividend from 20 to 30 per cent. per annum, and an investment of that kind is absolutely safe. If you are interested, call at our office, 232 Fifth street, and examine the workings of the association, see who its officers are and make yourself fully acquainted with the building and loan idea. It is safe to warrant that it will strike you as a grand thing for the man who has money to invest, and for the man who wants a home.

President, Vernon D. Price, Vice-President, W. T. Grant; Secretary, J. W. Jenkins; Assistant Secretary, H. M. Voris; Treasurer, W. M. Charlton; General Counsel, Bennett H. Young; General Manager, T. Nadeau.

Louisville Banking Co., Depository. Columbia Finance & Trust Co., Security Depository. Correspondence solicited. 1t.

Messrs. Koster and Bial will send out a big burlesque and specialty show next season, headed by Carmencita. The high-priced theaters only will be played.

The Festival Bulletin.

Issued semi-monthly under the auspices of the Press Committee of the Louisville Commercial Club, and edited by the Club's Secretary. Office, Room No. 1005, The Commerce Building, Louisville, Ky. For advertising rates, address John L. Moore, Business Manager.

LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 16, 1891.

AN epitome of the work done by the various committees engaged in promoting the Commercial Club's May Music Festival indicates that everything is progressing most favorably. As outlined by the prospectus published in this edition, the festival is to be one of eminent artistic merit. The artists engaged are all of the highest rank, and it is a waste of words to pay tribute to Boston's grand Symphony Orchestra. The affair promises to be successful financially as well as artistically, the sale of seats having reached a very gratifying state. All except sixty-five of the parquette seats have been taken for the season, and the first three rows of the dress-circle, with many seats further back, have also been marked off for the entire series. In addition to this, fully one third more have been engaged, but have not yet been marked off. When those who have agreed to take tickets have secured their seats, it can readily be seen that the best part of the house has been sold.

MR. HENRY WALLER declares that, contrary to reports, he will not leave Lousville. He likes the city and its people, and feels, no doubt, that there is or will be ample scope for his talents here. His loss would be severe to us, and especially now, when we are striving to create an earnest and permanent musical life. It is to be hoped that the symphony orchestra Mr. Waller has been so enthusiastically considering will be organized. A few of our wealthy citizens could build themselves a monument of everlasting gratitude from the people by giving the venture their liberal patronage. One citizen of Boston has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra the splendid organization it is, and surely we have men of the same spirit in Louisville An orchestra here would soon become self-supporting.

THE golden opportunity is at hand for making a great step in the musical advancement of Louisville. With the finest orchestra in the country, the best soloists, and a large chorus, there ought to be an interest aroused that will not stop short of a permanent organization, and the building of a large music hall.

MR. MOCKRIDGE is now most justly considered the first of American tenors. He has sung in nearly all of the principal cities of this country and Europe, and always with pronounced success. "An event of interest," says the Chicago Indicator, "was the appea[redacted] of Whitney Mockridge, a singer to whom Chicago justly lays claim, and whose permanent residence in Chicago would be welcome. He is that rara avis, a pure tenor, and, moreover, a tenor with artistic perceptions, and the qualities of an intelligent musician. His voice is rich, warm and sympathetic, his tone production generally excellent, his phrasing truly artistic, and, furthermore, he sings with nerve and enthusiasm. These qualities, rarely commingled, were manifest in all his work."

KENTUCKY'S MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL.

KENTUCKY is to have in May a finer Music Festival than has yet been given south of the Ohio river, and one that will compare most favorably with any that have been presented in the musical centres of the East. The date of the event has been set for May 12th to 16th inclusive, the first performance to be on Tuesday night, continuing Wednesday afternoon, Wednesday night and Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights.

The principal feature will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Nikisch, late of Berlin, and a veritable wizard of the baton, consisting of seventy performers, among which are a number of instrumental soloists of great note. This orchestra has a world-wide reputation, and the music-loving people of the State have greeted with delight the announcement of its engagement for Louisville.

The leading soprano will be Signorina Clementina De Vere, of Paris, and not Miss Eames, the American singer as was first announced. The idea was to secure one of the two, and Miss De Vere's manager has at last been able to change her Pittsburgh dates so that she can sing here in May. Under this arrangement Miss Eames has signed a contract abroad and will not come to America until later. Miss De Vere will form a most interesting attraction. She is a lovely woman, and is regarded as by far the finest singer on American shores. An interesting sketch of her appears on the first page of this number. There will be five other vocal soloists, all of whom have won laurels before the footlights.

Another soprano is Frau Nikisch, the wife of the director, a distinguished vocalist with a European reputation, and whose singing, when she made her American debut recently in New York, and sang afterward in Boston and Philadelphia, received the most enthusiastic praise of the Eastern critics and of musical circles. There is still another soprano to be engaged, whose name will be given as soon as possible. It is guaranteed that this singer shall be an artist of the first class.

The contralto will be Miss Gertrude Edmands, of Boston, recognized as the leading contralto of the East.

The remaining two singers represent the masculine elements of the soloists, and both are notable figures in the music of to-day. One is Mr. Whitney

WM. TILLMAN, Cashier. CHAS. MERIWETHER, Ass't Cashier.

FALLS CITY BANK,

LOUISVILLE, KY.,

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - $676,101.60.

Transacts • a • General • Banking • Business.

Accounts of Merchants, Manufacturers and Bankers Solicited.

DEPARTMENT FOR SAVINGS. INTEREST ALLOWED ON SAVINGS DEPOSITS.

DIRECTORS:

JOHN T. MOORE, Prest. P. MEGUIAR. DENIS LONG, Vice-Prest.
CHARLES H. PETTET. J. W. E. BAYLY. H. C. WARREN. W. S. WYMOND

KAUFMAN, STRAUS & CO.,

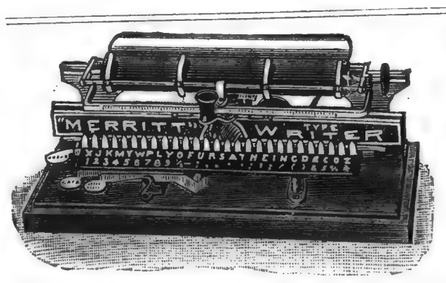
523—525 FOURTH AVENUE,

THE LARGEST IMPORTING RETAILERS OF

DRY GOODS

IN THE SOUTH-WEST.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES.



Louisville Cycle and Typewriter Co.

231 WEST JEFFERSON ST.,

— DEALERS IN —

BICYCLES, TYPEWRITERS, SHORTHAND WRITING MACHINES, RIBBONS, CARBON AND LINEN PAPERS, ETC.

— WRITE FOR CIRCULARS AND TERMS. —

FORCED TO QUIT!

WE HAVE DECIDED TO LEAVE,

NOT LEAVE TOWN,

BUT OUR PRESENT QUARTERS.

The business of the Fidelity and Casualty of New York is increasing so rapidly that we have leased the elegant and spacious offices at 504 W. Main Street (ground floor), where in future we will be pleased to see you. We are in the Accident Insurance business to stay and offer the most liberal policy ever issued.

FIDELITY AND CASUALTY CO.,

— OF NEW YORK —

T. GRANT SLAUGHTER & CO.,

GENERAL AGENTS,

504 WEST MAIN ST., Louisville, Ky.

LOUISVILLE FEMALE SEMINARY,

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL,

— FOR —

YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN.

New Location, S. E. Cor. Fourth Avenue and Broadway. MISS NOLD, Principal.

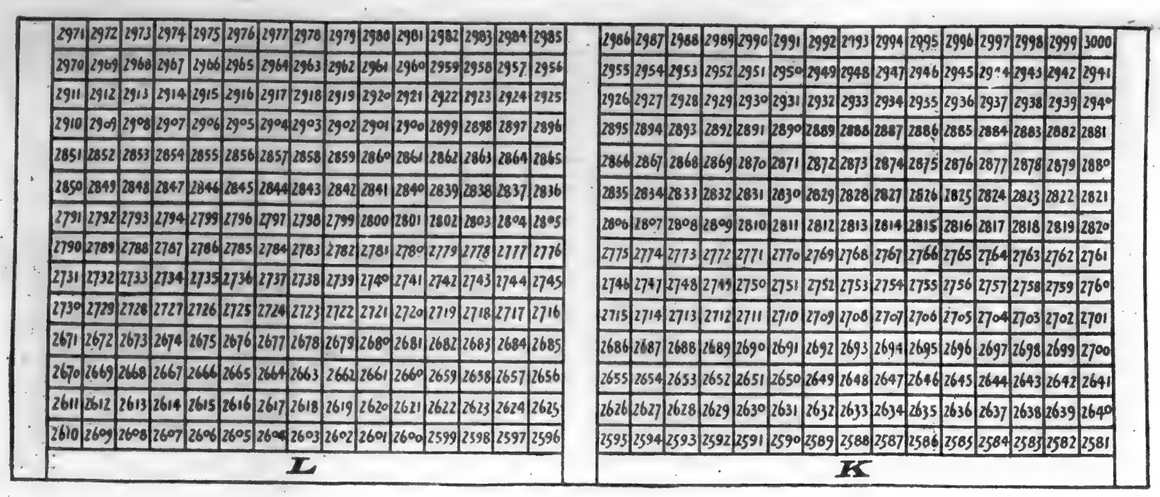
It is generally known, this change in Location will enable MISS NOLD to meet the demand for a Boarding school in Louisville. While there are many good schools in our city, this is the only one prepared to receive a large number of Boarding Pupils. The progress and prosperity of this institution is due not a little to the fact that since its foundation in 1851, it has been under the same management; while its boundaries have been extended, text-books changed, the high moral standard has never been lowered. It is a school where unusual attention is paid to the general culture of its pupils, not only during class hours but through the entire term.

The day school is in a most flourishing condition, the teacher of the Primary Department blending with her instruction the best features of the Kindergarten. The Grammar and Seminary Departments are in charge of trained teachers of long experience.

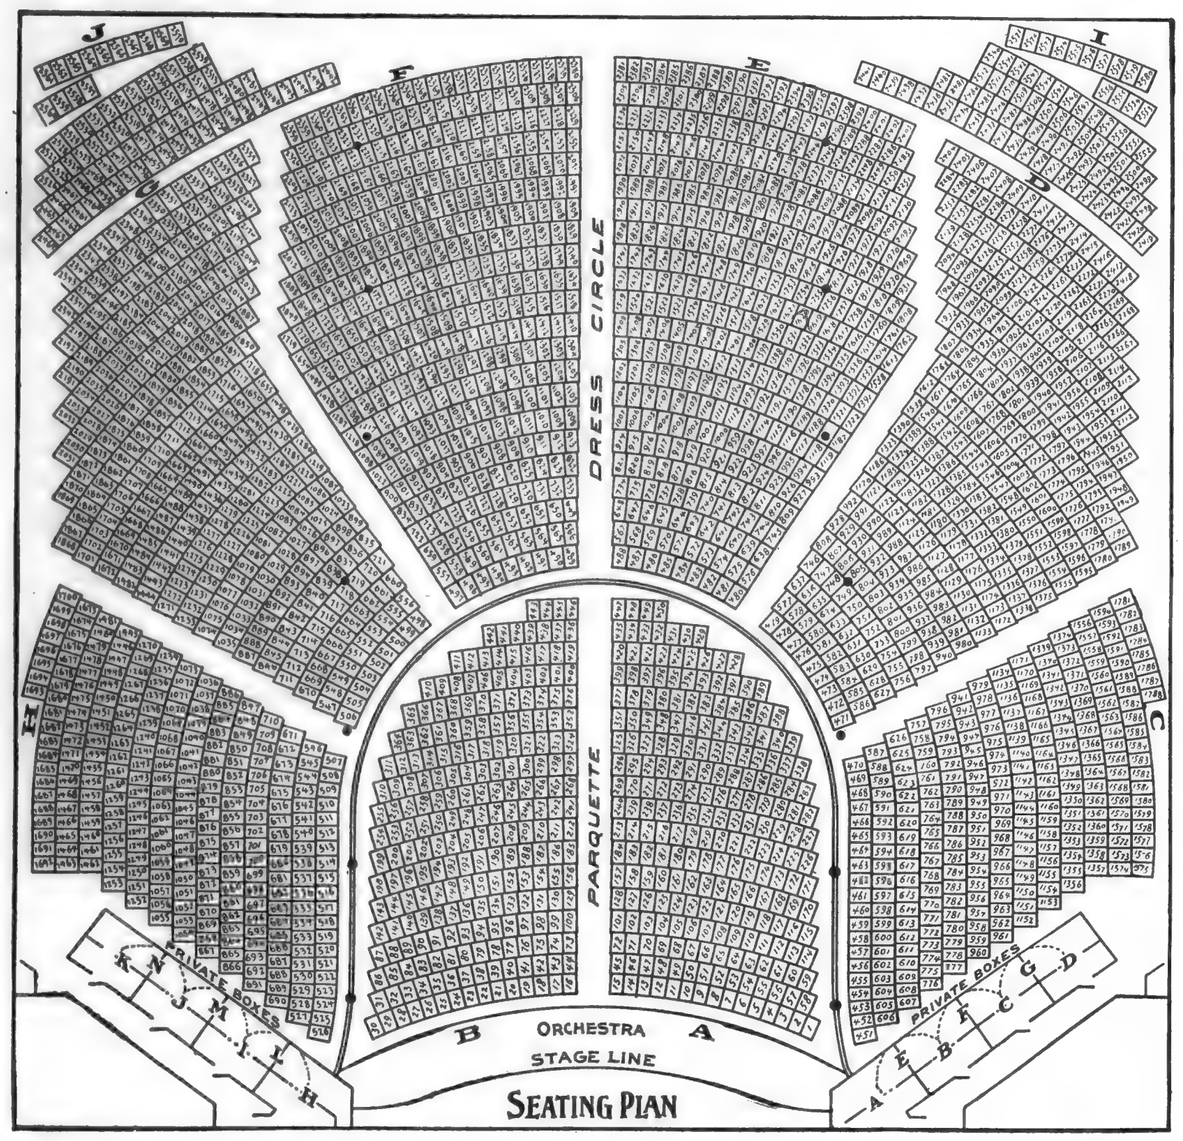
Full information given upon application to

MISS NOLD.

112 WEST BROADWAY, LOUISVILLE, KY.



BALCONY,



SEATING PLAN

The above cut represents exactly the seating plan of the Auditorium, where the May Music Festival is to be given. Select your seats and send the numbers to the Secretary. If the seats you have chosen have been marked off, he will send you seats as close to them as possible. Enclose check, cash or money order with your request.

Mockridge, late of Chicago, and now of New York, a tenor whose voice and methods have been pronounced exquisite and perfect. The other is Mr. William Ludwig, of London, the famous basso.

But this is not all. Two grand musical works, Mendelssohn's Oratorio of "Elijah" and Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," are to be produced on a more magnificent scale than ever before attempted in this section.

There will be a chorus of 250 voices, selected from the best singers in Louisville and vicinity, and this organization is now under rehearsal, with Mr. C. H. Shackleton, of the Musical Club, as its director. The event will be a great musical treat, and the price has been made even lower than is consistent with the program to be offered. Season tickets will be sold from now until April 1st, at ten dollars ($10) each, and after that date single seats will be sold at $2.50 for each performance. It will thus be seen that it is an advantage to purchase season tickets now, first, because they are cheaper, and second, because better seats can be had.

Reduced railroad and steamboat fares from all points.

Capital Paid up, $750,000. ESTABLISHED 1890. Surplus, $50,000.

UNION NATIONAL BANK,

S. E. Cor. 6th & Main Sts., Louisville, Ky.

Accounts of Individuals, Manufacturers, Corporations, Banks and Bankers Solicited.

GEO. W. SWEARINGEN, PREST. W. P. OTTER, VICE-PREST. L. O. COX, CASHIER.

Removes Freckles, Moth Patches, Pimples and all Blemishes of the Skin.

—CONSULTATION INVITED.—

Ladies with good complexions should use my "soap" and "almond meal compound" and keep them so.

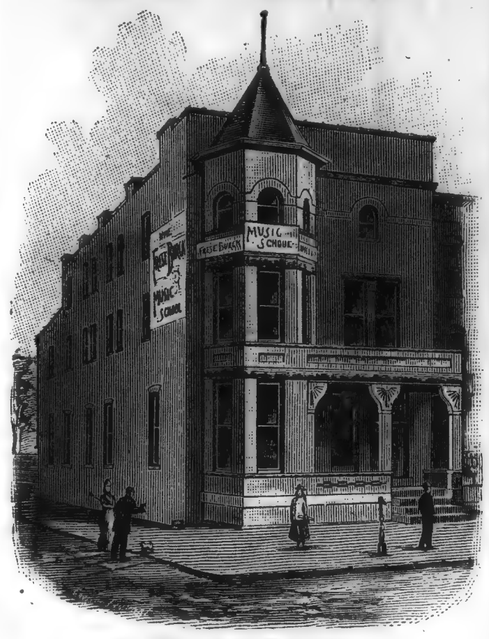
Valuable hints about washing, wiping, and preserving good complexions given free. Prominent Louisville physicians and hundreds of Louisville ladies who have used the Bleach as references.

Marion Walker Face Bleach

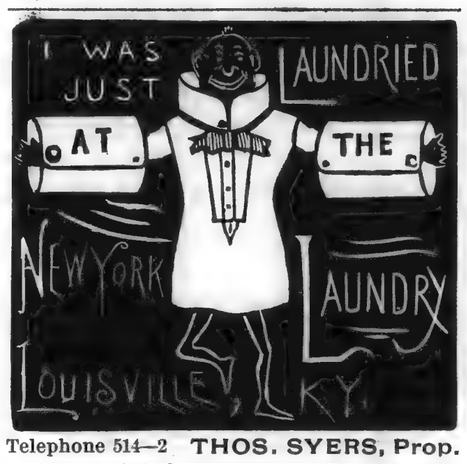
Mrs. Marion Walker,
514 FOURTH AVE.
LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIAMONDS
WM KENDRICKS SONS,
336. 4TH AVE
LOUISVILLE, KY.
WATCHES JEWELRY SILVERWARE
OUR STORE & ART ROOM ALWAYS OPEN TO RECEPTION OF VISITORS.

THE FRESE-BURCK
Music School,



424 WEST WALNUT STREET.
CATALOGUE FURNISHED ON APPLICATION.



Telephone 514—2 THOS. SYERS, Prop.

BALLARD'S OBELISK FLOUR
ALWAYS RELIABLE.

F. TEUPE,
PIANOS and ORGANS,
713—715 East Gray Street.
BEST ASSORTMENT IN THE CITY
Prices Guaranteed Lower than at any other Store.

WILLARD HOTEL
(Late ALEXANDER HOTEL)
W. R. LOGAN, Manager.
Nearest Hotel to all Theatres.
Corner Jefferson, Center and Green Sts.,
Opposite Court House.

REMINGTON STANDARD TYPEWRITER
The Remington has stood the test of time and use and is acknowledged to be the Standard and the Best. Call and examine the Remington, No. Five. A complete stock of typewriter ribbons, paper, etc., always on hand. Send for sample book of papers.
G. M. ALLISON & CO.,
No. 448 W. Main St., LOUISVILLE, KY.

A. C. LEWIS,

HATTER AND FURRIER,

415 Fourth Avenue,

AGENT FOR

Dunlap's Celebrated Hats

AND

CHRISTY'S ENGLISH HATS.

CUT FLOWERS.

ROSE BUDS A SPECIALTY.

FLOWERS ARTISTICALLY ARRANGED.

F. WALKER & CO.,

Telephone 1388—2. 644 FOURTH AVE.

Nursery and F

BICYCLES!

COLUMBIA,

HARTFORD, ROVER.

Bicycles for

Ladies, Men,

Girls and Boys,

ALL SIZES AND PRICES.

Bicycling Sundries.

— Call for Catalogue. —

G. M. Allison & CO.,

448 W. Main St.,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

DIRECTORY

OF THE

LEADING BUSINESS HOUSES

OF

LOUISVILLE.

Lumber, Doors, Sash and Blinds.

S. P. Graham, 810 Magazine Street.
W. J. Hughes & Sons Co., Fourteenth and Maple streets.
G. Kline & Son, 1900 West Main Street.

Hotels.

Galt House, $3 to $5 per day, First and Main streets.
Hotel Rassinier, Market, between Fourth and Fifth streets.

Hardware and Cutlery.

W. B. Belknap & Co., Nos. 115 to 121 West Main street.

Architects.

Walters & Stillman, No. 601 Commerce Building.

Piano Dealers.

Smith & Nixon.
Emil Wulschner, No. 632 Fourth avenue.

Banks.

German Insurance, Market, near second.
Farmers' and Drovers', Market, near Fourth avenue.
Falls City, Seventh and Main Streets.
Merchants' National, Main, between Fifth and Sixth streets.

Wagon Manufacturing.

Kentucky Wagon Manufacturing Company.

Life Insurance Companies.

New York Life Insurance Company, Commerce Building.
Kentucky Life and Accident Insurance Company, No. 436 West Jefferson street.
The Sun Life Insurance Company of America, No. 502 West Main street.

Trust Companies.

Columbia Finance and Trust Company, Fifth and Main streets.

Gas Plumbing and Mill Supplies.

The Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Co.

Suburban Billiard Parlors,

HENRY HEATH, Prop.

247 Fourth Avenue, LOUISVILLE, KY.

AGENT FOR

Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company's Billiard Tables

AND SUPPLIES.

Repairing Tables a Specialty. All Orders promptly attended to. Prices on application.

A LITTLE LEARNING DANGEROUS.

Those who keep in scrap-books some curiosities of criticism, may be glad to add to their collection an amusing article in the Western Times, a paper of long ago. The writer says: "Miss Tucker, in 'Lurline,' distinguishes her style. The full strength of chord and decision are her features." He also remarks: "Mrs. Land's Handel is better than her Weber. The arpeggios are tender, and the strain died away with most affecting gentleness." Also, "It was seen at once that Mrs. Land had studied the timbre, and the meaning of every string she struck." Also, "Whether sweeping across the keys with the freedom of the wind, or displaying some delicate finish, she was equally at home. Miss Kate Birkmyer's 'Rondo Capriccio' was a capital effort; elasticity, gradation, modulation and transition, were equally brought to produce the real effects of Beethovenic art." Lastly, "Miss Laura Martyn, with a new theme, 'La Somnambula' and a bolder hand, brings out a telling contrast. The air strikes in with emphasis, and the dreamy magnificence of the sentences closes with a double-forte burst." Let us devoutly hope that the writer of this highly-amusing notice will never close with "a double-forte burst."

THE Union National Bank is an example of what can be done in Louisville by judicious management. This bank began business about a year ago with $500,000 capital stock, which was increased in December last to $750,000. To-day their surplus is over $50,000. Their stock is quoted at 108. Parties wishing to open an account with a bank could not find more agreeable officers to do business with than Geo. W. Swearingen, their President, and L. O. Cox, Cashier. 1t

READ Smith & Nixon's advertisement of special prices in good upright pianos. 1t

Louisville ✣ Music ✣ Festival,

(UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMMERCIAL CLUB.)

✣

PROGRAM.

TUESDAY NIGHT, MAY 12th.

GRAND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Celebrated Vocalist.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 13th.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR, LIGHT CLASSICAL MUSIC,

With a Famous Soloist.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT, MAY 13th.

OPEN REHEARSAL OF SELECTED CHORUSES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

THURSDAY NIGHT, MAY 14th.

GRAND CLASSICAL NIGHT—WAGNER PROGRAM,

With One or More Great Soloists.

FRIDAY NIGHT, MAY 15th.

FIRST PART.

DVORAK'S "STABAT MATER,"

With Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Festival Chorus.

SECOND PART.

CLASSICAL PROGRAM.

SATURDAY NIGHT, MAY 16th.

MENDELSSOHN'S ELIJAH.

Double Quartet of Soloists, Boston Symphony Orchestra and Grand Festival Chorus.

COR. SIXTH, HILL & A, LOUISVILLE, KY.

GERNERT BROS., & KOEHLER CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Lumber, Sash, Doors and Blinds,

Turned and Scroll Work of all kinds.

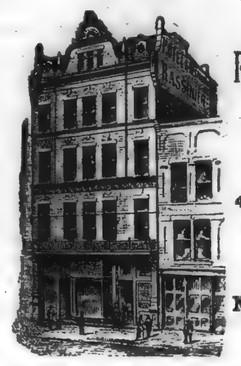
SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

— THE —

Central Thomson-Houston Co.,

No. 603 COMMERCE BUILDING.

The best Electric Machinery for Lighting, Railroads and Mines. Used everywhere. Write for Circulars.



HOTEL

RASSINIER,

Octave Rassinier,

PROPRIETOR.

(EUROPEAN PLAN)

415-417 West Market St.,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

New and Complete in all its Appointments.

First-Class Restaurant for Ladies and Gentlemen.

VICTOR BICYCLES.

JEFFERIS BROS.,

620 Third Ave., LOUISVILLE, KY.

First-class Repair Shop connected with Store.

MRS. L. RICHARDSON,

SUCCESSOR TO

—MISS GARRITY,—

FOURTH & MARKET STREETS,

PHOTOGRAPHER.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

Organs of the best make known and at prices to suit all pocket-books at D. H. Baldwin & Co.

DR. SPINNEY & CO.

✣ SPECIALISTS. ✣

506 Fifth Street, LOUISVILLE, KY.

D. H. Baldwin & Co., are showing a fine line of elegant pianos, among others the renowned Decker.

FESTIVAL BULLETIN

A Journal devoted to the Interests of the

LOUISVILLE MAY MUSIC FESTIVAL

Vol. I. LOUISVILLE, KY., MARCH 16, 1891. No. 3.

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

It is not often that persons of rare musical talent are united in the same family, but the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a no less distinguished wife. Frau Nikisch has a great reputation, both in this country and in Europe; and her reception in a recent concert tour of the Eastern cities was quite enthusiastic, while her singing was recognized by the critics as being of the highest artistic merit. Mrs. Nikisch has a mezzo-soprano voice of a remarkably-sweet quality, and she excels in singing German lieder, especially the songs of Schumann and Schubert.

A portrait of Mrs. Nikisch is shown on this page. She is a young and beautiful woman, as well as a fine artiste, and makes an extremely pleasing appearance.

THE FESTIVAL SOLOISTS.

In selecting the principal soloists for the May Festival the Committee sought the advice of some of the best critics and musicians in the East, and the result is a combination of vocalists that has rarely been equaled at any Festival in the United States.

Miss DeVere is recognized on all hands as the best soprano in the country She is engaged for the Pittsburgh and Buffalo Festivals next May, and has also been retained for numerous Festivals in New England, among which are the following: Fall River, April 28th; Springfield, Mass., May 6th, 7th and 8th; Pittsfield, Mass., May 25th and 26th; Rutland Vt., May 27th and 29th.

Miss Edmands is also in great demand, and will sing at the Arion Club Festival in Providence, R. I., May 10th and 21st, also at the Berkshire Musical Festival at Pittsfield, May 25th and 26th, and at Rutland, Vt., May 27th and 29th.

Mr. Mockridge will sing with the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston on Easter Sunday in Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Parker's "St. John," and he is also engaged at numerous other first-class concerts during the spring.

Mr. Ludwig is the most popular basso in the United States, and is dividing the honors with Mr. Charles Santley, the great English baritone. Mr. Ludwig is engaged for the Arion Club Festival at Providence, May 19th and 21st (Elijah). He will also sing with the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, in Bach's "Passion Music," on Good Friday, March 27th.

THE FESTIVAL PROGRAMS.

The following orchestral numbers are among the best selections submitted to the committee by competent musicians, and it is probable that the programs will include some of them:

Symphonies—Beethoven's No. 6 (Pastoral), Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, Raff's "Im Walde," Godard's Symphonie "Orientale"

Overtures—Meyerbeer's "Struensee," Goldmark's "Prometheus," Massenet's "Phedre," Thomas' "Mignon," Brahm's "Academic" Overture.

Selections—Wagner's "Waldweben;" Prelude, Meistersinger; Prelude, Tristan and Isolde, Liszt's Symphonic Poems, "Ideale;" Fest Klange, Tasso; Grieg, Suite "Peer Gynt;" Saint Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Hercules;" Mackenzie's Ballade for Orchestra, "La belle dame sans merci;" Goldmark, Violin Concerto.

BIG TIMES IN MAY.

Louisville is to have on her holiday garb during all of the month of May, her big Music Festival being only one of the many attractions she will offer during that period. The great annual congress of the Scotch-Irish people and their descendants in America will be in session during the latter part of the Festival week, 14th to 17th, inclusive. The congress will assemble in Liederkranz Hall, during Thursday, Friday and Saturday of the occasion, and at the Auditorium on Sunday night, May 17th, when a great mass religious meeting, after the manner of the old Covenanters, will be held under the auspices of the local committee.

The program will consist principally of addresses by the most distinguished orators of the day, and of appropriate music, all of which will be highly entertaining to the public, who are cordially invited to attend, without regard to nationality, and free of cost. The exercises of the congress proper will be held during the mornings and afternoons, so as not to interfere with the attendance on the musical entertainments at night. By this adjustment of programs, all visitors to Louisville during the time, however drawn to the city, will have an opportunity to attend both attractions, which will be mutually advantageous.

Mr. Robert Bonner, of New York, is President of the Society. He is known in nearly every home in the

The • Commercial • Club,

LOUISVILLE, KY.

MEMBERSHIP 1,325.

ORGANIZATION FOR 1890-91

PRESIDENT:
FRANK N. HARTWELL.

FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT:
OWEN GATHRIGHT, Jr.

SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT:
FRANK VON BORRIES.

DIRECTORS:

John S. Morris,	Angus R. Allmond,
Peyton N. Clarke,	Alvah L. Terry,
T. J. Batman,	Geo. Braden,
Roland Whitney,	E. J. McDermott,
Tracy Underhill,	A. H. Robinson.

SECRETARY:
LUCIEN M. ADKINS.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY:
THOS. P. CRAIG.

TREASURER:
J. M. BORNTRAEGER.

DIRECTOR OF CHORUS:
C. H. SHACKLETON.

Organized to promote the material interests of Louisville and the State. Offices, N. W. Cor. Fourth and Main streets, in the largest building of its character south of the Ohio river, and constructed by the young men of Louisville.

GEO. G. FETTER PRINTING CO., LOUISVILLE.

United States as the editor of the New York Ledger, and his relations with Kentucky have been especially close and pleasant, because of his penchant for fine horses

Among other distinguished men who will be present may be mentioned Rev. Dr. John Hall, the eminent New York divine; Col. A. K. McClure, the famous editor of the Philadelphia Times, and friend of the South; Hon. A. T. Wood, of Hamilton, Ontario, a prominent member of the Dominion Parliament; Mr. Alexander Montgomery, of San Francisco, Cal., one of the wealthiest and most benevolent capitalists on the Pacific coast, and several hundred more of the most noted men in every sphere of life, from all parts of the United States and British America. Besides those above mentioned in person, some of the other distinguished men who will deliver addresses are Gov. Buckner, Hon. W. C. P. Breckinridge, Hon. Henry Watterson and Judge William Lindsay, of Kentucky; Rev. Stuart Acheson, of Toronto, Canada; Rev. J. H. Bryson, of Alabama, and Hon. A. E. Stevenson, of Bloomington, Ill.

Mr. Robert Brown, managing editor of the Louisville Evening Times and who has just returned from New Orleans, reports that he has induced the Southern Afternoon Press Bureau to a hold a convention here in May. The dates will be from the 14th to the 16th, inclusive, and will attract wide-awake newspaper men from every section of the South.

There will be nine days of splendid racing at the Louisville Jockey Club, beginning with Kentucky's famous Derby on May 14th. The race-track and buildings have been extended and beautified, and President M. Lewis Clark declares that the events this year will be unusually attractive, and that the Derby will be a brilliant tournament.

On May 16th, 17th and 18th the Grand Lodge of Elks will hold its annual reunion here. It is confidently expected that there will be at least 10,000 Elks in the city, and a number of big entertainments will be given for them and other visitors.

The State Democratic Convention, which will attract statesmen, politicians and citizens generally, will convene in this city May 13. There will be over 700 delegates and the convention proceeding will be extremely interesting.

The Southern Literary Society has also indicated that it will meet here about the time of the festival.

The workingmen are agitating the question of repeating their great May celebration of last year, and there is very little doubt that they will do it. The celebration shows a very interesting phase of life in a great city. There will also be several conventions of various business interests in Louisville during May, and there are other events in prospect that have not yet been announced.

EVERYTHING GOES IN BOSTON.

Symphony-goers are well aware of the great crush and scramble for seats at the Friday rehearsals, but Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, gives the best illustration of a woman's anxiety to get a good seat

So anxious was she that she clambered upstairs at a gait which, assisted by the crush, caused her to shed some fine plumage in the shape of an overskirt.

"Here, madame," exclaimed Mr. Comee, in coaxing tones, as he held aloft the overskirt.

"Keep it for me," was the reply, and she sped on her journey to secure a seat.

SEMIQUAVERS.

Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" is now engaging the attention of the Festival Chorus. It is being studied with great interest, and the general opinion is that it will prove to be quite as effective as "Elijah," though of a totally different style.

***

Evening rehearsals are to be called hereafter at 7:30 and the special afternoon rehearsals at 3 p. m.

***

The stage of the Auditorium will be inclosed, and a ceiling will be constructed so as to secure the best acoustical effects.

***

Sims Reeves, the great English tenor, who is giving farewell concerts in London, sang in Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in 1849, two years after the first production.

DVORAK'S BEAUTIFUL SETTING.

Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," which the chorus took up last week and is now progressing so splendidly with, and which will be sung with a magnificent cast at the May Music Festival, has been awarded the palm over all other similar works. Contrasted with Rossini's florid and operatic music, it breathes the mystic sorrow of the Latin hymn, while the Italian composer has ignored the melancholy theme, to the triumph of pyrotechnics. He has made it beautiful, but has robbed it of its meaning. Dvorak, on the contrary, has caught the inspiration of the sweet and deep sadness, and set the words to music that appeals to the heart. He composed it, his fifty-eighth work, in 1876, and it was first produced in London, under the direction of the composer in 1883. It has been sung variously since, notably by the Handel and Haydn Society, at Boston Music Hall, February 1, 1891, when Miss Clementine De Vere, who is to sing here, was the soprano. The hymn was written by the monk Giacomo de Benedetti in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and the Latin words, as well as the beautiful English version by John Lord Hayes, are subjoined.

M. A. HUSTON, Sec. THEODORE HARRIS, Pres.
Louisville Insurance Company,
251 FIFTH STREET, LOUISVILLE, KY.
Fire, + Tornado + and + Cargo + Insurance.
☞ YOUR BUSINESS SOLICITED. ☜

J. J. FISCHER, President. EDMUND RAPP, Cashier.
GERMAN INSURANCE BANK,
North Side Market, bet. 2d and 3d.
CAPITAL AND SURPLUS, - - $500,000.00.
BANK OF DEPOSIT.
DIRECTORS.
J. J. FISCHER, W. H. EDINGER, NICK FINZER,
H. WELLENVOSS, J. HAXTHAUSEN,
CHAS. WINKLER, E W. HERMAN.
COLLECTIONS AND EXCHANGE.
The above Bank solicits deposits, pays interest on time deposits, buys and sells exchange on all principal cities in the United States, makes collections in any part of the country, and issues exchange payable at sight in the principal cities of Germany, Switzerland, France, and in any part of Europe.

Telephone 1519-2.
JAMES C. McFERRAN,
FIRE INSURANCE,
Personal attention given to all Business. 606 COMMERCE.

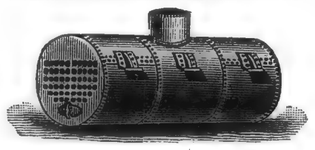
NATIONAL LIBRARY CO., SUCCESSORS TO R. S. AYERS,
625 Fourth Avenue, Louisville, Ky.
DEALERS IN
Sheet Music and Music Books, Etc.
Send for a Catalogue of our Ten Cent Music, containing All the Late and Popular Pieces of the Day.

WORLD-RENOWNED KNABE PIANOS ESTABLISHED 1851. VOSE
PIANO TUNING.
LOW PRICES FOR CASH OR ON TIME.
EMIL WULSCHNER
632 FOURTH AVENUE,
LOUISVILLE, KY.
C. RIEGGER, Manager.
PALACE ORGANS FINEST IN THE WORLD. WULSCHNER HAVE NO SUPERIOR.

DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.
DO YOU WANT TO FURNISH AN OFFICE? Do you want to Furnish a House or any part of an Office or House? If so, do not begin doing it until you have looked through our stock of Carpets, Furniture and House Furnishings. Our price and elegant display is what takes to the buying public. Don't fail to visit us.
DENHARD'S, 225, 227, 229 W. MARKET ST.

Business Education
THOROUGH INSTRUCTION IN BOOK-KEEPING, SHORT-HAND, TYPE-WRITING, PENMANSHIP, TELEGRAPHY, ETC., ETC., AT THE BRYANT & STRATTON BUSINESS COLLEGE SOUTH-WEST CORNER THIRD AND JEFFERSON STREETS, LOUISVILLE, KY. CATALOGUE FREE.

TRY ST. BERNARD COAL.
Office: 346 W. Main St., near Fourth. Telephone 932—Ring 2 & 1783—Ring 2.
ST. BERNARD COAL COMPANY.
YARDS: Kentucky St., bet. 13th & 14th. Floyd Street, North of Washington. 14th and Madison St.
H.S. NEWBOLD, Manager.



JOHN MITCHELL,
STEAM BOILER MANUFACTURER,
313, 315 & 317 ELEVENTH STREET,
Telephone 725, Ring 2. LOUISVILLE, KY.

BALLARD'S OBELISK FLOUR
ALWAYS RELIABLE.

Main Street Brewery,
SENN & ACKERMAN,
1710 to 1720 West Main Street,
LOUISVILLE, KY.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3"..... Beethoven

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos"..... Verdi

Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers..... Verdi

Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46..... Grieg

Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet"..... A. Thomas

Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps..
   (b) DANCE of Sylphs.....
   (c) HUNGARIAN MARCH .....
   } From the "Damnation of Faust"..... Berlioz

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
   (a) "Enchantment"..... Massenet
   (b) "Dormez-vous?"..... Wekerlin
   (c) "Heart's Fancies"..... A. Goring Thomas

Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE"..... Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE.....Miss DE VERE.
ADAM.....Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR.....Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra...JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE.....Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars".....Maillard
Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream"..... } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84.....Godard
(b) "In the Hammock"..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive".....Halevy
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso.....Dvorak
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major.....Liszt
Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Die Quelle".....Goldmark
(b) Florian's Song.....Godard
(c) "Vergebliches Ständchen".....Brahms
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree".... } .....Schubert
(b) "The Wanderer"..... }
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon".....Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon".....Von Weber
Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE.....John Lund
Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra.....Lalo
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme".....Delibés
Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26.....Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE".....Alibreff
Miss HOWE.

8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde".....Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3".....Beethoven
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos".....Verdi
Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46.....Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps.. }
(b) DANCE of Sylphs..... } From the "Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
(c) HUNGARIAN MARCH..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Enchantment".....Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?".....Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies".....A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE".....Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE.....Miss DE VERE.
ADAM.....Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR.....Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra...JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard
Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
(b) "In the Hammock" }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt
Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano. ..... Goldmark
(a) "Die Quelle" ..... Godard
(b) Florian's Song ..... Brahms
(c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" ..... Brahms
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree" } ..... Schubert
(b) "The Wanderer" }
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund
Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés
Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff
Miss HOWE.

8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3" ..... Beethoven
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers ..... Verdi
Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps..
(b) DANCE of Sylphs..... } From the "Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
(c) HUNGARIAN MARCH .....
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Enchantment" ..... Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?" ..... Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies" ..... A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE" ..... Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE ..... Miss DE VERE.
ADAM ..... Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR ..... Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra ... JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard
Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" ..... } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
(b) "In the Hammock" ..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt
Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano. ..... Goldmark
(a) "Die Quelle" ..... Godard
(b) Florian's Song ..... Brahms
(c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" .....
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree" .... } ..... Schubert
(b) "The Wanderer" ..... }
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund
Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés
Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff
Miss HOWE.

8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

• MUSIC HALL •

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3" ..... Beethoven
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers ..... Verdi
Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps .. }
(b) DANCE of Sylphs ..... } From the "Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
(c) HUNGARIAN MARCH ..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Enchantment" ..... Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?" ..... Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies" ..... A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE" ..... Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE ..... Miss DE VERE.
ADAM ..... Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR ..... Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra ... JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard
Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" ..... } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
(b) "In the Hammock" ..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt
Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano. ..... Goldmark
(a) "Die Quelle" ..... Godard
(b) Florian's Song ..... Brahms
(c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" ..... Brahms
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree" ..... } ..... Schubert
(b) "The Wanderer" ..... }
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund
Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés
Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff
Miss HOWE.

8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3" ..... Beethoven
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers ..... Verdi
Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps .. }
(b) DANCE of Sylphs ..... } From the "Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
(c) HUNGARIAN MARCH ..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Enchantment" ..... Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?" ..... Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies" ..... A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE" ..... Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE ..... Miss DE VERE.
ADAM ..... Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR ..... Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra ... JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard
Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
(b) "In the Hammock" }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt
Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano. ..... Goldmark
(a) "Die Quelle" ..... Godard
(b) Florian's Song ..... Brahms
(c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" .....
Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree" } ..... Schubert
(b) "The Wanderer" }
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund
Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés
Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
Bridal Song—Allegretto.
In the Garden—Andante.
Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff
Miss HOWE.

8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3" ..... Beethoven
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA from "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
Mrs. WYMAN.

3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers ..... Verdi
Mr. POWERS.

4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46 ..... Grieg
Daybreak.
The Death of Aase.
Anitra's Dance.
In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
Miss DE VERE.

6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps .. } From the "Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
(b) DANCE of Sylphs ..... }
(c) HUNGARIAN MARCH ..... }
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "Enchantment" ..... Massenet
(b) "Dormez-vous?" ..... Wekerlin
(c) "Heart's Fancies" ..... A. Goring Thomas
Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE" ..... Massenet
A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE ..... Miss DE VERE.
ADAM ..... Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR ..... Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra ... JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard
   Mrs. NIKISCH.
3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
   (b) "In the Hammock" }
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy
   Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.
5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt
   Mr. RUMMEL.
7. SONGS with Piano. ..... Goldmark
   (a) "Die Quelle" ..... Godard
   (b) Florian's Song ..... Brahms
   (c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" .....
   Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.
8. (a) "The Linden Tree" } ..... Schubert
   (b) "The Wanderer" }
   Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.
9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
   From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber
   Miss JAHN.
3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund
   Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.
4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés
   Miss HOWE.
6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
   Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
   Bridal Song—Allegretto.
   In the Garden—Andante.
   Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff
   Miss HOWE.
8. "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
    FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

BUFFALO MAY FESTIVAL

MUSIC HALL

May 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d.

Matinees 21st and 23rd.

WEDNESDAY Evening, May 20, 1891.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:
Miss CLEMENTINA DE VERE,
Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER,
Mr. FRANCIS FISCHER POWERS.

PART I.

1. OVERTURE—"Leonore No. 3" ..... Beethoven
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
2. ARIA from "Don Carlos" ..... Verdi
   Mrs. WYMAN.
3. ARIA—"O tu Palermo"—Sicilian Vespers ..... Verdi
   Mr. POWERS.
4. SUITE—"Peer Gynt"—op. 46 ..... Grieg
   Daybreak.
   The Death of Aase.
   Anitra's Dance.
   In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
5. MAD SCENE from "Hamlet" ..... A. Thomas
   Miss DE VERE.
6. (a) MINUET of the Will-o'-the-Wisps ..
   (b) DANCE of Sylphs ..... } From the "Damnation of Faust" ..... Berlioz
   (c) HUNGARIAN MARCH .....
   BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
7. SONGS with Piano.
   (a) "Enchantment" ..... Massenet
   (b) "Dormez-vous?" ..... Wekerlin
   (c) "Heart's Fancies" ..... A. Goring Thomas
   Mrs. WYMAN.

PART II.

"EVE" ..... Massenet

A MYSTERY IN THREE PARTS.

EVE ..... Miss DE VERE.
ADAM ..... Mr. POWERS.
NARRATOR ..... Mr. RIEGER.
FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra ... JOHN LUND, Conductor.

THURSDAY Afternoon, May 21.

Soloists, Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS. FRANZ RUMMEL, Solo Pianist.

1. GRANDE POLONAISE ..... Liszt

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Les Dragons de Villars" ..... Maillard

Mrs. NIKISCH.

3. (a) "Nikia's Dream" ..... } From "Symphonie Orientale" op 84 ..... Godard
   (b) "In the Hammock" .... }

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. ARIA—From "La Juive" ..... Halevy

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

5. SCHERZO Capriccioso ..... Dvorak

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

6. CONCERTO in E flat Major ..... Liszt

Mr. RUMMEL.

7. SONGS with Piano.
   (a) "Die Quelle" ..... Goldmark
   (b) Florian's Song ..... Godard
   (c) "Vergebliches Ständchen" ..... Brahms

Mrs. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

8. (a) "The Linden Tree" .... }
   (b) "The Wanderer" ..... } ..... Schubert

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, AND WEDDING MARCH—
   From the "Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THURSDAY Evening, May 21.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARIE JAHN, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE—"Oberon" ..... Von Weber

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. ARIA—"Ocean, thou Mighty Monster"—From "Oberon" ..... Von Weber

Miss JAHN.

3. THE MARCH TO BATTLE ..... John Lund

Miss JAHN, Mr. BUSHNELL, and MALE CHORUS.

4. RHAPSODY for Orchestra ..... Lalo

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

5. BELL SONG—"Lakme" ..... Delibés

Miss HOWE.

6. SYMPHONY (Rustic Wedding) op. 26 ..... Goldmark
   Wedding March, with variations—Moderato. Molto.
   Bridal Song—Allegretto.
   In the Garden—Andante.
   Dance—Finale—Allegro Molto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONG—"THE NIGHTINGALE" ..... Alibreff

Miss HOWE.

8. } "WALDWEBEN," from "Siegfried" ..... Wagner
9. } VORSPIEL UND LIEBESTOD from "Tristan und Isolde" ..... Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. CHORALE, from "Die Meistersinger" ..... Wagner

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine" ..... Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch" ..... Löwe
   (b) "Tom the Rhymer" ..... Löwe

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
   (a) "Loveliest Flower ..... Price
   (b) "In the East" ..... Mulligan

Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil" ..... David

Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung" ..... Wagner
   (Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
   (a) "The Arabian Slave" ..... Shelley
   (b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream" ..... Hawley

Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro" .... } Swedish } ..... Lindblad
   (b) "Trollhättan" ..... } Songs } ..... Please

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven
   Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
   Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song" ..... Eckert

Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country" ..... Eichberg

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
   - (a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee".....Selected
   - (b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening".....Gluck
   - (c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
   - (a) "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
   - (b) "Bon Jour Susanne".....Delibés
   - (c) "Frühlingsnacht".....Schumann

Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman

Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker

Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL.
Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
   - (b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann

Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO.....Händel

For Violins.

8. SONGS.
   - (a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
   - (b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund

Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
   - (a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
   - (b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
   - (c) PART SONG—"Good Night".....Franz Abt

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso".....Liszt

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin".....Wagner

Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung".....Wagner

Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA.....J. Krug-Waldsee

Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine".....Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch".....Löwe
   (b) "Tom the Rhymer".....Löwe

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
   - (a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
   - (b) "In the East".....Mulligan

Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David

Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung".....Wagner

(Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Arabian Slave".....Shelley
   - (b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream".....Hawley

Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro"....} Swedish Songs {.....Lindblad
   (b) "Trollhättan".....} Swedish Songs {.....Please

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5.....Beethoven

Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song".....Eckert

Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
(a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee".....Selected
(b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening".....Gluck
(c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
(b) "Bon Jour Susanne".....Delibés
(c) "Frühlingsnacht".....Schumann
Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman
Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker
Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL.
Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO.....Händel
For Violins.

8. SONGS.
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund
Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
(a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
(b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
(c) PART SONG—"Good Night".....Franz Abt
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso".....Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung".....Wagner
Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine".....Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch".....Löwe
(b) "Tom the Rhymer".....Löwe
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
(a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
(b) "In the East".....Mulligan
Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David
Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung".....Wagner
(Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
(a) "The Arabian Slave".....Shelley
(b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream".....Hawley
Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro"....} Swedish Songs .....Lindblad
(b) "Trollhättan"....} .....Please
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song".....Eckert
Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
   - (a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee".....Selected
   - (b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening".....Gluck
   - (c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
   - (a) "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
   - (b) "Bon Jour Susanne".....Delibés
   - (c) "Frühlingsnacht".....Schumann

Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman

Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker

Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL. Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
   - (b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann

Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO.....Händel

For Violins.

8. SONGS.
   - (a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
   - (b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund

Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
   - (a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
   - (b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
   - (c) PART SONG—"Good Night".....Franz Abt

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso".....Liszt

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin".....Wagner

Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung".....Wagner

Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA.....J. Krug-Waldsee

Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine".....Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch".....Löwe
   (b) "Tom the Rhymer".....Löwe

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
   - (a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
   - (b) "In the East".....Mulligan

Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David

Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung".....Wagner

(Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Arabian Slave".....Shelley
   - (b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream".....Hawley

Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro"....} Swedish Songs .....Lindblad
   (b) "Trollhättan"....} .....Please

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5.....Beethoven

Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song".....Eckert

Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
   - (a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee".....Selected
   - (b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening".....Gluck
   - (c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
   - (a) "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
   - (b) "Bon Jour Susanne".....Delibés
   - (c) "Frühlingsnacht".....Schumann

Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman

Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker

Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL.
Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
   - (b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann

Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO.....Händel

For Violins.

8. SONGS.
   - (a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
   - (b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund

Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
   - (a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
   - (b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
   - (c) PART SONG—"Good Night".....Franz Abt

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso".....Liszt

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin".....Wagner

Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung".....Wagner

Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA.....J. Krug-Waldsee

Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine".....Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch".....Löwe
   (b) "Tom the Rhymer".....Löwe

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet".....Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
   - (a) "Loveliest Flower".....Price
   - (b) "In the East".....Mulligan

Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil".....David

Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung".....Wagner
   (Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Arabian Slave".....Shelley
   - (b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream".....Hawley

Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro"....} Swedish Songs .....Lindblad
   (b) "Trollhättan".....} .....Please

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5.....Beethoven.
   Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
   Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song".....Eckert

Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country".....Eichberg

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version)..... Wagner

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
   - (a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee" ..... Selected
   - (b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening" ..... Gluck
   - (c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales" ..... N. Lincoln

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
   - (a) "In Liebeslust" ..... Liszt
   - (b) "Bon Jour Susanne" ..... Delibés
   - (c) "Frühlingsnacht" ..... Schumann

Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon" ..... Demersseman

Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?" ..... E. L. Baker

Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL. Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Old Stone Wall" ..... P. A. Schenecker
   - (b) "The Two Grenadiers" ..... Schumann

Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO ..... Händel

For Violins.

8. SONGS.
   - (a) "Favorite Eyes" ..... Newcomb
   - (b) "Double Loss" ..... Meyer-Helmund

Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
   - (a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home" ..... Alfred Beirly
   - (b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free" ..... Brinley Richards
   - (c) PART SONG—"Good Night" ..... Franz Abt

CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe" ..... Von Weber

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso" ..... Liszt

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung" ..... Wagner

Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA ..... J. Krug-Waldsee

Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine" ..... Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch" ..... Löwe
   (b) "Tom the Rhymer" ..... Löwe

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tschaikowsky

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
   - (a) "Loveliest Flower ..... Price
   - (b) "In the East" ..... Mulligan

Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil" ..... David

Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung" ..... Wagner

(Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
   - (a) "The Arabian Slave" ..... Shelley
   - (b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream" ..... Hawley

Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro"... } Swedish Songs { ..... Lindblad
   (b) "Trollhättan"..... } Songs { ..... Please

Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven

   Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
   Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song" ..... Eckert

Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country" ..... Eichberg

FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version) ..... Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
(a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee" ..... Selected
(b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening" ..... Gluck
(c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales" ..... N. Lincoln
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "In Liebeslust" ..... Liszt
(b) "Bon Jour Susanne" ..... Delibés
(c) "Frühlingsnacht" ..... Schumann
Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?" ..... E. L. Baker
Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL.
Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
(a) "The Old Stone Wall" ..... P. A. Schenecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers" ..... Schumann
Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGO ..... Händel
For Violins.

8. SONGS.
(a) "Favorite Eyes" ..... Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss" ..... Meyer-Helmund
Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
(a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home" ..... Alfred Beirly
(b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free" ..... Brinley Richards
(c) PART SONG—"Good Night" ..... Franz Abt
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe" ..... Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso" ..... Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung" ..... Wagner
Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA ..... J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

FRIDAY Evening, May 22.

Soloists, MISS MARY HOWE, MISS MARY E. FOX, MR. W. H. RIEGER, Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Lancelot and Elaine" ..... Mac Dowell

2. (a) "The Watch" ..... Löwe
(b) "Tom the Rhymer" ..... Löwe
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

3. OVERTURE—Fantasie—"Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tschaikowsky
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

4. SONGS.
(a) "Loveliest Flower ..... Price
(b) "In the East" ..... Mulligan
Mr. RIEGER.

5. SOLO—Bird Song—"Pearl of Brazil" ..... David
Miss HOWE.

6. SIEGFRIED'S PASSAGE to Brunhilde's Rock—Morning, Dawn and Rhine Journey from "Siegfried" and "Götterdammerung" ..... Wagner
(Arranged by DR. HANS RICHTER.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

7. SONGS.
(a) "The Arabian Slave" ..... Shelley
(b) "Ah! 'tis a Dream" ..... Hawley
Miss FOX.

8. (a) "To, To Män Tro" .... } Swedish { ..... Lindblad
(b) "Trollhättan" ..... } Songs { ..... Please
Mr. CONRAD BEHRENS.

9. SYMPHONY in C Minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro (Scherzo)—Allegro (Finale.)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

10. SOLO—"Echo Song" ..... Eckert
Miss HOWE.

11. CHORUS—"To Thee, O Country" ..... Eichberg
FESTIVAL CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

SATURDAY Afternoon, May 23.

Soloists, MRS. NIKISCH, MISS CAMPBELL, MR. W. H. RIEGER, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. OVERTURE AND BACCHANALE from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version).....Wagner
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. CHORUS, (Children's).
(a) CHORAL—"Our Father, 'tis to Thee".....Selected
(b) PART SONG—"Sweet Spring Evening".....Gluck
(c) SOLO, DUET AND CHORUS—"Sigh Gentle Gales".....N. Lincoln
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

3. SONGS with Piano.
(a) "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
(b) "Bon Jour Susanne".....Delibes
(c) "Frühlingsnacht".....Schumann
Mrs. NIKISCH.

4. SOLO FOR FLUTE—Fantasie on themes from "Oberon".....Demersseman
Mr. CH. MOLE.

5. ANTHEM—"Who is like unto Thee?".....E. L. Baker
Soloists: Miss MARGARET E. CAMPBELL.
Mr. W. H. RIEGER.

6. SONGS.
(a) "The Old Stone Wall".....P. A. Schenecker
(b) "The Two Grenadiers".....Schumann
Mr. BUSHNELL.

7. LARGE.....Händel
For Violins.

8. SONGS.
(a) "Favorite Eyes".....Newcomb
(b) "Double Loss".....Meyer-Helmund
Mr. RIEGER.

9. SONGS.
(a) SOLO AND CHORUS—"My Dear Old Home".....Alfred Beirly
(b) CHORUS—"The Banner of the Free".....Brinley Richards
(c) PART SONG—"Good Night".....Franz Abt
CHILDREN'S CHORUS.

10. OVERTURE—"Euryanthe".....Von Weber
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Children's Choruses Conducted by Mr. E. L. Baker.

SATURDAY Evening, May 23.

Soloists, MISS MARIE JAHN, MISS DE VERE, MR. DIPPEL, MR. E. C. BUSHNELL.

1. SYMPHONIC POEM—"Tasso".....Liszt
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

2. LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE—from "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Mr. DIPPEL.

3. ARIA—"O Lovely Halls" from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Miss JAHN.

4. DUET—"In Neuen Thäten," from "Die Götterdammerung".....Wagner
Miss JAHN and Mr. DIPPEL.

PART II.

5. "KING ROTHER," A CANTATA.....J. Krug-Waldsee
Miss DE VERE, Mr. BUSHNELL.

FESTIVAL CHORUS of 500 Voices and Orchestra....JOHN LUND, Conductor.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND